The only possible way to reconcile these decisions is to follow the opinion of Justice Cooly in Arnold v. Nye, supra, and consider the wording of the statute. The rule to be observed is clearly laid down in the case of Columbia Turnpike Road v. Haywood, 10 Wend. 424, where a distinction was made between a statute requiring a notice to be served at least fourteen days before the first day of the court, and requiring a summons to be sent at least six days before the time of appearance. The court says that the former statute excludes the first day of the court, "which our rules and the general rules of construction include." The distinction made is practically this: Where an act is to be done a certain number of days before a day stated, then that day is excluded in the computation; but where an act is to be done a certain number of days before another act, then the day on which that act is to be done is included.

The day before which an act is to be done is to be excluded.

Peck*, Withington v. Southworth, Town v. Tabor, Brown v. Williams and Hubbell v. Rhinesmith, supra.

Mr. C. P. Thomas, for appellees:

The summons was returnable on the 18th day of February, and was served on the 12th. This service was void for our court has held that the day of service and also of return must be excluded in computing the time of service.

Isabelle v. Iron Cliffs Co. 57 Mich. 120.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause was tried in the circuit court before a jury. The suit was on a sheriff's bond; but the only question in controversy here is upon a justice's summons, which was introduced in evidence, and upon which the rights of the parties depend. The summons was issued February 9, 1889, returnable February 18. It was served upon one of the defendants in the summons named February 12. It is claimed upon the part of the defendants that both the day of service and the return day should be excluded, and that, so excluding 18 L. R. A.

both days, no sufficient service was had to give the justice jurisdiction. How. Stat., § 6827, provides: "The summons shall in all cases, except as hereinafter otherwise provided, be served at least six days before the time of appearance mentioned therein." If this statute provides for six days exclusive of the day of service and the day of return, it was not properly served, and the justice did not acquire jurisdiction. If, on the contrary, either of these days is to be included in the computation of time, then it was properly served, and the justice had jurisdiction. It is claimed that there is great confusion in the cases heretofore decided by this court upon this question, but we think, if the proper rule in the construction of the statutes is kept in mind, this confusion is not so apparent. The rule was laid down in Columbia Turnpike Road v. Haywood, 10 Wend. 423, which was followed by this court in Arnold v. Nye, 23 Mich. 286, and that rule has since been adhered to, or at least it is apparent that this court has attempted to keep within that rule. In Columbia Turnpike Road v. Haywood, supra, the rule is that, in determining the time within which process or notice must be served, the language of the statute must be observed; and, where an act is to be done a certain number of days before a day stated, then that day is excluded in the computation, but, where an act is to be done a certain number of days before another act, then the day on which that act is to be done is to be included. The summons was therefore served within the time required by the statute, and gave the justice jurisdiction. Under the Act of 1875, pertaining to public drains, the commissioner is required to serve notice of examination of the application at least five days before the day appointed as aforesaid. Act No. 140, Laws 1875. In Lane v. Burnap Drain Comrs. 39 Mich. 786, and Taylor v. Burnap Drain Comrs. 40 Mich. 789, it was held that five clear days were required. It has also been held by this court that in proceedings to lay out highways the statute requiring that notices of meeting, to determine the necessity of a highway, must be served at least ten days before the time of said meeting, requires ten full days. People v. Clay Turp. Highway Comrs. 88 Mich. 247; Coquard v. Boehmer, 81 Mich. 445; Coz v. Hartford Highway Comrs. 88 Mich. 193; Risenburg v. Muskegon, 83 Mich. 279. It is held under How. Stat., § 6840, requiring writs of attachment to be served at least six days before the return thereof, that the last day is to be included. Hubbell v. Rhinesmith, 85 Mich. 80, and cases there cited. It is also held, under section 4245, Comp. Laws 1857, authorizing a commissioner to take depositions, which provides that notice shall be given to the adverse party at least ten days before the making of such application, that the day of service is to be excluded, and the day on which the application is to be made is included. Arnold v. Nye, supra. See also Eaton v. Peck, 26 Mich. 57, and Warren v. Slade, 23 Mich. 1, 9 Am. Rep. 70. We think the rule as laid down in Arnold v. Nye, supra, which adopted the rule of the New York court in Columbia Turnpike Road v. Haywood, supra, has not been intentionally departed from in the subsequent cases of this court, and that the true construction of this statute includes the return day, mentioned in the summons in the computation of time.

As the rule in Columbia Turnpike Road v. Haywood, supra, must hereafter be followed, we note the language of that court in which it is said: "Our rule is well settled that, when days are mentioned in the statutes of our own rules, they are to be reckoned one exclusive and one inclusive. Thus a notice of argument is a notice of eight days. If the term commences on the 9th of the month, the service must be on the 1st. If you include in the computation the day of notice, you will have eight days, excluding the first day of the term; if you exclude the day of service, you include the first day of term; so, when six days' service of a summons are required and it is returnable on the 8th, the service on the 2d is good. This rule of construction is said by defendant's counsel to be inconsistent with the decision in Small v. Edrick, 5 Wend. 187; but it will be seen the phrasology of the two statutes under which the questions arose is different. The one requires the summons to be served at least six days before the time of appearance; the other requires notice to be served at least fourteen days before the first day of the court. The latter excludes the first day of the court, and therefore requires fourteen days,—one exclusive and one inclusive, excluding the first day of the court, which our rules and the general rules of construction include. That case is therefore an exception to the general rule, and is so from the terms of the statute. There was no error in the justice's court in this part of the case." In that case the justice summons was served on the 2d day of April, in the afternoon, and was returnable on the 8th day of April, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon. Isabelle v. Iron Cliffs Co., 57 Mich. 125, which defendants' counsel relies upon as sustaining his position as holding that the day of service and the return day must be excluded in computing the time, must be overruled if at variance with the above rules of construction of the statute; but the learned justice who wrote that case was giving construction to a statute relative to the service and return of a writ of attachment. The officer making service in that case was unable to find the defendant within his bailiwick, and it was held that the case fell within the rule laid down in Town v. Tabor, 34 Mich. 262. We are aware that in a note to the fourth edition of Tiffany's Justice Guide, under title of Summons, p. 81, the learned judge who revised that edition carries the impression that the rule has been settled in this state that both the day of service and the return day of the justice summons are to be excluded in the computation of time. He says, as supporting that contention, that, when an act is to be done before a specified time or day, that day is to be excluded in computing the time for complying with the requirement, and cites the cases of Sallee v. Ireland, 9 Mich. 154, and Re Powers, 20 Mich. 504; People v. Clay Twp. Highway Comrs., 38 Mich. 247; also one case from New York, and two late cases from Massachusetts. He also says, "It is ruled in this state that the day of service is to be excluded," citing the cases above referred to, together with Lane v. Burnap Drain Comrs., and Taylor v. Burnap Drain Comrs., supra, and the case of Arnold v. Nye, supra. It is evident from this that the rule laid down in Columbia Turnpike Road v. Haywood, cited with approval in Arnold v. Nye, was lost sight of, as many of the cases cited in support of the rule laid down in the note arose under quite different statutes from the one in controversy here. We have examined the cases with considerable care, in order to deduce the proper rule of construction of this statute, so that in the future it cannot be said that there is confusion in the cases; and the rule hereafter must be adhered to under this statute, excluding the day of service and including the return day, in the computation of time.

It is also claimed that the judgment of the court below should not be disturbed, for the reason that the docket entry of judgment put in evidence does not show affirmatively that the justice, on the adjourned day of the cause, waited one hour for the defendants to appear. This point is ruled by Smith v. Brown, 34 Mich. 455. Had an attack been made upon the judgment in a direct proceeding for that purpose, this defect would have been error. Bossence v. Jones, 46 Mich. 492; Noyes v. Hillier, 65 Mich. 636. But the judgment was not attacked except in this collateral way, and the defect is not jurisdictional, as held in the above case.

The judgment must be reversed, with costs, and a new trial granted.

The other Justices concurred.

ST. LOUIS, KEOKUK & NORTHWESTERN R. CO., Resp't.

(.....Mo.....)

The construction and operation of a steam railroad along a street on the established grade under proper municipal authority does not constitute such an application of the street to a new public use as requires payment of compensation for damages to the owner of abutting lots.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Mills & Flitcraft, for appellant:

The Missouri Constitution of 1875, art. 2, § 21, requires compensation to be paid in advance to owners for such damages to property as were previously considered consequential, and included therein damages to property caused by construction of steam railroads in streets.

The owner of an abutting lot has a special interest in the street distinct in kind and in addition to that enjoyed by the public in general. Interference with the right of ingress and egress, light, air, access by customers, by teams and vehicles, and the use of the enjoyment of the street is a damage peculiar to the owner, and protected by the Constitution.

Mr. John G. Chandler for respondent.

Macfarlane, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit is to enjoin defendant from laying a track and operating a railroad laterally along Main street, in the city of St. Louis, in front of the property of plaintiff, until compensation for damages thereto should be ascertained and paid. Upon a trial in the circuit court plaintiff's petition was dismissed, and it appealed. A preliminary injunction, which was granted at the beginning of the suit, was dissolved, and the road had been built and was in use when the case was tried. The petition charged, and the evidence showed, that Main street is, and for many years has been, an improved, graded, guttered, curbed, and paved public highway, running north and south through the city of St. Louis. That plaintiff owns the entire block fronting on Main street between Clinton and Madison streets, and has thereon a two-story and basement factory, having a front of 240 feet by a depth eastwardly of 130 feet, which was erected for the special purpose of, and was adapted by its construction to use as, a planing mill, sash, door, blind, and box factory, and was used as such; that the building fronts on Main street, and is so constructed that the only front which is adapted for receiving and shipping lumber from the street is the Main street front; that the building is constructed with doors and driveways opening on Main street, for the purpose of receiving lumber and shipping out the product of its said factory; that Main street has a width of 80 feet; that the Merchants' Terminal Railroad Company has also a double-track railway along said street, the easternmost rail being within 15½ feet of the curb in front of the factory; that plaintiff and its customers had theretofore had free access to said factory by driving wagons and other vehicles over Main street to its front, and, for the purpose of carrying thither or removing therefrom lumber or mill work, have been able to enter said premises from Main street front by means of doors and entrances provided, and have been able to have wagons and vehicles stand on the street, in front of the factory, for the purpose of receiving and discharging lumber and mill work; that there is in front of said premises a sidewalk, made of plank and cinders, 15 feet wide from the building line to the curb of the street; that the defendant threatened and was about to occupy and obstruct said street by laying thereon in front of said factory, and operating by steam locomotives thereon, double tracks, thereby permanently obstructing said street, and not leaving space between the track and the building sufficient to permit of standing wagons and other vehicles, without constant danger of collision with engines and cars passing to and fro over said tracks, all of which would wholly destroy the use of the street as a thoroughfare, and tend to the manifest wrong and injury of plaintiff, and damage of its said property. The damage to the property, as charged, consisted in the prevention of free ingress and egress to and from the streets, noise and smoke, damage from fires, shaking and vibration of building; all caused by the passage of engines and cars over the street in such proximity to the premises. Defendant answered, setting up authority by virtue of an ordinance of the city granting it the license and right to construct a double-track railroad along Main street. The ordinance required that the tracks should conform to established grades of the street crossed and occupied. The ordinance and its provisions were not denied. The evidence satisfies us that the tracks were built in a careful and skillful manner, and in compliance with the requirements of the ordinance.

1. We are satisfied from an examination of the evidence that plaintiff's property has been somewhat depreciated in value by reason of the construction of the railroad along the street, and the movements of engines and trains thereon. The inquiry to be made is whether the damages thus inflicted are such as are contemplated by section 21, art. 2, of the state Constitution, which ordains "that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation." It is not claimed by plaintiff that there was any physical injury done to their property, or that their possession was disturbed. It was also shown to our satisfaction, or conceded under the pleadings, that Main street was dedicated without restrictions to general use as a highway; that defendant was authorized, by the charter and ordinance of the city, to lay its tracks along said street, and to move thereon cars, propelled by steam locomotives, for the transportation of persons and property; and that the track was laid on the established grade of the street, and was constructed in a careful and skillful manner, and in strict compliance with the requirements of the ordinance. On the other hand, it must be conceded by defendant, because it is too well settled to admit of question, that every owner of a lot abutting on a public street decides the ownership of the property itself, has rights appurtenant thereto, which form a part of the estate. Those rights are said to be "as much property as the lot itself." Of these may be named an easement for the free admission of light and pure air, and the right of ingress and egress to and from his property. Rude v. St. Louis, 98 Mo. 418; Lackland v. North Missouri R. Co. 81 Mo. 188; Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 145; Adams v. Chicago, B. & N. W. R. Co. 89 Minn. 286, 1 L. R. A. 493; Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Heisel, 88 Mich. 62, 31 Am. Rep. 306.

In the last case cited the right is well expressed as follows: "Every lotowner has a peculiar interest in the adjacent street, which neither the local nor general public can pretend to claim; a private right in the nature of an incorporeal hereditament, legally attached to his contiguous ground; an incidental title to certain facilities and franchises which is in the nature of property, and which can no more be appropriated against his will than any tangible property of which he may be the owner." Depriving the owner of these incorporeal hereditaments, or interfering with their full enjoyment, by appropriating the street to a new and different public use from that originally contemplated, would undoubtedly be a damage within the foregoing constitutional provision. In the Van De Vere Case, 107 Mo. 91, the question as to what would constitute a damage where there was no physical invasion of the property itself was very carefully considered by this court. After quoting approvingly the views of some of our most eminent text-writers, the court, speaking through Judge Black, of the right of one to recover damages, said: "What we do say is this: that he must show that the property itself, or some right or easement connected therewith, is directly affected, and that it is specially affected." We think a public use which would interfere with these incorporeal rights, whereby the property was depreciated in value, would be a damage to the property, within the meaning of the Constitution, and would entitle the owner to compensation.

2. The vital question in this case we do not think turns upon the character of the rights of plaintiff which were interfered with, but whether there was an interference at all. In other words, the question is whether laying the railroad track in the street on grade, under municipal authority, and operating the road in the usual manner, was applying the street to a new public use, which required the payment of compensation for damages to the property, or whether doing so was merely exercising by authority a right which had resided with the public since the dedication of the land to public uses. When land is dedicated generally, and without restrictions, or condemned, for a public street in a town or city, the owner of the abutting lots, who secures the benefit of the street, and persons also who purchase and improve property thereon, hold their property rights subject to all the uses to which the street can be lawfully subjected by the public. New uses in the improvement in the mode of travel and transportation are constantly arising. When there is no restriction on the public use, new modes of use may be adopted which are consistent with the proper use of the street, without the consent of abutting owners, though such new uses may interfere somewhat with their own convenient use of the street. Judge Norton, expressing the opinion of a majority of this court in a recent case, says: "I think it may be safely affirmed that all the authorities to which we have been cited by counsel on both sides of this case agree that when the public acquires a street, either by condemnation, grant, or dedication, it may be applied to all uses consistent with, and not subversive of, the proper uses of a street, and not inconsistent with the uses contemplated in the dedication, grant, or condemnation; and that it is only when the street is subjected to a new servitude, inconsistent with and subversive of its use as a street, that the abutting owner can complain." Julia Bldg. Assn. v. Bell Teleph. Co. 88 Mo. 273.

3. There has been great diversity of opinion among the courts of this country as to whether, though under proper legislative authority, laying a track on the established grade, and operating a steam railroad thereon, in the transaction of commercial business, along a street, is subjecting the street to a public use not contemplated in a general grant or dedication. Whatever the rule may be elsewhere, this court has been uniform in holding that such a use is not a perversion of the highway from its original purposes. Lackland v. North Missouri R. Co. 81 Mo. 180; Porter v. North Missouri R. Co. 88 Mo. 128; Cross v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 77 Mo. 321; Julia Bldg. Assn. Case, 18 L. R. A.

supra; Smith v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 98 Mo. 24; Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. v. St. Joseph T. R. Co. 97 Mo. 469; Rude v. St. Louis, 93 Mo. 414. In the early case of Porter v. North Missouri R. Co., supra, Judge Bates says: "Upon deliberation, we think that the use of a street for purposes of a railroad, in its ordinary use as a means of travel and transportation, is not a perversion of the highway from its original purposes, and was authorized by the general assembly in the charter of the defendant. The damage to the plaintiff's property, resulting from such obstruction, was damnum absque injuria." Judge Henry, in Cross v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co., supra, says: "Conceding the right to lay the track in the street and its proper construction at the grade of the street, the company was not liable for any inconvenience to property holders resulting from a proper and prudent operation of the road." Judge Norton recognized the rule in the Julia Bldg. Assn. Case, supra; Judge Black in the Rude Case, supra; Judge Barclay in Smith v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., supra,—in opinions written by them respectively, and Judge Brace, in Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. v. St. Joseph Terminal R. Co., 97 Mo. 469, after stating that the only damage suggested by the lotowner from the use of the street by the railroad is that resulting from the movement of trains, and the occupation of space on the street in doing so, says: "But, that space being in a public street, the defendant's tracks having been authorized to be laid by the city, its use by the defendant for the purpose of passing to and fro over it with trains is a legitimate use belonging to the defendant company, as well as the plaintiff, in common with every other citizen desirous of passing it with vehicles." These decisions from our own court show that the doctrine is firmly established in the jurisprudence of this state, and there is no occasion for an examination or review of the decisions of other states which hold to the contrary. It appears from the evidence that the only substantial damage which was special to plaintiff and not common to the public, shown by it, consisted in the interference with its free access from the street to its factory; the obstruction of the light and air across the open street; smoke, cinders, and dust from engine and cars; noise and jarring of the ground,—all caused by the movement of trains. These may cause damage to and depreciation of the property, but the damage results from a legitimate use of the street, and which might have been anticipated by plaintiff as a probable use when they bought their property and erected their improvements. Cross v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. and Kansas City St. J. & C. B. R. Co. v. St. Joseph Terminal R. Co. supra.

The public use was fixed when the street was granted or dedicated. The license granted by the city to the defendant to lay its tracks upon the streets, and run engines and cars thereon in the transportation of passengers and property, was not a re-dedication to a new and distinct public use, but was a mere license to use it in a way contemplated by the owner of the land when he subjected it to such uses. The lots were purchased, held, and improved, not only in view of the advantages of the street but also subject to the burdens of all consistent public uses which the increasing wants of the public might thereafter demand.

4 For any damages that may be caused by an unlawful or negligent maintenance of the track in the street, or by negligent use of engines or movement of trains, defendant will be liable in an action for damages. Plaintiff has shown no ground for injunction, and the judgment is affirmed.

John S. MARTIN.

(.....Ga.....)

"Where the terms of a deed of conveyance, taking the whole together, show that the instrument is in its essence a quitclaim title, and that the makers intended no warranty except as against themselves and their own acts, a failure of the title to two of the lots out of a great number covered by the conveyance, by reason of the existence of a previous outstanding better title, will be no breach of any implied covenant arising out of a recital of facts or out of the use of words of conveyance, no fraud or intentional misrepresentation being alleged. Nor will the failure of the vendees to get or to hold possession of such two lots, without any fraud or misconduct on the part of the vendors, constitute a defense to an action for the purchase money, or any part thereof.

ERROR to the City Court of Savannah to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount due on certain notes which had been given to secure the purchase money of land. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Garrard & Meldrim for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. George A. Mercer, for defendant in error:

*Headnote by BLACKLEY, Ch. J.

NOTE.—Recitals in a deed as basis of implied covenants of title.

The case of Severn & Clerkes, 1 Leon. 122, has been sometimes quoted as authority for the doctrine that a covenant of title might be implied from a recital. But in that case the deed was a deed poll of a mere interest for years and recited the grantor's possession. It was held that the recital in connection with other parts of the deed created an obligation to make a good title.

In Horry v. Frost, 10 Rich. Eq. 112, it is said that a covenant may be as obligatory when expressed by way of recital as if expressed in the formal part of the agreement. But this was not a case concerning a deed but concerning an instrument comprising a controversy as to a will, and the recital was of a stipulation to pay certain debts.

In Ferguson v. Dent, 8 Mo. 687, an attempt was made to establish a covenant that a tract of land lay in a certain situation from the use of words following the description saying that it lay west and adjacent to a certain other tract.

Bouvier defines a covenant to be an agreement by deed, whereby one of the parties promises the performance or nonperformance of certain acts, or that a given state of things does or shall, or does not or shall not, exist.

1 Bouvier, Law Dict. p. 402.

Express covenants are those which are created by the express words of the parties to the deed declaratory of their intention.

Id. p. 403.

Covenants for title are those covenants in a deed conveying land, which are inserted for the purpose of securing to the grantee and covenantee the benefit of the title conveyed.

Ibid.

Covenant of seisin is defined to be an assurance to the grantee that the grantor has the very estate, both in quantity and quality, which he professes to convey.

Id. p. 407.

There are no words in this deed which can be construed into a covenant of a right to sell. See Rawle, Covenants, pp. 28, 29, note 3 to § 21, p. 54, § 41.

There are no implied covenants for title in the sale of land.

Ga. Code 1882, § 2702; Brooks v. Turner, 68 Ga. 298; Jordan v. Jordan, Dudley (Ga.) 181.

A purchaser of land without warranty can bring no suit for defect of title.

See Abbott v. Allen, 2 Johns. Ch. 519, 523, 1 L. ed. 472; Frost v. Raymond, 2 Cal. 190; 4 Kent, Com. 471, and notes; Platt, Covenants, 8 Law Lib. 47, 48, note k, 806, 88; Browning v. Wright, 2 Bos. & P. 21, 26; Beall v. Berkhalter, 26 Ga. 564.

Loss or damage caused by failure of title

In Whitehill v. Gotwalt, 3 Penr. & W. 812, which overruled Christine v. Whitehill, 16 Serg. & R. 96, the exact question as to the effect of a recital as a warranty of title is presented, and it is held that there is no such warranty created by the use after the description of land in a deed of the words "being part of 58 acres and 100 perches of land, late the property of" the vendor's father with a statement following that the probate court has decreed the land to the vendor and the other heirs have given him deeds of release.

The claim that recitals may constitute the basis of a covenant of title is also said by Rawle on Covenants, p. 420, to be denied in Kean v. Strong, 14 Ir. L. Rep. (Q. B.) 377, which case is not at present within our reach.

After diligent search we have been unable to find a single actual decision to justify the statement that covenants of title can ever be implied from recitals, although such a doctrine has sometimes been loosely asserted.

cannot be set up as a defense to an action for the purchase money.

See 4 Kent, Com. 471, note b, citing Owings v. Thompson, 4 Ill. 502; Wright v. Shorter, 50 Ga. 78.

Bleckley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

When this case was decided the syllabus was formulated by the court, handed down, and filed. Since then an argument in elucidation and support of the decision has been prepared at my request by A. H. Davis, Esq., one of our official stenographers. In studying and revising his argument, I have examined every authority to which it refers. My associates, after hearing it read, concur with me in adopting it as the opinion of the court. We do not merely recite it, but make it our own. For this reason, quotation marks are omitted.

This is an action on a note given for the purchase money of a large number of lots of land. The plea sets up (1) damages by a breach of the plaintiff's covenant that the title to the land was in him, and of the covenant for possession and seisin, the defendants having been evicted from two of the lots by title paramount; (2) failure of consideration in the loss of two of the lots, which the plaintiff covenanted that he owned. The plea makes no issue of fraud, misrepresentation, concealment, or mistake. The parts of the deed material to show the undertaking of the plaintiff are as follows: "This indenture . . . between John S. Martin, . . . Andrew J. Miller, . . . Cornelia V. Miller, the wife of the said Andrew J. Miller, . . . Sarah E. Miller and R. M. Miller, by their guardian ad litem, Andrew J. Miller, as parties of the first part, and John J. McDonough and Tiny B. Thompson, . . . and Edward Burdett, . . . copartners, composing the firm of McDonough & Co., . . . as parties of the second part, witnesseth that, whereas, the title to certain lands, hereinafter mentioned as described, is in the said John S. Martin, . . . as evidenced by a certain deed of conveyance made by Henry Gallagher, assignee in bankruptcy of A. J. Miller, . . . to said Martin; . . . and, whereas, certain portions of the lands described were . . . set apart to said Andrew J. Miller, as the head of a family, as a homestead; . . . and whereas, under a proceeding had before the . . . judge of the superior court of Pierce county, certain orders were passed . . . authorizing a private sale of the homestead property, in which proceeding all the parties at interest were duly represented: . . . Said parties of the first part . . . have granted, bargained, sold, remised, conveyed, released, and quitclaimed, and by these presents do grant, bargain, sell, remise, convey, release, and forever quitclaim, unto said parties of the second part, in their full possession and seisin, and to their heirs and assigns, the following lots of land, and all the estate, right, title, interest, use, trust, property, claim, and demand whatsoever, both at law and in equity, of said parties of the first part of, in, to, or out of all those lots, tracts, or parcels of land," etc. "To have and to hold the said conveyed and released premises unto said parties of the second part, their heirs and assigns, to their only proper use, benefit, and behoof forever,

. . . so that neither the said John S. Martin, nor the said Andrew J. Miller individually or as guardian ad litem, as hereinbefore stated, or said Cornelia V. Miller, or said Sarah E. and R. M. Miller, or either of them, their heirs and assigns, nor any other person or persons in trust for them or in their name, or in the name, right, and stead of any of them, shall or will, can or may, by any ways or means whatsoever, hereafter have, claim, challenge, or demand any right, title, interest, or estate in or out of said premises above described, and hereby released and conveyed; but that said parties of the first part, and every of them, their heirs and assigns, from all estate, right, title, interest, property, claim, and demand whatsoever of, in, to, or out of said premises or any parcel thereof . . . is, are, and shall be by these presents forever excluded and debarred."

The subject here conveyed is described as "the following lots of land, and all the estate, right, title, interest," etc., "of the parties of the first part." The deed uses appropriate words of release and quitclaim, and lacks the usual covenant of general warranty, which, by Code, § 2708, includes covenants of a right to sell, of quiet enjoyment, and of freedom from incumbrances. There are no formal covenants at all, except the one against any title, claim, etc., under the parties making the deed.

Covenants are of two kinds,—express and implied. Express are those stated in words more or less distinctly exposing the intent to covenant, and implied are those inferred by legal construction from the use of certain words of conveyance. The plea makes it necessary to determine whether this deed contains a covenant of either sort. It is insisted that the recital that the title was in the plaintiff, as evidenced by a certain deed, amounts to a covenant of title, though informally expressed. A covenant requires no special form, but, if it is clearly the intention of the grantor to answer for the truth of a statement in the instrument, this will constitute a covenant on his part. There is authority holding that a recital may have the force of a covenant. 3 Devlin, Deeds, § 888; 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 469; Severn's Case, 1 Leon. 122; Christine v. Whitehill, 16 Serg. & R. 98 (Gibson, Ch. J., dissenting). Possibly this means that, where the deed is informally drawn, without any technical covenants, the court may find an undertaking of some sort in the recital; for when there is an express covenant the recital will not be construed as an additional covenant. Whitehill v. Gotwalt, 8 Penr. & W. 818 (overruling Christine v. Whitehill, supra); Wright v. Shorter, 50 Ga. 72. At any rate that a recital may ever attain the dignity of a covenant is controverted by high authority. "Owing to a misapprehension of one or two old cases, the dangerous doctrine has been more than once broached that covenants for title may be implied from a recital; but this has since been distinctly and decisively repudiated." Rawle, Covenants, § 280. And see Ferguson v. Dent, 8 Mo. 667, holding that a recital in the description of the premises is not a covenant; Delmer v. McCabe, 14 Ir. C. L. Rep. 877, holding that a recital of seisin, when modified and explained by other parts of the instrument, does not amount to a covenant. The true rule is to view the recital in the light cast on it by the rest of the deed, and give effect to the intention as a consistent whole. Platt, Covenants, 83; Severn's Case, supra; 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 469; Code, § 2697. Now, if this recital, standing alone, were equivalent to a general warranty of title, it would be restrained and reduced by the express limited covenant; otherwise the latter, which is set out with much technicality and verbosity, would be nullified and destroyed by the recital, which is mere inducement, and not fairly interpretable as a substantive covenant. Such a construction would override the plain intention to covenant specially. Where a conveyance contains both a general and a special covenant touching the same subject, which are inconsistent, the general will not enlarge the special covenant, but will be thereby restricted. Rawle, Covenants, § 287 et seq.; 2 Sugd. Vend. 605 et seq.; Bricker v. Bricker, 11 Ohio St. 240. The order in which the conflicting covenants occur does not seem to be material at the present day, because the intent is gathered from the whole instrument. Rawle, Covenants, § 286, and note. It would seem to be more especially just to let the special covenant prevail where, as in this case, the general covenant not only stands upon implication, but is of questionable existence, while the special covenant is expressed with great fullness and regard to technicality. In Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Pennsylvania Coal Co., 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 276, 19 L. ed. 849, the action was brought upon a covenant claimed to exist in the recitals of the instrument which contained technical covenants, the claim being rested on the fairness and equity of that construction. (See argument for the canal company.) The decision set out in the headnote was as follows: "In the case of a contract drawn technically in form, and with obvious attention to details, a covenant cannot be implied, in the absence of language tending to a conclusion that the covenant sought to be set up was intended. The fact that the non-implication of it makes the contract, in consequence of events happening subsequently to its being made, quite unilateral in its advantages, is not a sufficient ground to imply a covenant which would tend to balance advantages thus preponderating." Furthermore, if the conveyance is only of the grantors' right, title, and interest in the land, the scope of it is not enlarged by a general covenant, but such covenant must be limited to fit the subject conveyed. 1 Warvelle, Vend. & P. 421, § 8; Allen v. Holton, 20 Pick. 458; Sweet v. Brown, 12 Met. 175; McNear v. McComber, 18 Iowa, 12; Gee v. Moore, 14 Cal. 472; Kimball v. Semple, 25 Cal. 440; Bates v. Foster, 59 Me. 167, 8 Am. Rep. 406; Gibson v. Chouteau, 89 Mo. 536; Young v. Clippinger, 14 Kan. 148; Stockwell v. Couillard, 129 Mass. 281.

Is any covenant implied in these words: "Said parties of the first part . . . do grant, bargain, sell, remise, convey, release, and forever quitclaim unto said parties of the second part, in their full possession and seisin. . . . the following lots of land, and all the estate, right, title, etc., of said parties of the first part," etc.? At common law, certain words of conveyance imported covenants of title; and, so strong was the implication, it was in some cases held that an express limited covenant could not repel it. It seems now generally agreed that, in conveyances of freehold, only one word, "do," or "dedi,"—"I give," or "have given,"—had such potent effect. Rawle, Covenants, § 270; Frost v. Raymond, 2 Cal. 188. The word "grant" did not imply a covenant. Platt, Covenants, 47, 48. Nor did "grant, bargain, and sell." Ricketts v. Dickens, 5 N. C. 848, 4 Am. Dec. 555; Frost v. Raymond, supra. And it has been held that, in a conveyance merely of the grantor's rights in the land, even the terrible word "dedi" would not raise a warranty. Deakins v. Hollis, 7 Gill & J. 311. Also it is said that, in a deed of "grant, bargain, and sell," an express covenant takes away all implied covenants. Vanderkarr v. Vanderkarr, 11 Johns. 123. When conveyances came to be made under the Statute of Uses, the courts did not raise covenants by implication. The deed of bargain and sale came into use under this statute, and, it being the deed commonly employed in the United States, as a general rule, in the absence of statute, there are no implied covenants with us. Tiedeman Real Prop. § 859; 8 Washb. Real Prop. p. *671 Walker, Am. Law, 9th ed. p. 454; Allen v. Sayward, 5 Me. 227, 17 Am. Dec. 221. In some of the states, by express statute, the words "grant, bargain, and sell" import certain covenants. 4 Kent, Com. 478, 474; Rawle, Covenants, § 285 et seq.; Martindale, Conv. § 173. But where there is also an express covenant it is held that the statutory implied covenant is modified thereby. Weems v. McCaughan, 7 Smedes & M. 422; Shelton v. Pease, 10 Mo. 473. So the statutory covenant will be restrained where the conveyance is of the grantor's interest only. Gibson v. Chouteau, 89 Mo. 536. There is no statutory implication of covenants in Georgia, except as to deeds containing a general warranty. Code, § 2708. In McDonald v. Beall, 55 Ga. 288, it was held that there is no implied warranty in the sale of land. That being a parol sale, and no deed being given, the case does not apply here.

The present deed purports to convey the specific lots and the grantors' right, title, interest, etc., in the same. The first part of the descriptive clause, standing alone, might import an intention to pass title paramount, not merely such title as the grantors had. But it does not stand alone; it is followed by a nearly exhaustive catalogue of words signifying any kind of interest which the grantors might have in the land. All this would be useless surplusage, unless it was intended by the grantors to convey simply such title or interest as they had, without undertaking to pass necessary title paramount. This view is strengthened by observing the words of conveyance which are words of release and quitclaim, (Gibson v. Chouteau, supra; Young v. Clippinger, 14 Kan. 148;) and also by considering the special warranty, which extends solely to title or claim by or through the grantors, (Wright v. Shorter, 56 Ga. 72.) This special warranty would be rendered wholly nugatory by construing the clause in question as an unqualified undertaking to pass title paramount.

The latter part of section 2248 of the Code is not without application here, by analogy at least. It says: "If a less estate is expressly limited, the courts shall not by construction increase such estate into a fee, but, disregarding all technical rules, shall give effect to the intention of the maker of the instrument, as far as the same is lawful, if the same can be gathered from its contents; and, if not in such case the court may hear parol evidence to prove the intention." The court, in trying this case, heard parol evidence from both sides as to the sale of these lands, and it in no wise conflicts with the construction put upon the deed. On the contrary, the defendant who made the purchase admitted in his testimony that he was willing to purchase without a warranty if he could be placed in actual possession of the land. In rebuttal he testified that it was agreed that his firm should take the lands without warranty. All the testimony shows it was plainly understood on both sides that there was to be no warranty. The defendants relied upon certain testimony of McDonough as showing the clause containing the expression "in their full possession and seisin" to be a covenant of possession and seisin. But this expression must be taken as qualified by the immediately accompanying words of conveyance, which contemplate a mere release or quitclaim, and by the subsequent special covenant. Certainly this is not a formal, or even a plain, covenant for possession and seisin to any extent, much less as against all persons whatsoever. It can have effect as against any acts or title by the grantors or persons claiming under them. The testimony referred to is a very feeble support to the construction contended for. The witness said: "If he could be placed in actual possession of the land, he was willing to purchase the property, and waive a covenant of warranty. . . . Possession was to be given to defendants, because in their sawmill business this possession is necessary. It was particularly important that defendants should have exclusive possession, because they had their timber lands lying beyond these, which they wished to reach. . . . The grantors knew that defendants were in the sawmill business, and were fully aware of the use to which defendants expected to put these lots." The witness seems to be speaking of his own state of mind, and not of any agreement of minds. He does not say that the grantors promised or undertook to put defendants in possession. The delinquency here charged consisted in knowing of the use to which the lots were expected to be put, and (it may be inferred) in not making proper provision therefor. The only agreement to which he distinctly swears is this: "It was agreed that his firm would take the lands without warranty." It may be doubted, under authorities presently to be cited, whether this testimony was admissible, because the legal effect or extent of a covenant cannot be varied by parol. But, whether admissible or not, it was not strong enough to establish the construction contended for.

Upon the whole, then, it appears that the deed contains no covenant except the special one above alluded to. Does the loss of either of the two lots come within its terms? It is not disputed that the title to lot 104 was once in A. J. Miller, one of the grantors, and was devested by sheriff's sale, under an execution against A. J. Miller & Son, five years and more before the deed to defendant was made. The sheriff's deed was duly recorded, and this record was constructive notice to the defendants. Their plea is based, not on fraud, misrepresentation, or breach of confidence, but solely on breach of covenant. The loss of this lot does not fall within the latter part of the special covenant, because the title or claim under the sheriff's sale was not set up by any of the grantors, but by a stranger. Nor does it come within the first part of that covenant, because that provides against claims thereafter made by the grantors, or by some person claiming under them. The grantee in the sheriff's deed holds adversely to the defendant in execution, and not under him. The defendants' deed is a quitclaim, purporting to pass only such interest as the grantors had at the time of conveying. It often happens that persons give such deeds who have no title at all; and the lack of title, where no fraud or deception is practiced, is no ground for subjecting such a grantor to damages. As to lot 194, which was lost in the ejectment, Miller testified without contradiction that he "told McDonough that a suit of ejectment was then pending for this lot, and McDonough replied that he (Miller) must defend McDonough & Co." This loss likewise is not within the special covenant, because it was an adversity which the grantors could not prevent, unless they were negligent in defending, which does not appear. Besides, McDonough was notified of the action then pending, and apparently chose to take the risk. His reply that Miller must defend McDonough & Co. hardly makes a promise by Miller to do it. Even if Miller had promised, it would not be allowable, where there is no issue of fraud or the like, to attach a parol promise like this to a deed containing no such undertaking. Anonymous, 2 Ch. Cas. 19; Raymond v. Raymond, 10 Cush. 184; Howe v. Walker, 4 Gray, 818; Earle v. De Witt, 6 Allen, 530; Hunt v. Amidon, 4 Hill, 345, 40 Am. Dec. 283; Coleman v. Hart, 25 Ind. 256; Holley v. Young, 27 Ala. 204. And see Peabody v. Phelps, 9 Cal. 213.

Now, are the defendants entitled to set up as a defense to the notes sued on that they lost the said two lots? This depends upon who took the risk of the title being good. The grantors, both in the negotiations and in their deed, expressly declined that risk; consequently the purchasers assumed it. The law is clear that, where the buyer takes a quitclaim deed,—that is, a deed without any warranty,—the maxim of caveat emptor applies. He is without remedy if the title fails. He cannot recover back the purchase money, either at law or in equity. Dorsey v. Jackman, 1 Serg. & R. 42; Earle v. De Witt, supra; Soper v. Stevens, 14 Me. 133; Bates v. Delavan, 5 Paige, 300, 8 L. ed. 726. And see Com. v. McClanahan, 4 Rand. (Va.) 482. Equity will not relieve against payment of the purchase money (1 Fonblanque, Eq. 373, note; Rawle, Covenants, § 821; Barkhamsted v. Case, 5 Conn. 523, 18 Am. Dec. 92, 2 Sugd. Vend. 552;) nor can the purchaser have rescission, (Maney v.

Porter, 3 Humph. 346, 363; Middlekauff v. Barrick, 4 Gill, 290; Butman v. Hussey, 80 Me. 263;) nor can he set up the failure of title in defense to an action for the purchase money, (Buckner v. Street, 15 Fed. Rep. 865; Wright v. Shorter, 56 Ga. 72.) In the case last cited this court held: "When bridge and ferry franchises, purporting on the face of the grant to be exclusive, are conveyed by deed in fee simple, with warranty of title against the vendor and his heirs only, the purchaser, in the absence of any fraud in the vendor, takes the risk of the grant's proving exclusive or not exclusive in its legal operation." In the absence of fraud, misrepresentation, or mistake, the purchaser's redress depends solely on the covenants expressed in the deed. If there are no covenants, or if the loss is not within the covenants, the loss falls upon him, and will not be thrown back on the innocent vendor. To do this would be to import a condition into the contract that the vendor should repay or lose the purchase money on failure of title, though the parties themselves made no such agreement. In such case the vendee buys the vendor's title for better or for worse, and pays his money, not for the land necessarily, but for the vendor's title such as it is. When he gets what he bargains for, he ought to pay. A vendee can protect himself, by requiring the usual covenant of general warranty, or he can waive that protection by accepting a deed with a limited warranty, or one without any warranty at all. Whichever he selects, he ought to abide by his choice. It will frequently happen that a quitclaim deed is obtained for very much less than a warranty deed would cost. To allow a purchaser by quitclaim to set off against the purchase money a failure of title to some of the land would force the vendor to part with such proprietorship as he had in the whole tract for less than he agreed to take.

The foregoing discussion disposes of this litigation upon its substantial merits, and, though various grounds are stated in the motion for a new trial, they are all controlled, as to the result, by what has been said. The court did not err in overruling the motion.

Judgment affirmed.

Lars F. ERICKSON, Recept.,

v.

BROOKINGS COUNTY, Appt.

(.....S. Dak.)

*1. The real estate of E., the owner, was duly assessed for taxes for the year 1885. On the 1st day of October, 1886, E. paid to the treasurer of the county the amount of the taxes thus assessed. Afterwards, on the 5th day of October, 1886, the treasurer wrongfully advertised and sold the real estate of E. for these taxes to B., and issued him a tax certificate. Two years afterwards, there having been no redemption of the land from the sale, the treasurer executed and delivered to B. a tax deed for the land. Afterwards B., for a valuable consideration, conveyed to E. the tax deed, and assigned all his (B's) right, title, and interest to the land and to the recovery of the money he had paid for the land at the tax sale. Held, that under our statute (§ 1629, Comp. Laws) the purchaser at a wrongful, unlawful, or erroneous tax sale is entitled to have his money refunded to him, with interest at 12 per cent per annum from the date of sale, by the county selling the land. Held, further, that this right to have the money refunded is assignable, and when it is duly assigned the assignee has the same right and title to the money as the assignor had himself before the assignment, and, in case the proper officer of the county refuse to refund the money, the assignee can maintain an action for its recovery.

*2. The date of a receipt given for the payment of money is prima facie evidence that the money was paid and the receipt executed on the day it bears date. Yet this presumption is not conclusive, but is easily overcome, so far as relates to the precise date, and the true date may be proved alibis.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Brookings County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover money which plaintiff had been compelled to pay to redeem a certain tax certificate against his property which was alleged to have been illegal for the reason that at the time it was issued there were no taxes standing unpaid against the property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. P. C. Murphy, State's Atty., and George A. Mathews, for appellant:

The sale by the treasurer of respondent's land after the tax had been paid is a tort for which the treasurer and not the county is liable.

It has always been considered that the payment under protest of an illegal tax or demand to any officer armed with a warrant authorizing him to enforce the payment is not voluntary and may be recovered back. Nor is it necessary in order to constitute a compulsory, as distinguished from a voluntary, payment, that the unlawful demand be made by an officer who is prepared to enforce it by process; there may be that kind and degree of necessity or coercion which justifies and virtually requires payment to be made of the illegal demands of a private person who had it in his power to seriously prejudice the property rights of another, and to impose upon the latter the risk of suffering great loss if the demand be not complied with.

This being a cause of action for moneys paid to the use and benefit of appellant, and as respondent has shown himself to be the proper party entitled thereto, there can be no question as to this being an assignable claim.

Bennett, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The allegations of the complaint show that on the 1st day of October, 1886, the plaintiff paid to the treasurer of Brookings county all the taxes which were due and assessed against his real estate for the year 1886; that afterwards the treasurer unlawfully, erroneously, and wrongfully advertised and sold his real estate for such taxes for the sum of $21.91, to one Bowdle, and issued to him a tax certificate. Two years afterwards, there having been no redemption of the land from this sale, the treasurer executed to said Bowdle his deed for the land, and afterwards Bowdle assigned to the plaintiff all his right, title, and interest in and to said premises and to the said money paid by him for the tax-sale certificate. If these allegations are true, (and, for the purpose of determining the questions arising on demurrer to the complaint, we must assume they are,) there were no taxes due from the respondent on the day of the tax sale; and, if none were due, it was wrong to offer for sale the land, to sell it, or to take the money bid at the sale, or to issue a certificate of sale to the alleged purchaser, by the treasurer. This being done, the purchaser, under our statute, is entitled to have his money refunded to him, with interest at 12 per cent per annum from date of sale. Section 1629, Comp. Laws, provides that when by mistake or wrongful act of the treasurer land has been sold on which no tax was due at the time, the county is to save the purchaser harmless by paying him the amount of the principal and interest at the rate of 12 per cent from date of sale. But the question now arises, Is this right of the purchaser at the tax sale to be thus reimbursed a personal right, or can it be transferred to another by assignment? Upon the determination of this question depends the liability of the county to the respondent in this action. Section 2876, Comp. Laws, says a thing in action is a right to recover money or other personal property by a judicial proceeding. Section 2877 says a thing in action, arising out of the violation of a right of property, or out of an obligation, may be transferred by the owner. There can be no doubt but that Bowdle, the original purchaser at the wrongful tax sale, had the right to recover back the money he paid at said sale by a judicial proceeding, if its payment had been refused by the proper officer of the county who should have refunded it to him. If this is true, Bowdle had, under the provisions of the section above quoted, a "thing in action." Mr. Pomeroy, in his valuable work on Remedies and Remedial Rights, after discussing at length the assignability of things in action, in sections 144-147, says: "It is fully established by a complete unanimity in the decisions that causes of action which survive and pass to the personal representatives of a decedent as assets, or continue as liabilities against such representatives, are, in general, assignable; while those causes of action which do not thus survive are not assignable." "By the common law," he says, "causes of action arising out of contract, unless the contract, being still executory, was purely personal to the decedent, or unless the injury resulting from its breach consisted entirely of personal suffering, bodily or mental, of the decedent, did thus survive; while causes of action arising out of torts did not, in general, survive. But the statutes in most, if not all, the states have changed this ancient rule, and have greatly enlarged the class of things in action which survive. It is now the general American doctrine that all causes of action arising from torts to property, real or personal, injuries to the estate by which its value is diminished, do survive, and go to the executor or administrator as assets in his hands. As a consequence, such things in action, although based upon a tort, are assignable." The following résumé of authorities will show the universality of the rule, and the reasons upon which it is based: Hoyt v. Thompson, 5 N. Y. 820; Haight v. Hayt, 19 N. Y. 464; Byrnie v. Wood, 24 N. Y. 607; Weire v. Davenport, 11 Iowa, 49, 77 Am. Dec. 132; Tyson v. McGuineas, 25 Wis. 656; Blair v. Hamilton, 48 Ind. 82; Chapman v. Plummer, 36 Wis. 263.

The criterion, therefore, by which to judge of the assignability of things in action is to ascertain whether the demand survives upon the decease of the party or dies with him. If all things in action are separated into two classes by this line of division, those embraced in the first class are assignable, and those which fall into the second are not. In the first class may be put claims arising from the breach of contracts; those arising from torts directly to real or personal property; and frauds, deceptions, and other wrongs by which an estate, real or personal, is injured, diminished, or damaged. In the second class are all torts to the person or character, when the injury and damage are confined to the body or the feelings of the person injured. As a result of these general principles, we think it safe to say that it is fully established that a right of action to recover for the wrongful taking and carrying away or the wrongful conversion of personal property is assignable. Sherman v. Elder, 24 N. Y. 381; Richtmeyer v. Remsen, 38 N. Y. 206; Smith v. Kennett, 18 Mo. 154; Lazard v. Wheeler, 22 Cal. 140; Tyson v. McGuineas, supra. A contract of guaranty may be assigned, (Small v. Sloan, 1 Bosw. 352;) the right to trade-mark, (Lockwood v. Bostwick, 2 Daly, 521;) a widow's right to dower, (Strong v. Clem, 12 Ind. 37, 74 Am. Dec. 200;) the claim of a rightful officer against an intruder for the fees of the office received by the latter during the period of his occupancy, (Platt v. Stout, 14 Abb. Pr. 178;) a sheriff's demand against an attorney for his fees in executing process, (Birkbeck v. Stafford, Id. 285). An assignment of demand in expectancy is valid in equity as an agreement, and becomes an absolute transfer as soon as the demands arise and come into existence in favor of the assignor. Field v. New York, 6 N. Y. 179, 57 Am. Dec. 435; Bliss v. Lawrence, 53 N. Y. 442, 17 Am. Rep. 273. In California, under a statute verbatim like the above, the following rights of action arising out of contracts have been declared assignable: Breach of an agreement to pay money, (Gray v. Garrison, 9 Cal. 325;) of a contract not to run boats on a certain line of travel, (California Steam Nav. Co. v. Wright, 6 Cal. 258, 65 Am. Dec. 511;) of a contract to pay for street work, (Cochran v. Collins, 29 Cal. 129). In the case at bar, Bowdle having a thing in action,—that is, the right to a recovery of the money back from the county which he had paid for the wrongful sale of plaintiff's lands for taxes, it being a claim which would survive to his personal representatives had he died before it was enforced, and not relating to his person or character, or confined to his body or mental feeling,—under the rule as above stated it was assignable, and his assignee had the same right and title to it as he had himself. By his assignment he had precluded himself from ever asserting any right to the money from the county, but it was transferred to his assignee. The complaint averring the assignment to the plaintiff, if the county was liable to refund to the original purchaser, it is liable to plaintiff.

It is also contended that the complaint is defective, because it does not aver payment of the original tax by the respondent prior to the sale. This contention is based upon the ground that the receipt attached to the complaint as an exhibit was dated October 9, 1888,—five days after the alleged wrongful sale of the land,—and that, if there is a variance between the receipt and the complaint, the former must control. This contention is untenable. While the general rule is that a receipt should be prima facie taken to have been made on the day it bears date, and is presumed to have been executed on the day as specified, yet this presumption is not conclusive, but is easily overcome, so far as relates to the precise date; and the true date may be proved aliunde. Fairbanks v. Metcalf, 8 Mass. 230; Harrison v. Phillips Academy, 12 Mass. 456; Treadwell v. Reynolds, 47 Cal. 171; Cook v. Knowles, 38 Mich. 316.

In the last case cited it was held that parol evidence is admissible to show the true date of the delivery of a deed. The allegation of the complaint is "that on the 1st day of October, 1886, William Nichols, by virtue of his said office as treasurer of said county of Brookings, collected from plaintiff, and plaintiff paid to said William Nichols, as treasurer of said county of Brookings, the sum of fifteen dollars and thirty-eight cents, . . . being in full for the real-estate taxes as aforesaid duly assessed and levied against the said real property of plaintiff for the year 1885." It is thus shown that the complaint makes a positive allegation of the payment, the time of payment, and to whom paid; therefore all contentions based upon the receipt as forming a substantial part of the complaint are not well founded, and cannot be considered on demurrer in determining the sufficiency of the pleading. Neither is the contention that this is an action founded upon the idea that the money paid to Bowdle was in the nature of a redemption; therefore the authorities cited in support of that point are not pertinent. The theory of the complaint is that the respondent is the legal assignee of all the right, title, and interest that Bowdle had in the money he paid for the land which had been wrongfully and erroneously sold at the tax sale by the treasurer of Brookings county; and that Bowdle had an assignable interest, and that, as the plaintiff was his legal assignee, he could maintain an action the same as Bowdle could have done. The allegations of the complaint sustaining this theory, when stripped of much superfluous matter which does not affect the substantial averments, we must hold that the complaint is good, and the demurrer properly overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT IN BANC.

Helena BLANK, Appt.,

v.

Francis NOHL, Admr., etc., of Oscar Blank, Deceased, Resp't.

1. An agreement made by a man on the day after obtaining a decree of divorce to pay his former wife a monthly sum during her life if she will not apply for a new trial is against public policy and void as tending to promote and facilitate a divorce.
2. A contract for a valuable consideration not to apply for a new trial, made by one against whom a decree of divorce has been entered after a trial at which she wholly abandoned the position assumed in her pleadings and made no defense, is on its face collusive and a fraud on the law.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the St. Louis Circuit Court in favor of defendant in a proceeding brought to establish a claim against the estate of Oscar Blank, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Edmond A. B. Garesche, for appellant:

The consideration named in the agreement was both a sufficient and a valuable one. The promise of the appellant was valuable to the respondent's intestate in that it saved him the useless annoyance and expense of being represented upon the motion for a new trial. The one promise therefore was a good consideration for the other, unless hers was against public policy.

NOTE.—The above case makes a striking application or extension of the rule that a contract to facilitate a divorce is against public policy.

The waiver of a legal right, as for instance here the right to move for a new trial, is a good consideration.

Given v. Corae, 20 Mo. App. 132.

It is not even necessary that the promise should be of benefit to the promisee.

Williams v. Jensen, 75 Mo. 681.

Where the contract has been performed by the party not originally bound to perform, the other party to the contract will not be heard to urge the impossibility of compelling specific performance as a defense to an action upon the contract, or for a breach thereof.

Where collusion is alleged as a defense it must be proved by him who charges it. It cannot be assumed on mere suspicion, for in the eyes of the law connivance and collusion are so disgraceful that the evidence to establish them must be very clear and strong. And when the question of either collusion or connivance is raised to defeat a contract the agreement of the parties will be presumed to be fair and not unlawful or fraudulent, and the burden is on the party attacking it as fraudulent or illegal to prove by evidence clear and convincing the fraud or illegality.

It is not collusion for a husband to allow his wife alimony during the suit.

Or for the wife to aid in proofs against herself.

Nor is mere friendliness in carrying on a divorce suit, and in even mutual assistance in proving the actual facts, collusion.

Stewart, Mar. & Div. § 308; Hunt v. Hunt, 47 L. J. Mat. 22; Barnes v. Barnes, supra.

And the mere fact of defendant's confession is no proof of collusion.

Stewart, Mar. & Div. § 306.

This agreement does not fall within that class which has been held illegal between the parties to a divorce suit, on the ground of public policy. It was not collusive and having been entered into only after the decree had been rendered, when the divorce therefore was fait accompli, cannot be truthfully said to have facilitated the divorce.

Schmieding v. Doellner, 10 Mo. App. 373, 13 Mo. App. 228; Wilson v. Merrill, 88 Mich. 707; Hunt v. Hunt, supra; Blake v. Blake, 7 Iowa, 50; Jones v. Jones (Colo.) June 30, 1891.

Messrs. Kehr & Tittmann, for respondent:

On its face the agreement is without consideration. As it recites that the divorce had been granted, it follows that the defendant had thereby been absolved from all obligation to the plaintiff, and his promise to pay her an annuity is without a consideration to support it.

Roykin v. Rain, 28 Ala. 332, 65 Am. Dec. 356; Cook v. Bradley, 7 Conn. 57, 18 Am. Dec. 79; Anson, Cont. 2d Am. ed. p. 79; Greendbaum v. Elliott, 60 Mo. 25; Bishop, Cont. § 102.

A motion for a new trial is an application for an order granting a re-trial or re-examination of the cause in the same court. It enables the party making it to point out any error of fact or law, or any accident or omission by which justice was defeated in the trial of the cause. Without it no review is possible of any error of law or fact committed by the trial court.

Thompson, Trials, §§ 2710, 2712; Exchange Nat. Bank v. Allen, 68 Mo. 474; Wetherall v. Harris, 51 Mo. 65; Brady v. Connelly, 52 Mo. 19; Hulett v. Nugent, 71 Mo. 181; State v. Smith, 104 Mo. 419.

It is competent and proper at all times to go back to the facts out of which an agreement arose, and to determine by them the law and the rights of the parties, no matter what disguise may have been resorted to to hide them.

Leake, Cont. pp. 771, 772; Anson, Cont. 2d Am. ed. (Knowlton) 260, and note; Folsom v. Mussey, 8 Me. 400, 23 Am. Dec. 523.

The true and real consideration for the agreement was the withdrawal of opposition to the divorce. It is quite immaterial at what stage of the case the agreement to facilitate the divorce was made. Any agreement pending the suit concerning the alimony made without the knowledge or sanction of the court, or any agreement between the parties to withhold facts or evidence from the court, or to influence its decision by concealment or misrepresentation is void.

Goodwin v. Goodwin, 4 Day, 243; Sellon v. Reed, 5 Bias. 125.

Black, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a proceeding commenced in the St. Louis probate court by Helena Blank against Francis Nohl as administrator of the estate of Oscar Blank, to obtain the allowance of a demand amounting to over $9,000. The demand is founded upon the following contract, signed by Helena Blank and by Oscar Blank, dated the 9th March, 1886: "Helena Blank, Plaintiff, vs. Oscar Blank, Defendant. In the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, No. 52,206. The above cause having been heard by the court upon the pleadings and proofs in the cause, and a decree of divorce granted to defendant and against plaintiff, defendant, Oscar Blank, mindful of the marital relations which have existed between themselves, in consideration that she doth forego making a motion for a new trial, which would be futile in any advantage to her, while productive to him of further annoyance and expense, doth covenant to and with said Helena Blank that on the first day of every month, beginning with the first day of the month of April now next ensuing, he will pay to her the sum of seventy-five dollars, and a like sum of seventy-five dollars on the first day of every month thereafter, so long as she, the said Helena, shall live, and whether she, the said Helena, remain married or unmarried. And it is agreed between the parties that, inasmuch as the same is intended to be for her maintenance and support, the amount so to be paid to her shall never be subject to the demands of any of her creditors, nor shall it ever be anticipated by her assignment, and payable to her only upon her individual receipt; nor can it at any time or under any circumstances be compounded or commuted for a fixed sum, as other annuities are, though by mutual concurrence of said Helena and of said Oscar Blank, his heirs, executors, or administrators, for a valuable consideration, it may be released." The agreement goes on to provide that Oscar Blank shall pay the costs of the suit, but no attorneys' fees beyond what he had paid; that he will turn over to Helena Blank one bond of the value of $1,000; and it is then further provided "that the said Oscar will deliver to her, her letters during 1879, by her written to F. L. Schmidt, and the translations thereof, read at the trial in the above-entitled cause, which letters he about a month ago obtained of said Schmidt; that while he may retain them until, by the expiration of the term, said Helena cannot, by a motion for new trial, avoid the advantage he thus gained over her, yet that upon the execution of these presents these letters, sixteen in number, and their translations as so read in court, and her photograph, as shown in court at the trial in explanation of one of these letters, shall be inclosed in suitable envelopes or coverings, sealed with a seal, to be left in the possession of ———, her attorney, while the papers themselves shall remain in possession of ———, attorney of said Oscar, but as escrows, to insure their delivery on the first day of the next ensuing April term of said circuit court to said Helena, provided she have complied with her part of this contract; the letters and papers so mentioned to be so inclosed and sealed to insure that no publicity of their contents be had. In consideration whereof the said Helena covenants to and with said Oscar that she will forego her right to move for a new trial in the above-entitled cause." Dr. Oscar Blank made the payments specified in the contract from the date thereof down to his death in June, 1887; and the defendant, as administrator of his estate, continued to pay the plaintiff the $75 per month for about one year thereafter. The probate court rejected the demand, and so did the circuit court, and she sued out this appeal.

The divorce suit of Helena Blank against Oscar Blank, mentioned in the foregoing agreement, was commenced in 1879. She alleged in her petition that the defendant had assaulted her, that he had threatened to kill her; that he had charged her with infidelity; and that he had been guilty of various other indignities. The defendant filed answer and cross-bill. In the cross-bill he charged her with repeated acts of adultery with F. L. Schmidt. The parties prepared for trial on these pleadings, by each causing some ten or eleven witnesses to be subpoenaed for the 4th March, 1880, the day on which the cause was set down for trial. Instead of going to trial on that day, leave was granted to defendant to withdraw his answer and cross-bill from the files, and amend the same, and the like leave was granted to the plaintiff to withdraw her reply. On the next day the defendant filed an amended answer and cross-bill, and the plaintiff at the same time filed a reply thereto. This amended cross-bill, instead of charging the plaintiff with adultery, alleged that she had neglected the society of the defendant for that of Schmidt, and had permitted the latter undue familiarities. On the 8th of the same month the court heard the case, and awarded the defendant a decree of divorce. The above contract was executed on the following day, the 9th March, 1880. There had been a previous divorce suit between these parties, on hearing of which the court dismissed the bill and cross-bill.

On the trial of the present case in the circuit court, the defendant administrator called to the witness stand the attorney who represented Oscar Blank in the divorce suit mentioned in the contract. This witness says: "I conferred with the attorney for the plaintiff in the divorce suit, upon the subject incorporated in the agreement, before the hearing of that suit. The defendant had obtained certain letters which were very damaging, and I was satisfied that I could prove they were written by Mrs. Blank. I said to the attorney for the plaintiff: 'There is no show for you in this case. You might as well let judgment go. Dr. Blank has no unkind feeling towards his wife, and he is willing to settle on her $75 per month.' The attorney for plaintiff rejected the proposition, and the letters were returned to me, and we went to trial. The proposition was, if no fight was made, he would settle on her $75 per month after the divorce, but the proposition was rejected. The arrangement about $75 per month had been mooted and bruited for quite a while. When this agreement was entered into the divorce was an accomplished fact. The agreement is a very sincere and truthful expression of the facts, as I understood them." As to the trial of the divorce case this witness says: "There were two witnesses called,—one to prove the signatures to the letters; and the other, an expert, to prove the translations. The letters were in German, and are the letters alluded to in the agreement. I have no recollection as to whether we had any other oral testimony. I don't remember of any other testimony but those letters and the formal proof. My impression is very clear that Mrs. Blank was present at the trial. She may have been away. Question. She called no witnesses on the 8th? Answer. I have no recollection of her calling any; there may have been, but I have no recollection. This witness says there was no agreement to suppress any evidence. The letters were passed to the judge to read and act upon."

Back of the question whether the contract can be valued so as to allow the plaintiff a sum in gross in full discharge of it, is the more important one, whether the agreement can be enforced at all, so far as it remains unexecuted. In other words, the question is whether the agreement violates a sound public policy. Marriage is more than a mere civil contract. It is a matter of state concern; and, when the marital relation is once created, it cannot be dissolved by any agreement of the parties. It can be dissolved, and dissolved only, in the manner and for the causes allowed by law. Courts sitting in divorce cases are bound to protect the public interests as well as the rights of the parties themselves; and hence it is that, before a party is entitled to a divorce, it must be made to appear by proof that he or she is the innocent and injured party; and this, too, though there is a default on the part of the other party. For like reasons, the law is well settled that an agreement having for its object and consideration the granting of a divorce is illegal and void. Says Bishop: "But the law does not favor divorce, and permits it only in approved cases, and on sentence from duly established authority. Therefore any agreement for divorce, or any collateral bargain promotive of it, is unlawful and void." 2 Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 696, ed. 1881. The defendant in a divorce suit is not bound to make a defense, and mutual assistance in proving the actual facts does not amount to collusion. Stewart, Mar. & Div. §§ 802, 308. But a bargain that there shall be no defense is collusion, and any promise founded on such an undertaking cannot be enforced. 2 Bishop, Mar. & Div. 6th ed. § 259. The case of Barnes v. Barnes, 1 L. R. Prob. & Div. 505, furnishes an illustration of what are and what are not collusive contracts. It is there said, in substance, that the mere fact that the husband gave the wife money for her support, both before and after he instituted the divorce suit, did not prove collusion; but furnishing the support in consideration that the wife would keep quiet, so that he could get a decree cheaper than he otherwise would get it, was collusion. Says Bishop: "It makes no difference how just the cause may be, if the parties collude in the management of the case before the court, this is collusion. It is also collusion where material facts are suppressed, though they would not have changed the result." 2 Bishop, Mar. & Div. 6th ed. § 28. The authorities are numerous to the effect that any agreement that the defendant in a divorce suit will not make a defense, or having for its object the dissolution of a marriage contract, or designed to promote and facilitate a divorce, is void, because opposed to the policy of the law; and any promise founded on such an agreement is also void, and should not be enforced. Sayles v. Sayles, 21 N. H. 819; Cross v. Cross, 53 N. H. 373; Vier v. Bertrand, 14 Ark. 267; Stoutenburg v. Lybrand, 13 Ohio St. 228; Kilborn v. Field, 78 Pa. 194; Adams v. Adams, 25 Minn. 72; Muckenburg v. Holler, 29 Ind. 189; Phillips v. Thorn, 10 Or. 494.

The defendant in the divorce suit made a proposition to the plaintiff to the effect that if she would let judgment go in his favor he would settle upon her $75 per month. Thereupon the pleadings were amended, and the witnesses discharged, and in four days thereafter the case was submitted on the letters, and the defendant obtained a divorce decree. On the next day the contract now in question was executed. On this evidence the conclusion would be irresistible that this written contract simply voiced a previous arrangement. On such a state of facts, there can be no doubt but the contract should be held to be illegal and void. But the administrator produced evidence to the effect that the proposition made by the defendant was rejected, and that there was no agreement or understanding between the parties at or prior to the date of the decree. On this state of facts it is earnestly insisted that the agreement sued upon was not one made to promote or facilitate a divorce, and this for the reason that it was entered into after the divorce had been granted,—after the divorce was an accomplished fact.

The error in this argument lies in the fact that the divorce was not then an accomplished fact. The law gave the plaintiff the right to file a motion to set aside the decree and for a new trial at any time within four days. Such a motion is a regular step in the proceeding. By it she could have pointed out any suppression of evidence or impositions upon the court, as well as errors of law and fact. By this agreement she undertakes to make no motion for new trial. It is in its entire scope and effect an undertaking to abandon all opposition to the decree, which was then still open to review by the trial court. The agreement is also careful to carry the case over the term, when the court would have no power to set the judgment aside of its own motion. Such an agreement is just as vicious as one to make no defense at all. There is in principle no difference between an agreement to make no defense and one to abandon all opposition, while a motion to set aside the decree and for new trial can yet be made, heard, and sustained. We have found no case which will uphold such a contract as the one under consideration. It is, on its face, a collusive contract and a fraud on the law. The plaintiff in her verified petition charged the defendant with acts which, if true, entitled her to a decree, with alimony, unless she was also in fault. The defendant in his verified cross-bill charged her with acts which, if true, entitled him to a decree, unless he was in fault. The plaintiff produced no evidence in support of the charges made by her. This is sufficiently shown by the evidence in the present case and the undisputed circumstances. The cause was submitted on the letters written by plaintiff, and a decree entered for defendant. The case presented by the pleadings was one calling for close consideration by the court at the hearing and on a motion to set aside the decree and for a new trial; yet this agreement seeks to and does cut off all further inquiry and investigation. It was and is an imposition on the court,—a direct effort to defeat the policy of the law. Such agreements cannot be sustained, unless we disregard and set at defiance well-settled rules of law. A defense like this comes with seeming bad grace from the estate of one who has reaped the benefit of the illegal contract, but the objection interposed to the enforcement of the contract is sustained, not out of any consideration for Dr. Blank or his estate, but because the law will not lend its aid to the enforcement of an illegal contract. The law leaves the parties where they have placed themselves.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. The requirement that articles of incorporation shall state "the name and location of such corporation" does not authorize the articles to fix the place of the "principal office."

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover back certain taxes assessed against plaintiff and paid by it to defendant under protest. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Conrad Kren, City Atty., and V. W. Seely, Asst. City Atty., for appellant:

The allegations in the answer that "said plaintiff kept said office in the town of Lake for the sole purpose of evading taxation in the city of Milwaukee, and with intent to defraud the defendant of taxes, etc.," is well and appropriately stated as a good defense, and should be construed as stating that the principal place of defendant's business was in the city of Milwaukee.

Detroit Transp. Co. v. Detroit Assessors, 91 Mich. 882.

Messrs. Van Dyke & Van Dyke, for respondent:

In 1 N. Y. Rev. Stat., 889, § 6, we find identically the same language as is found in the Revised Statutes of Wisconsin of 1849 and 1858, and, as it existed in New York prior to 1849, it is fair to assume that the provisions of the Wisconsin Revised Statutes of 1849 were borrowed from New York.

In that state a corporation owning vessels is taxable in respect thereof only at the place where its principal office is located by its articles of organization.

Orton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The following facts are substantially stated in the complaint: The plaintiff is a corporation of this state, and is conducting the business of owning and employing steam and sail vessels in the general freighting business on the lakes and navigable waters connecting them, and at the times herein mentioned owned a large number of such vessels, and employed them in carrying cargoes of iron ore and other cargoes between points and places on said lakes. In its articles of organization, duly made and filed, it is certified and declared, in accordance with section 1772, Rev. Stat., that the name of said corporation shall be the "Milwaukee Steamship Company." It shall be located in and have its principal office in the town of Lake, in Milwaukee county, but may transact business in and locate such branch office or offices as may be necessary or convenient, and shall be designated by the board of directors at such place or places in any part of the state, or any of the states. At all times herein mentioned the plaintiff had and maintained an office in a building in the town of Lake, in said county, outside the city of Milwaukee, upon which said building was a sign bearing the inscription, "Office of the Milwaukee Steamship Company," at which office in said building the stockholders of the plaintiff held their annual meetings for the election of directors, and also such occasional special meetings as were necessary; and there the directors of said plaintiff held their annual meeting for the election of officers, but no other business of said company was ever transacted at said place. And at all other times said office remained in charge of John Saveland, the plaintiff's assistant secretary, who at all times resided in said building in which said office was located. The manner in which the plaintiff's vessels were employed was as follows: David Vance and Frank L. Vance, copartners under the firm name of David Vance & Co., and engaged in business as fire and marine insurance agents and vessel agents, had an office in the third ward of said city of Milwaukee, in which was conducted the business of said firm of David Vance & Co. The said firm acted as the agents for plaintiff's vessels among others, and as such agents usually chartered them before the opening of navigation in each year for such season, or for a number of consecutive trips. The vessels so chartered have been principally employed in carrying iron ore from Escanaba and Ashland to Lake Erie ports, with occasional return cargoes of coal. The masters of said vessels attended to the details of the business of the same under their command, collecting freight, paying the usual running expenses, and remitting the balance to the said firm as agents for such vessels. The said firm of David Vance & Co., as agents, kept an account of the moneys so received and such disbursements as they made on account of said vessels, and accounted therefor to the plaintiff annually, or as required. At all said times said David Vance was president, and said Frank L. Vance was secretary, of the plaintiff company, and David Vance & Co. were the plaintiff's agents; and the secretary kept an account of the net earnings of the vessels and of the dividends made and paid from time to time. At all said times the plaintiff employed no clerks, bookkeepers, or office help, and did not have or occupy any office in the city of Milwaukee, and did not in any manner contribute to the payment of the rent of said office. In the year 1890 all the vessels owned by the plaintiff, and employed as aforesaid, were assessed for the purpose of taxation in said town of Lake, on the 17th day of December, 1890; and the plaintiff duly paid to the town treasurer of said town all the state, county, school, and town taxes levied pursuant to the assessment aforesaid in that year. In said year 1890 the assessor of the third ward of the city of Milwaukee also listed said vessels for assessment for the purpose of taxation in said third ward, and the said vessels were assessed in said ward, and the city tax hereinafter mentioned levied against the plaintiff thereon, notwithstanding ing the plaintiff duly protested against the same before the assessor and board of review. On the 31st day of March, 1891, the chief of police of the city of Milwaukee, having the warrant authorizing him to collect the delinquent city taxes, demanded the payment of said tax so levied against the plaintiff in respect to said vessels, and, the plaintiff refusing to pay the same, said officer levied upon property of the plaintiff to satisfy the same, whereupon the plaintiff, under coercion of said levy, to save its property, and under protest, paid the city taxes and charges in the sum of $798.37; and said sum has been covered into the treasury of said city. Judgment against the defendant is prayed for the sum of 798.24 and interest, besides costs. The defendant, by answer, either admits or alleges ignorance of the main facts set forth in the complaint, and avers on information and belief that at all the times mentioned in the complaint the plaintiff had kept and maintained an office in the third ward of the city of Milwaukee, at which said office the plaintiff kept its officers and clerks, all of its general and principal books of account, and its stock book; and there its officers transacted all of its business, except as hereinbefore admitted, and, save the annual election of directors and officers and special meetings of stockholders, no other business was done or transacted by the plaintiff at its said office in the town of Lake; and at all times, save at the times of said elections and meetings, said office in the town of Lake remained closed, and that no books of account, or any stock book was ever kept in or taken to said office. It will be seen that in respect to these two offices of the company the answer does not much enlarge the averments of the complaint. The complaint states that no business was done in the office in the town of Lake except the annual and special meetings of the stockholders for the election of directors, and the annual meeting of the directors to elect officers; "and no other business of said company was ever transacted at that place."

The office in the third ward of the city of Milwaukee was kept by David Vance, the president, and Frank L. Vance, the secretary, of the company; and they were also vessel agents, and acted for plaintiff's vessels, and chartered them each year, or for consecutive trips. The captains of the vessels remitted to them there the balances after paying the running expenses. The secretary of the company kept there an account of the net earnings of the vessels and the dividends made and paid from time to time. David Vance & Co. were the plaintiff's agents at all times at that office, and kept an account there of the moneys received and the disbursements made on account of said vessels, and accounted to the plaintiff annually therefor. It is a fair inference from the complaint that all the business and financial affairs of the company were transacted, and accounts thereof kept, and everything done by the company that required an office, except the said election meetings, was done at said office in the third ward of the city. The answer states that the plaintiff kept its offices and clerks, all of its general and principal books of account, and its stock book, and transacted all the business of the company at the third ward office, except only such election meetings; and that at all other times the office in the town of Lake remained closed. There is but little, if any, difference between the complaint and answer as to what was done at these two offices. The plaintiff moved to strike the answer from the files, on the ground of its frivolousness, and the court granted the motion. In present practice this is the same in effect as sustaining the demurrer on the ground that the answer does not state a defense to the action. The court entered an order not only granting the motion, but for judgment in favor of the plaintiff on the pleadings, without leave to answer over, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff.

We shall treat the order as in effect sustaining the demurrer to the answer. The only question presented is, Was "the principal office or place of business" of this corporation in the third ward of the city of Milwaukee, where its property was assessed for the purpose of taxation? If so, that shall be held to be its residence for such purpose. Rev. Stat. §§ 1040, 1041. In view of the contention of the learned counsel of the respondent that its "principal office" is fixed by law in the town of Lake, it must be observed that the Statute (Rev. Stat. § 1772) provides that the corporation, in its articles of incorporation, shall state "the name and location of such corporation." The articles of this company go further, and state also "that its principal office shall be in the town of Lake, or it shall have its principal office" at that place. This is unauthorized by the statute, and of course of no effect. Its "location," whatever that may mean, may or may not have been properly stated, but as to the place of its principal office the articles are simply void. As a legal conclusion from the facts stated in the complaint and answer there would seem to be no doubt that the principal office or place of business of the plaintiff company, when its property was assessed, was in the third ward of the city of Milwaukee. That was the office of its president and secretary and vessel agent. There the accounts were kept of all the business of the company, the net earnings were returned to that office, and the dividends were there made and paid, and the vessels chartered. There the receipts and disbursements of all moneys were made, and the account thereof kept. All the account and stock books were kept there. In short, all the business, financial or otherwise, of the company was done there. The election of directors and officers was held at that house in the town of Lake, and at all other times, as an office for any purpose, it was closed. It could scarcely be seriously contended that the "principal office or place of business of the company" was in the town of Lake, or was not in the third ward of Milwaukee. The recent case of Detroit Transp. Co. v. Detroit Assessors, 91 Mich. 382, is strongly in point with this case.

In that case the property assessed was vessel property in the business of transportation on the lakes. In the articles of association it was stated "that the office for the transaction of the business of said corporation shall be in the township of Hamtramck, in the county of Wayne, and state of Michigan." The office in said township was at the residence of one Vorhees, a short distance out of the city of Detroit, and on one end of the stoop there was a small tin sign with the corporate name on it. No business was ever done there except the election of directors and officers, as in this case. After the enlargement of the corporate limits of Detroit, so as to include the residence of Vorhees, the company amended its articles and moved its sign and office to the house of one David Whitney in said township; but nothing else was ever done there by the company except such elections may have been held there. All the officers and agents of the company resided and did business in the city of Detroit; and the books of the company were kept there, and it receives and pays out money there, and the general manager of the company has his office there. The Michigan statute provides that "all corporate property shall be assessed to the corporation as to a natural person in the name of the corporation. The place where its principal office in this state is situated shall be deemed its residence." That statute does not differ essentially from our own. The court held that the principal office of the company was in the city of Detroit for the purpose of assessment of its property. In that case all the authorities cited by the plaintiff's counsel are reviewed and held inapplicable, except Union S. B. Co. v. Buffalo, 82 N. Y. 351, and Pelton v. Northern Transp. Co. 37 Ohio St. 450. In Western Transp. Co. v. Scheu, 19 N. Y. 408, and Onwego Starch Factory v. Dolloway, 21 N. Y. 449, cited in respondent's brief, it was held that the articles of association fixing "the principal office or place for transacting the financial concerns of the company" were according to the statute, and therefore conclusive. And so it may be said of the two above-excepted cases also. In the first of said cases the language in the articles of association is slightly different from the statute, but the court held that it was not materially different, and therefore conclusive. In the last of said excepted cases the articles were authorized by the statute, and held conclusive of the question of the residence of the company for the purpose of taxation. If the articles of association of this company had stated that its "principal office or place of business" was at said house in the town of Lake, and the statute had provided that the articles should contain the principal office or place of business of the corporation, I am not prepared to intimate that it would be conclusive of the question, notwithstanding the above authorities. It would seem to give to a corporation the power to fix conclusively the place of its principal office or place of business falsely, to evade taxation in the place where its principal office or place of business actually and really is, when no other taxpayer has such a right or power. The rule of taxation must be uniform in this state. But the question is not before us in this case, for our statute does not authorize the articles to contain the "principal office" of the company, but only its "location." That word is not the same in language or meaning as the words "principal office or place of business." If required to say what the word "location" here means, I would say it probably means that its name shall be localized, as in this case the "Steamship Company" is made wrongly, by its location, the "Milwaukee Steamship Company." By its location it is not a Milwaukee company, and perhaps ought to be called, according to its articles, "Town of Lake Steamship Company." The words of the statute, or their obvious equivalents, should be used in the articles, to have the effect to determine the place where the corporation is to be assessed on its property by force of the articles themselves against the real facts. There is nothing in this case to break the force of the overwhelming evidence that the principal office and place of business of this corporation was within the third ward of the city of Milwaukee. The company was rightfully and properly assessed at that place on its property, and liable to pay the taxes thereon as there assessed. The motion should have been denied, or the demurrer overruled.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial therein.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Kandiyohi County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for alleged false imprisonment. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Clarence H. Childs, for appellant:

In general a party procuring an arrest under a void writ is liable to an action for false imprisonment.

Gold v. Bissell, 1 Wend. 210; Bonesteel v. Bonesteel, 28 Wis. 245; Chapman v. Dyett, 11 Wend. 31, 25 Am. Dec. 598; Painter v. Ives, 4 Neb. 122; Develling v. Sheldon, 83 Ill. 390; Vredenburg v. Hendricks, 17 Barb. 179; Fellows v. Goodman, 49 Mo. 62; Stensrud v. Delamater, 56 Mich. 144; Johnson v. Von Kettler, 66 Ill. 63; Kerr v. Mount, 28 N. Y. 659.

Ir. Diehl v. Priester, 37 Ohio St. 478, the party procuring the arrest was held liable in an action for false imprisonment for merely making the affidavit upon which arrest was made.

The pleadings do not show that defendant acted in good faith, nor if it had been conceded, would "good faith" be available as a defense to an action of false imprisonment. Judson v. Reardon, 16 Minn. 431.

Mr. Samuel Porter, for respondent:

No private action can be maintained against any person acting in a judicial capacity upon any of his acts, decisions, or omissions, however erroneous such acts, decisions, or omissions may have been, or by whatever motives prompted.

Tates v. Lansing, 5 Johns. 282; Rochester White Lead Co. v. Rochester, 8 N. Y. 463; Stewart v. Hawley, 21 Wend. 552; Weater v. Devendorf, 8 Denio, 117; Harman v. Brotherhood, 1 Denio, 537; Wilson v. New York, 1 Denio, 595; Randall v. Brigham, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 523, 19 L. ed. 285; Bradley v. Fisher, 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 835, 20 L. ed. 646; Brooks v. Mangam, 86 Mich. 576, 24 Am. St. Rep. 137; Stewart v. Cooley, 23 Minn. 347, 28 Am. Rep. 690.

Therefore an action for false imprisonment would not lie against the justice who issued the warrant in the case at bar, however erroneous the issuance of the same may have been.

Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 65, § 142, provides that upon complaint being made to any justice that an offense has been committed, he shall examine the complainant on oath, and if it appears that such offense has been committed, the said justice shall issue his warrant.

A person making a criminal complaint under these circumstances has no control over the justice, and knows or ought to know that the warrant will issue or not as the justice may determine.

Teal v. Fissel, 28 Fed. Rep. 351.

All the proceedings had in the matter of the arrest and imprisonment of the plaintiff after the making of the complaint were judicial in their character and no person was liable for the imprisonment of the plaintiff.

Newman v. Davis, 58 Iowa, 447; McNeely v.

one filing an affidavit for an arrest, is not made liable to an action for false imprisonment because the statute or ordinance under which the proceeding is brought is held unconstitutional or invalid. Wheeler v. Gaires, 5 Ohio C. Ct. Rep. 246.

Where the object in view is the protection or enforcement of a private right, and a warrant is procured where none is authorized, and an arrest made, the individual procuring it, and all others participating, are held liable. Teal v. Tiesel, 28 Fed. Rep. 351.

In Von Latham v. Libby, 38 Barb. 388, the defendants were held liable to an action for false imprisonment because the facts they stated to the justice did not constitute a criminal offense and the latter erroneously held that they did. On appeal judgment was reversed. This case is approved in Teal v. Tiesel, supra, where Butler, J., said that the failure to distinguish between that class of cases where individuals proceed on their own account, for their own private benefit, and public prosecutions for crime, had led to the confusion found in the books. The cases of Maier v. Ashmead, 30 Pa. 34; Curry v. Pringle, 11 Johns. 444; Gold v. Bissell, 1 Wend. 210; Rogers v. Mulliner, 6 Wend. 597, 22 Am. Dec. 546; Vredenburg v. Hendricks, 17 Barb. 179,—were said to belong to this class.

In Collamer v. Elmore, cited in Mosher v. People, 5 Barb. 575, it was held that a warrant of arrest had been issued on an insufficient affidavit; and that an action for false imprisonment might be sustained, even without reversing the proceedings upon certiorari. To the same effect, see Vredenburg v. Hendricks, 17 Barb. 179.

In Wilson v. Robinson, 6 How. Pr. 110, an answer to an action for false imprisonment was held insufficient which alleged that the defendant made a certain complaint to a magistrate averring a particular state of facts, upon affidavit, upon which a warrant was issued.

Emmott, J., commenting on this case in Von Latham v. Libby, 38 Barb. 389, said: "If this case would hold that a party who made a complaint to a magistrate in good faith charging a clearly criminal offense, would be liable for a consequent arrest made by the direction of the magistrate, because the facts stated or proved did not make out the offense, I should hesitate to accept the rule."

In Cohen v. Morgan, 6 Dowl. & R. 8, Morgan had lost a bill of exchange, which he supposed had been stolen. Having stated the facts to a magistrate, a warrant was issued; but he did not use the words, "feloniously stolen, taken and carried away," which appeared in the information. The case turned out no felony, but it was held that no action would lie for maliciously procuring the magistrate to grant his warrant.

Leigh v. Webb, 3 Esp. 165, was a case not prius before Lord Eldon, for malicious prosecution. The plaintiff was a brewer into whose house certain casks belonging to the defendant were sent. These, becoming empty, were transferred to the house of a third person, whereupon the defendant procured a warrant under which the plaintiff was taken into custody. The plaintiff complained that a charge of felony was imposed upon him, but the information contained no charge of felony, but a state of facts not amounting to a felony. The facts had been stated to a magistrate, who, thinking they amounted to a felony, committed the party. The plaintiff was nonsuited.

In Barber v. Rollinson, 1 Crompt. & M. 330, the plaintiff was arrested, at the instance of the de-Driekill, 2 Blackf. 259; Leigh v. Webb, 8 Esp. 166; Wheaton v. Beecher, 49 Mich. 848.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The material allegations of the complaint may be summarized as follows: The defendant made a complaint under oath to a justice of the peace in the village of Wilmar that plaintiff had violated the provisions of an ordinance of that village prohibiting peddling any goods, wares, merchandise or other articles not manufactured or grown within the county of Kandiyohi, without first having obtained a license therefor, and praying that the plaintiff might be arrested and dealt with according to law; that upon this complaint the justice issued a warrant, upon which the plaintiff was arrested and tried, and, upon the testimony of the defendant, adjudged guilty of a violation of the ordinance, that plaintiff was thereupon committed to jail, and there imprisoned until discharged on a writ of habeas corpus, on the ground that the ordinance in question was unconstitutional and void. There is no allegation that the complaint was made maliciously and without probable cause; hence the facts stated do not constitute a cause of action for malicious prosecution. If the complaint states a cause of action at all, it must be for false imprisonment. It is not alleged that defendant participated or took part in plaintiff's arrest, or officiously interfered therewith by giving orders or directions to the officers or otherwise. It is true that in the complaint to the justice he prayed that the plaintiff might be arrested and dealt with according to law, but this is what is done, impliedly at least, in every case where a complaint is made to a magistrate or court charging any person with a violation of public law. The allegation that the plaintiff was convicted on the testimony of the defendant adds nothing to the complaint. By testifying as witness, certainly defendant did nothing that rendered him liable unless he testified falsely, which is not charged. It is alleged that the confinement of plaintiff was "on account and by reason of the procurement and direction of the defendant," but, in the absence of any allegations of specific facts, this must be construed as having reference to the act of making the complaint upon which the warrant was issued. It is also alleged that this confinement was wrongfully, maliciously, and unlawfully procured by defendant, and that said confinement was without probable cause; but this has reference to and is qualified by what immediately follows, to wit, "In this, that said ordinance was and is wholly void and unconstitutional." Hence, after stripping the complaint of all mere verbiage, we have a case where all that it is alleged that defendant did was to lay before the justice the complaint upon which the justice issued the warrant on which the plaintiff was arrested; and the sole ground upon which defendant is claimed to be defendant, on a charge of felony. Being dismissed by the magistrate on a promise to appear, the defendant interposed another charge, on which a similar promise was exacted, the charges, being without foundation, were both dismissed, and Lord Lyndhurst held that the defendant was not liable for false imprisonment.

Where officers having a limited jurisdiction to issue process of a special nature in certain cases have arrested persons by such process in cases not within such authority, both officers and parties obtaining the process have been held liable for false imprisonment. In Curry v. Pringle, 11 Johns. 444, the defendant procured from a justice a warrant instead of a summons, without any oath of the facts which would authorize the issuance of the warrant, and when the plaintiff was not liable to arrest under the statute. Gold v. Bissell, 1 Wend. 210, and Rogers v. Mulliner, 6 Wend. 597, 23 Am. Dec. 546, were cases of a similar nature.

In Maher v. Ashmead, 80 Pa. 844, it was held that trespass was the proper remedy where a person is arrested on a warrant which charges an act not amounting to a crime.

In Ahern v. Collins, 39 Mo. 150, Fogg, J., said: "It makes no difference whether the restraint of the person is caused without process or under color of process wholly illegal. It is trespass against the person, for which the plaintiff is entitled to compensation in damages upon the necessary proof of the facts."

If the court lacks jurisdiction all persons who aid in procuring the illegal arrest will be liable in trespass. Johnson v. Von Kettler, 66 Ill. 63.

had been arrested and fined for disobeying an injunction which was afterward held void. It was held that all aiding in the arrest were guilty of trespass.

In Carratt v. Morley, 1 Q. B. 18, Morley sued Carratt and obtained a judgment in a court which had no jurisdiction over his residence. It was held that the commissioners who signed the warrant and the arresting officer were liable, but Morley was not. Lord Denman said: "A party who merely originates a suit by stating his case to a court of justice is not guilty of trespass, though the proceedings should be erroneous or without jurisdiction."

In West v. Smallwood, 8 Mees. & W. 418, the plaintiff, a builder, ceased work in consequence of a dispute with the defendant, his employer. On complaint of the defendant the plaintiff was arrested under the Master and Servant Act, but the case was dismissed. Suit was brought for false imprisonment, but the plaintiff was nonsuited. The court of exchequer sustained the nonsuit and Lord Abinger, C. B., said: "Where a magistrate has a general jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and a party comes before him and prefers a complaint, upon which the magistrate makes a mistake in thinking it a case within his authority, and grants a warrant which is not justifiable in point of law, the party complaining is not liable as a trespasser, but the only remedy against him is by an action upon the case if he has acted maliciously."

liable is that the ordinance under which the proceedings were instituted was void. There is no doubt of the invalidity of the ordinance as "class legislation," for we have not yet arrived at the point where it is permissible to protect "home industries" under the guise of an exercise of the police power. It is to be observed that the object of this prosecution was not the enforcement of any private right of the defendant. He did not make the complaint on his own account, or for his own private benefit. The complaint was for an alleged violation of public law, in which he represented, not himself, but the public,—an important distinction, which courts have sometimes overlooked, and which counsel for plaintiff seems to have failed to notice in the citation of cases. It seems to be settled by an almost unbroken line of authorities that if a person merely lays a criminal complaint before a magistrate, in a matter over which the magistrate has a general jurisdiction, and the magistrate issues a warrant upon which the person charged is arrested, the party laying the complaint is not liable for an assault and false imprisonment, although the particular case may be one in which the magistrate had no jurisdiction. The law on this subject was as well stated as anywhere by Lord Abinger in West v. Smallwood, 8 Mees. & W. 417, as follows: "Where a magistrate has a general jurisdiction over the subject-matter, and a party comes before him and prefers a complaint, upon which the magistrate makes a mistake in thinking it a case within his authority, and grants a warrant which is not justifiable in point of law, the party complaining is not liable as a trespasser, but the only remedy against him is by an action upon the case if he has acted maliciously." See also Leigh v. Webb, 3 Esp. 165; Carratt v. Morley, 1 Q. B. 18; Murphy v. Walters, 84 Mich. 180; Von Latham v. Libby, 38 Barb. 389; Barker v. Sletson, 7 Gray, 63, 66 Am. Dec. 457; Langford v. Boston & A. R. Co. 144 Mass. 431; Teal v. Fissel, 28 Fed. Rep. 351. This rule has been frequently applied where the facts stated in the complaint did not constitute a public offense, and it can make no difference in principle whether this is because the facts stated do not bring the case within a valid statute, or because the statute under which the proceedings were instituted is invalid. In either case, the acts charged constitute no offense, because there is no law making them such. Barker v. Sletson, supra, was a case of the latter class. The present case comes fully within the rule. The justice had a general jurisdiction over the subject-matter, to wit, prosecutions for the violations of village ordinances. The defendant merely stated the case to the magistrate in a complaint, without, so far as appears, bad faith or malice. The magistrate erred in thinking that the ordinance was valid, and that it was therefore a case within his authority, and issued a warrant which was not justifiable in point of law, and the plaintiff was arrested. Under such a state of facts the complainant is not liable. Under any other doctrine a person would never feel safe in making complaint of the commission of a public offense until the validity of the statute creating the offense

H. G. NORMAN, Resp.

(.....Minn.....)

*1. A tender by a debtor to a creditor (who in good faith asserts that the amount tendered is insufficient) is not good as a tender if it be coupled with such conditions that the acceptance of the same will involve an admission by the creditor that no more is due.

2. In such a case a tender by the maker to the payee of promissory notes, (the same being mature, and still held by the payee,) coupled with a demand for the surrender of the notes,—Held, not effectual as a tender, so as to discharge a chattel mortgage securing the notes.

3. A direction by the maker of the notes, to one acting as his agent, to apply money in his hands to the payment of the notes, which notes such agent then held as the agent for the payee, does not, of itself, constitute or have the effect of such an application of the money.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Jackson County refusing a new trial after verdict in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain personal property which plaintiff claimed under a chattel mortgage. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. J. Knox, for appellant:

To constitute a sufficient tender, it must be unconditional.

Where there is a dispute as to the amount that is due, the debtor cannot rightfully demand his note or evidence of debt.

Bowen v. Owen, 11 Q. B. 180; Halpin v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 118 N. Y. 165; Noyes v. Wyckoff, 114 N. Y. 207.

This court itself, when this case was before it on a former appeal, plainly and explicitly stated what was necessary to constitute a sufficient tender to discharge the lien of a chattel mortgage in cases like the one at bar, and said that it must be absolute and unconditional.

Moore v. Norman, 9 L. R. A. 55, 43 Minn. 428, 19 Am. St. Rep. 247.

Mr. George W. Wilson for respondent.

NOTE.—On the question of the sufficiency of a tender, see, in connection with the authorities cited in the above case, Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Union Mills Plaster Co. 3 L. R. A. 90, 37 Fed. Rep. 286; Bailey v. Buchanan County, 6 L. R. A. 562, 115 N. Y. 207; Moore v. Norman, 9 L. R. A. 55, 43 Minn. 428, 19 Am. St. Rep. 247 (former appeal in main case above); Sanders v. Bryer, 9 L. gaged certain personal property to her. She prosecutes this action to recover possession of a part of the mortgaged property by virtue of her rights as such mortgagee. A former appeal in this action is reported in 43 Minn. 428, 9 L. R. A. 55, 19 Am. St. Rep. 247. The only issue to which reference is now necessary is as to whether certain payments and a tender of payment made by the defendant were sufficient and effectual to discharge the mortgages. The whole transaction on the part of the plaintiff was conducted by one George R. Moore, who was her general agent. Long after the maturity of the notes the defendant made a tender of payment to the plaintiff, which on his part is claimed to have been sufficient in amount, with payments which had been previously made, to complete the payment of the debt, and hence to discharge the mortgages. Moore v. Norman, 43 Minn. 428, 9 L. R. A. 55, 19 Am. St. Rep. 247. The plaintiff, however, then claimed that the amount tendered was not sufficient to pay the debt; and whether it was so or not was one of the issues in this case, in respect to which the plaintiff's contention, that the amount was insufficient, was supported by evidence which would have sustained a verdict in her favor. The evidence tended to show that the tender was accompanied by a demand that the notes be surrendered; that such surrender was refused, a larger sum being claimed to be due; but that the plaintiff (by her agent, who held the notes) offered to receive the money tendered, and indorse it on the notes, which offer the defendant refused to accept. The court, at the request of the defendant, charged the jury to the effect that if the amount tendered was sufficient the defendant had a right to demand the surrender of his notes. This constitutes one of the errors assigned. We think, as applied to the circumstances of this case, this instruction was erroneous. It may be stated as a general proposition, applicable at least where it appears that a larger sum than that tendered is in good faith claimed to be due, that the tender is not effectual as such if it be coupled with such conditions that the acceptance of it, as tendered, will involve an admission by the party accepting it that no more is due. Leake, Cont. 865, 866; Addison, Cont. 9th ed. 153; 2 Chitty, Cont. 1194; Bowen v. Owen, 11 Q. B. 180; Finch v. Miller, 5 C. B. 428; Boans v. Judkins, 4 Campb. 156; Forrd v. Noll, 2 Dowl. N. S. 617; Thayer v. Brackett, 12 Mass. 450; Wood v. Hitchcock, 20 Wend. 47; Noyes v. Wyckoff, 114 N. Y. 204; Holton v. Brown, 18 Vt. 224. See, further, in support of the general rule that a tender, to be effectual, must be absolute and unconditional, Moore v. Norman, 43 Minn. 428, 434, 9 L. R. A. 55, 19 Am. St. Rep. 247; Bank of Benson v. Hove, 45 Minn. 40, 42; Balme v. Wambaugh, 16 Minn. 116 (Gil. 106). The most common and familiar illustrations of the proposition above stated are cases where the tender is made as being all that is due, or as payment in full. It is everywhere held that such a tender is not good. The debtor has no right to the benefit of a tender, as having the effect of a payment, when it is burdened with such a condition that the creditor cannot accept the money without compromising his legal right to recover the further sum which he claims to be due. This case falls within the same principle. By offering to pay the money only upon the condition that the plaintiff deliver up the notes, (if such was the fact), the defendant insisted upon a condition the acceptance of which would at least seriously compromise the right of the plaintiff to recover any more, even though it should be true that the amount unpaid exceeded the sum tendered. The acceptance of the money and the surrender of the notes would be at least strong evidence against her, in the nature of an admission, that the notes were thereby fully paid. The defendant should not be heard to assert that a mere offer to pay a specified sum, less than what was supposed by the other party to be due, has the effect of a payment, so as to discharge the mortgage, when the offer was burdened with such a condition. It was enough for his protection that the plaintiff would have received the money offered and have indorsed its payment on the notes, which were already overdue and still in the hands of the plaintiff. If the defendant rejected this offer, and insisted upon the surrender of the notes, the natural and only reasonable construction to be put upon his conduct was that he insisted that the tender, if accepted, should be accepted as payment of the notes in full. If that was the effect of the tender, it was bad, under all the authorities. A mere tender should not be effectual to discharge the lien of a mortgage unless it be certainly sufficient in amount, and unburdened with any conditions which the debtor has not a clear right to impose. See Moore v. Norman and Bank of Benson v. Hove, supra. A new trial must be granted for the reason above stated.

We will refer to another matter, by way of caution.

While George R. Moore was the general agent of the plaintiff, there was evidence tending to show (although this is a matter of controversy) that on a certain occasion, when some property of the defendant was sold, he acted as an agent of the defendant, and as such agent received the proceeds of the sale. If such was the fact a mere direction by the defendant to him to apply on the plaintiff's notes the money which he (Moore) had received and held as the agent of the defendant would not, in itself, constitute, or be legally equivalent to, such an application of the money. If the defendant's agent disobeyed such instructions, and applied the money to his own use, the plaintiff would not be affected thereby, unless the circumstances were such that it could be considered that in behalf of the plaintiff, as her agent, he consented to apply the money as a payment on her notes. Such consent need not be express. If the defendant engaged Moore to be present at the sale, to receive the proceeds of sales made, and to apply the same on the plaintiff's notes, it might be inferred, in the absence of any dissent by Moore, that he acquiesced in this, and hence that, when he received the money, he received it as the agent of the plaintiff, even though, for some other purposes connected with the sale, he might have acted as the agent of the defendant. Of course, if the money was received by him as her agent, it was as though it had been received by her personally.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

A. N. KING, Appt.,

v.

J. R. BRIGHAM et al., Respts.

(.....Or.....)

1. The jurisdiction in equity to ascertain boundaries under the Act of 1887, although it extends to cases of confused or uncertain boundaries which involve no other ground of equity jurisdiction, does not extend to the question of title to a disputed strip of land lying between the different lines alleged by the parties to be the boundaries.
2. An adjudication as to a boundary line in a suit under the Act of 1887 cannot operate as an estoppel or bar to a subsequent suit based on adverse possession to quiet title to the strip of land between the lines respectively claimed as the boundary.
3. Possession or intrusion upon land by mistake in consequence of confusion or uncertainty as to the true boundary without any intention to claim title beyond one's lawful boundary is not adverse.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in favor of defendants in an action brought to quiet title to certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Killin, Starr & Thomas and J.

C. Moreland, for appellant:

Adverse possession of real property for the statutory period ripens into a perfect title and becomes a vested right as though evidenced by written title.

Parker v. Metzger, 12 Or. 407; Joy v. Stump, 14 Or. 361.

It must be an occupancy under claim of ownership though it need not be under color of title.

Swift v. Mulkey, 14 Or. 59.

There must be disseisin which must be an actual expulsion for the full statutory period. Springer v. Young, 14 Or. 280.

Where a person under a mistake as to the boundaries enters and occupies land not embraced in his title, claiming it as his own for the requisite statutory period, he thereby becomes vested with the title thereto by possession, although the entry and possession may have been founded upon a mistake.

Caulfield v. Clark, 17 Or. 478.

The effect of the former judgment res judicata is not limited or enlarged by the reasons given by the court for its rendition.

Freeman, Judgm. § 249; Houston v. Williams, 18 Cal. 24, 78 Am. Dec. 565; Girardin v. Dean, 49 Tex. 243; Davis v. Millaudon, 17 La. Ann. 97, 87 Am. Dec. 518.

For a judgment to be final the subject matter in controversy must have been brought in question and within the issue in the former proceedings and have terminated in a regular judgment on the merits.

Aspdon v. Nixon, 45 U. S. 4 How. 467, 11 L. ed. 1059.

It is not sufficient that in a prior proceeding the subject-matter was so involved that it might have been litigated. It must have been at issue and in fact litigated and decided.

In all cases where it is sought to apply the estoppel of a judgment rendered upon one cause of action to matters arising in a suit upon a different cause of action, the inquiry must always be as to the point or question actually litigated and determined in the original action, not what might have been thus litigated and determined.

Cromwell v. Sac County, supra. See Freeman, Judgm. § 256.

No judgment or decree is evidence in relation to any matter which came collaterally in question or in matters incidentally cognizable, or to be inferred from the judgment by argument or construction.

Messrs. R. Williams, E. B. Williams, and C. H. Carey, for respondents:

Mr. King's title by possession to one or the other of the two lines in controversy in the former suit was a matter involved in the issues set forth in the pleadings; evidence was directed to this point upon the trial, and was received and considered by the court; and the conclusion of the referee, the circuit court and the supreme court was based upon that issue and that evidence. That question was finally and completely determined and settled, and is now res adjudicata between these parties.

An equitable suit to settle and establish boundaries falls within that class that equity assumes jurisdiction of concurrently with law. And it is an example of those few suits in which equity, in administering relief, awards possession of the land in controversy as a law court would do.

Pom. Eq. Jur. § 180.

Equity jurisdiction embraces consideration of legal questions involved in a settlement of boundaries; the suit in its very nature involves a trial of the right of possession to the line. Unless the contestants can show title to the line they cannot prevail. Such is the inherent nature of the suit as shown by an examination of its history from the beginning.

Story, Eq. Jur. § 616, citing Wake v. Conyers, 1 Eden, 381; 2 Cox, Ch. 360.

In order to sustain a bill for a commission to ascertain boundaries, the plaintiff must establish, by the admission of the defendant, or by the evidence, a clear legal title to some land in the possession of the defendant, and also some ground for equitable relief.

It is proper to consider the claim of adverse possession, and to fix the boundary accordingly.

Plank v. Reinhart, 81 Iowa, 756; Davis v. Curtis, 68 Iowa, 66; Christian v. Weaver, 79 Ga. 406.

The exercise of equitable jurisdiction in boundary cases, where the final relief granted is substantially a recovery or obtaining possession of specific portions of land is a matter of ordinary occurrence in suits for the adjustment of disputed boundaries, where some equitable incident or feature is involved and the dispute is not wholly confined to an assertion of mere conflicting legal titles or possessory rights.

1 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 174, 180, 185; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1878-1885. See Bigelow's note to Story, Eq. Jur. 13th ed. pp. 78-81.

If equity took cognizance of the case at all, it is folly to urge that it should drop the controversy without fully settling the issues.

Granting that the circuit and supreme courts passed upon the question of adverse possession in the King Case, the determination is final, even though erroneous; if the court therein assumed an authority as a court of equity to try an issue which was strictly legal and properly cognizable only by a court of law, still, although it exceeded its jurisdiction as a court of equity in one sense, the question was not coram non judice nor its findings void.

Pom. Eq. Jur. § 129; Cumming v. Brooklyn, 11 Paige, 596, 5 L. ed. 246; Bank of Utica v. Mercereau, 3 Barb. Ch. 574, 5 L. ed. 998, 49 Am. Dec. 189; Amis v. Myers, 57 U. Even if the supreme court were wrong in considering the question of possession, then this is hardly the time or the place to reverse the decision or raise the question.

An adjudication is final and conclusive, not only as to the matter actually determined, but as to every other matter which the parties might have litigated and have decided, as incident to or essentially connected with the subject-matter of the litigation, and every matter coming within the legitimate purview of the original action, both in respect to matters of claim and of defense.

Throughout all the time, until the discovery of his present predicament, his claim of title has been according to the true line, that he intended to place his fence all the way upon that line, supposed he had done so, and did not discover his mistake until since the commencement of this suit. The court in that case held that such facts did not prove title to the strip.

Hale v. Glidden and Dem v. Hunt, supra.

Lord, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit to quiet title to the strip of land lying immediately east of the eastern boundary of the plaintiff's donation land claim as established by this court in the suit of the plaintiff against Brigham et al., and within the contiguous donation land claim of one Lowndale, in the city of Portland. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff has had adverse possession of the premises for ten years last past, and that the defendants wrongfully claim an interest in the same. The answer denies that the plaintiff is or has been in possession of the premises in controversy, and denies that the defendants wrongfully claim an interest or estate therein adverse to the plaintiff, but admits that they claim to own the same in fee simple, adversely to the plaintiff and all others; and for a further and separate answer, the defendants plead, in effect, that the plaintiff ought to be estopped from alleging or claiming that he is the owner or in possession of the real property described in the complaint, or from maintaining the suit, because of a suit brought by the plaintiff and the North Pacific Industrial Association as plaintiffs against these and other defendants to settle the boundary line between the lands owned by the plaintiff and the defendants, and which is the same line as that described as the westerly boundary of the tract mentioned in the complaint, etc., and that in said suit it was determined and decreed that the boundary line between the plaintiff's and defendants' land was a certain described line, (a portion of which is the same line mentioned in the complaint as the western boundary therein described,) etc., and that it was further ordered that the suit be remanded to the court below, with directions to appoint commissioners, as by law provided, to locate and mark out the line as determined by the court, etc.; and for a further and separate answer the defendants allege that they are the owners in fee simple of the tract of land in controversy by a chain of conveyances from the United States and others, and that they are in possession of the same, and the whole thereof; and for another defense the defendants allege the adverse possession of themselves and their predecessors in title for a period of ten years, etc. The reply denies the new matter set forth in the answer. Upon these issues the case was referred to a referee, who, in substance, found that the plaintiff has been in the continuous possession and claimed to be the owner of the property in dispute for a period of more than ten years, and that the defendants, nor either of them, have been in the open and continuous possession of the same for a period of ten years, but that the facts set up in this suit were fully heard and determined in the said suit wherein the plaintiff and the Northern Pacific Industrial Association were plaintiffs and J. R. Brigham and others were defendants, and that the supreme court by its decision and decree established the line between the plaintiff and said defendants' lands in that suit, and that the plaintiff, King, did not own the land in controversy, (19 Or. 560;) and, as a conclusion of law, that the plaintiff is now estopped from claiming the land described in his complaint, and that the suit should be dismissed. Subsequently, upon proper proceedings had and taken, a decree was entered, affirming the report of the referee, and dismissing plaintiff's suit. From this decree the plaintiff has appealed.

The contention for the plaintiff is that the decree rendered in the former suit between these parties is no bar to the present suit to quiet title to the land in controversy. While it is admitted that the defendants set up as a defense in the former suit adverse possession for the statutory period to the land, and that issue was joined, and evidence taken upon it, and reported to the court, nevertheless it is insisted that such matter was outside of the jurisdiction of the court, as it affected title, and, consequently, that no valid decree could be founded on it; and, further, that such matter, as a defense, was not considered by the court, as its decree simply determined the location of the disputed line, and directs the appointment of viewers to locate the same by proper monuments upon the ground. This view is based on the fact that the decree in the former suit merely determined the boundary line between the adjoining lands of the plaintiff and the defendants, reinforced by the assumption that the Act of the Legislature of 1887 giving to courts of equity jurisdiction to try cases where a dispute exists between owners of adjoining lands concerning the boundaries thereof, as construed in Love v. Morrill, 19 Or. 545, limits and confines such jurisdiction to the ascertainment and location of the boundary lines, and cannot be extended to the determination of title. The question raised is important, and involves some consideration in respect to the jurisdiction conferred by the statute that requires further explanation. As cases of disputed boundary lines between the lands of adjacent owner are matters which concern legal estates, and are ordinarily settled in courts of law, there seems to be an impression in the profession that because of the statute conferring jurisdiction upon a court of equity to try all cases where a dispute exists as to the boundary lines of adjoining lands, and requiring each of the parties to designate such boundary line as he shall claim it to be, that such suit involves the recovery of the strip of land embraced between the lines as designated by them, and necessarily that title acquired by adverse possession may be set up by the defendant to establish such boundary line, as so designated and claimed. In the case of Love v. Morrill, supra, referred to, neither the pleadings nor the facts disclosed any dispute as to the boundary line, except that the defendant claimed title by adverse possession to that portion of the land covered by her building, which projected over their boundary line, in consequence of which she claimed that the line should be so located as to include it. As the case was brought under the statute, and presented simply the pure legal question of the title to that portion of the land covered by the building of the defendant, it became important and necessary to ascertain the nature and extent of the jurisdiction conferred; for, if such a suit could be maintained under it, nothing was plainer than that jurisdiction might be exerted to usurp the place of an action at law to recover real property, and thereby deprive the defendant of his constitutional right to trial by jury. With these considerations in view, the court proceeded to construe the statute holding that courts of equity were invested with jurisdiction to try cases where a dispute exists between the owners of adjoining lands concerning the boundary line or lines thereof, without any equitable grounds, or equity superinduced by the act of the parties, to sustain it, but that such jurisdiction could not be extended to determine title to real property, or usurp the place of an action at law to recover real property; that the object of the jurisdiction conferred by the statute was to ascertain the true boundary between the lands of adjacent owners, which had become confused or unknown or lost, the subject-matter of such jurisdiction or the suit being the dispute concerning the boundary line, and not the title, and, as a consequence, that, within the purview of the statute the suit could not be maintained. It is true that disputes in respect to the boundaries of adjacent proprietors of land are ordinarily of legal cognizance, and that the statute on its face seemingly indicates an intention to oust the jurisdiction at law for the trial of such cases; but when the statute declares, in effect, that a suit may be maintained in equity, where a controversy exists between the owners of adjacent lands as to the location of the boundary line, it is not meant that a suit may be maintained when the dispute between them concerning such boundary line involves the determination of title,—as, where each owner, claiming a different line as the true boundary line of the adjacent lands, seeks to recover or establish title to the strip embraced between such lines. The distinction is between cases which are prosecuted with the ostensible object of determining the true boundary line between the parties and those brought to recover lands claimed by the defendant to be embraced within this boundary line as against the line claimed by the plaintiff.

The issuing of commissions to ascertain lost boundaries, or boundaries which from accident or other cause have become confused, uncertain, or obscure, is an ancient branch of equity jurisdiction, the origin of which cannot be ascertained with exactness, and still remains uncertain and conjectural. But the books show there are cases in which the court has granted commissions or directed issues on no other apparent ground than that the boundaries between contiguous lands were in controversy, from the fact of their being confused, or incapable of being distinguished with any certainty. It appears, however, that it is a jurisdiction which has been sparingly exercised, and watched with jealousy, and of late years that has not been favored or exercised unless some equitable circumstances are shown to sustain it. Story, Eq. Jur. § 609 et seq.; Bispham, Eq. 552; Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1884, 1885; Tyler, Boundaries, 259. In Speer v. Crawler, 2 Meriv. 417, the master of rolls criticised the exercise of such jurisdiction without some equitable ground to support it, asking: "On what principle can a court of equity interfere between two independent proprietors, and force one of them to have his rights tried and determined in any other than the ordinary legal mode in which questions of property are tried? In some cases, certainly, the court has granted commissions or directed issues on no other apparent ground than that the boundaries of manors were in controversy. In Wake v. Conyers, 2 Cox, Ch. 860, however, Lord Northington held that it was in the case of manors that the exercise of the jurisdiction 'which had been assumed of late' was peculiarly objectionable. He refused either to grant a commission or to direct an issue. So did Lord Thurlow in the case of two parishes. St. Luke's v. St. Leonard's cited in 2 Anst. 393, 395. In the same case of Wake v. Conyers, Lord Northington says that, in his apprehension, this court has simply no jurisdiction to settle the boundaries even of land, unless some equity is superinduced by the act of the parties. I concur in that opinion, and think that the circumstance of a confusion of boundaries furnishes, per se, no ground for the interposition of the court." And the general rule now adopted is not to entertain jurisdiction, in cases of confusion of boundaries, upon the ground that the boundaries are in controversy, but to require that there should be some equity superinduced by the act of the parties. Story, Eq. Jur. § 615, and note of authorities. From this it is apparent that originally there was no jurisdiction in equity of mere questions of boundary; but there was jurisdiction where there was a confusion of boundaries, only it did not extend to every dispute as to boundary, because in such cases the law generally affords ample remedy. As a consequence, before equity would intervene to fix the boundary between two adjacent estates which had become obscure and controverted, there must be some equitable ground attaching itself to the controversy, such as fraud on the part of the defendant by which a confusion of the boundary has been produced, or there must be some relation between the parties which makes it the duty of one of them to preserve and protect the boundary, or it must be necessary to prevent a multiplicity of suits, or to prevent mischief otherwise irremediable. Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 619-621. Our statute is predicated upon the idea that whenever a controversy exists, arising from a confusion of boundaries between the owners of adjoining lands, it is necessary, in order to put an end to such controversy, that equity should intervene and ascertain the true boundary between such estates. Under this statute, the jurisdiction of equity is extended to a class of cases of disputed boundary, where no equitable circumstance attaches itself to the controversy. Under it, a court of equity may intervene in any case in which title is not involved, where the boundary is confused or obscure, and a controversy exists between the owners of the adjacent lands to ascertain such boundary and fix its location. It is of no consequence, to sustain such jurisdiction, that the confusion of the boundary about which the controversy exists was not occasioned by the fraud or misconduct of the defendant, but was the result of accident or lapse of time, or was produced by natural causes, or the like. It is enough that a controversy exists concerning the boundary, which is uncertain or obscure, and needs to be ascertained and located. In such case either party may bring a suit in equity, in which each may designate the boundary as he claims it; but within the purview of the statute the suit is not brought to affect pre-existing titles, but to establish or restore the true boundary line between the adjacent estates. As Bean, J., said in Lore v. Morrill, supra: "The subject-matter of the suit is the dispute concerning the lines, and not the title; and the court is only authorized to determine these lines, leaving all questions of legal title to be determined in the proper forum, unless there exists some equity independent of the controversy about the lines to give a court of equity jurisdiction to try the question of title." The object of the suit, therefore, is to ascertain the true boundary line between the contiguous estates, and not to try the question of title on either side of the boundary. It follows, then, that the statute does not undertake to transfer to the jurisdiction of equity cases of disputed boundary which involve questions of title, and belong to the common-law jurisdiction. A statute of that kind would be clearly subject to the objection of violating the constitutional right of the defendant to a trial by jury. But the statute does give jurisdiction to try cases of disputed boundary between the owners of adjoining lands arising from other causes than an equity superinduced by the act of the parties. In other words, it has extended the jurisdiction of equity to a class of cases not of late years (although they may have been originally) embraced within that jurisdiction, because there was an adequate remedy at law. Now the equity for the ascertainment of boundary arises, according to the chancery jurisdiction, when the boundaries between the owners of adjoining estates have been confused by the misconduct of the defendant or those under whom he claims. The mere confusion will not create to, for the fact that a man cannot ascertain his property does not constitute an equity against another person. Speer v. Crawler, supra. Hence courts of equity have no jurisdiction to try cases for the ascertainment of boundary, unless some equity is superinduced by the act of the defendant; otherwise they are triable in the ordinary course of law, with the assistance of a jury, within the rule that equity will not interfere where there is an adequate remedy at law.

The important question then arises, in view of the provision of our Constitution which provides that "in all civil cases the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate." (sec. 17, art. 1,) whether the Legislature can confer upon a court of equity jurisdiction to try and determine controversies in respect to disputed boundary between independent proprietors of adjoining estates, where no equity has been superinduced by the act of the defendant, as has been done by the statute without transcending the limits of the Constitution. By an Act of the Legislature of the state of Pennsylvania jurisdiction is conferred upon the supreme court and the court of common pleas, all and singular, "the jurisdiction and powers of a court of chancery in all cases of disputed boundary between adjoining lands," etc. And by a supplement to the Act it is declared "that the jurisdiction and powers given by the Act," etc., "shall extend to and embrace the ascertainment and adjustment of disputed boundaries between adjoining lands," etc., where such boundaries are or shall have become confused or rendered uncertain either by lapse of time, by natural causes, or by the act, neglect, or default of any present or former occupant thereof." It will be noticed that the Act confers jurisdiction to try other cases of disputed boundary than those where the confusion was produced by the misconduct of the defendant. The Constitution of that state provides that "trial by jury shall be as heretofore, and the right thereof remain inviolate." In Norris's App., 64 Pa. 279, no special equity affecting the defendant or other ground of equitable interposition was alleged or pretended, and it was conceded that within the rule of chancery jurisdiction a mere dispute as to the dividing line of two adjoining estates, not held under the same title, where there is no special equity affecting the defendant, would not give jurisdiction; and the court held that the Acts of the Legislature must be confined to cases which are properly the subject of equitable jurisdiction, and, consequently, that the plaintiff must be remanded to his legal remedies, as the case did not come within the jurisdiction of chancery to fix the boundaries of legal estates unless some equity is superinduced by the act of the parties. Sharswood, J., examined the constitutional question at some length, and presented some strong arguments adverse to its constitutionality, but in consideration of the fact that such a construction could be given to the acts as would not conflict with the Constitution, by confining them in their true intentment to cases which are properly the subject of equitable jurisdiction. But it follows from this argument that an Act of the Legislature authorizing a court of equity to ascertain or determine controversies as to boundaries where no equity has been superinduced by the act of the parties would be invalid, as transcending the limits which the Constitution prescribes. In so far as our statute undertakes to confer jurisdiction to try cases in equity of disputed boundary between the owners of legal estates, where no special equity exists to sustain such jurisdiction, it is vulnerable to this objection, unless we construe the statute as only intended to apply to cases which are properly the subject of equitable jurisdiction. This we cannot do without violating the plain intentment of the statute as construed in Lore v. Morrill, supra, and as accepted and applied to other cases. Other states have passed statutes providing for special tribunals, or conferring jurisdiction upon courts of equity, to ascertain or fix the boundary line between the owners of adjoining lands, or the boundary line between adjoining towns. Tyler, Boundaries, 244, 256. The Connecticut statute is based upon a proceeding in equity brought in the superior court to ascertain and fix lost or uncertain boundaries, and extends such jurisdiction to many cases which it would not embrace without the statute; and in construing such statutes it was held that the jurisdiction conferred upon the court in respect to ascertaining such boundaries was not dependent on a want of an adequate remedy at law. Gen. Stat. Conn. p. 543, § 83; Perry v. Pratt, 81 Conn. 434. This is contrary to the rule that, unless there is some special equity to sustain such jurisdiction, the remedy at law must prevail, and renders the statute equally vulnerable to the constitutional objection of depriving the defendant of the right of trial by jury, unless the opinion expressed by the court that "the issuing of commissions to ascertain boundaries is a very ancient branch of equity jurisprudence, and that there can be no doubt that our statute conferring jurisdiction upon the superior court is broad enough to embrace that branch, as well as every other," may be considered as a valid ground for the exercise of equitable interposition in such cases. The principle applied in the construction of that statute, and the object it was intended to serve, alike applies to the construction and object of our statute as illustrated in Love v. Morrill, supra. In West Hartford Ecclesiastical Soc. v. First Baptist Church, 85 Conn. 120, Hinman, Ch. J., after repeating the language of the statute, and referring to the case of Perry v. Pratt, supra, said: "It was not the intention of this statute to withdraw cases relating to the title to land from the ordinary tribunals, assisted, as they are, in respect to the finding of facts by a jury. The Legislature intended to guard against this abuse of the statute in the first clause of it, which limits the action of the court, as a court of equity under it, to the cases where the boundaries between adjoining proprietors have been lost, etc. It presupposes that such monuments once existed, and have ceased to exist, or that they have become so obscure as to require the erection of new ones. It was not intended that every uncertain line of division between adjoining proprietors should be definitely fixed by a committee of the superior court. Suppose a proprietor had encroached upon an adjoining proprietor for so long a time, and under such circumstances, that he could not be divested of his possessions, no one would claim that he could call upon the court to fix a boundary for him up to the line he had occupied; "and there is little reason for claiming that his adjoining proprietor could call upon the court to determine by a committee where the original line really was, so long as the original monuments that defined that line remained. The object is not to try the question of title on either side of the line, but to mark the place of the old line where the ancient monuments are gone." Some other cases might be cited within the purview of this decision, and those cases in which jurisdiction was formerly exercised on no other apparent ground than a confusion of boundary. Within the purview of the principles announced, without further reference, the jurisdiction conferred by our statute may be well maintained as a valid exercise of power for ascertaining the true boundary lines between adjacent estates which have become confused or uncertain, and do not involve the determination of legal title, although it would have been as well, or perhaps more in harmony with the chancery practice as it now exists,—if the statute would have borne such a construction,—to have confined its operation to cases which are properly the subject of equitable jurisdiction. It may be true in those cases where jurisdiction is acquired by some equity arising between the parties, or superinduced by the wrongful conduct of the defendant in obliterating the lines or destroying the monuments upon which the evidence of such boundary depends, that a suit in equity, although brought for ascertaining and fixing the boundary between adjacent estates, may involve the determination of conflicting titles or possessory rights; yet, when such is the case, a court of equity is competent to administer full and complete relief, and, if necessary, to grant the same kind of relief as that given at law. In such case the decree might operate as an estoppel and a bar in respect to the title involved and litigated. But there is a clear distinction between a dispute about the title to lands and a dispute about boundary lines. It is the confounding of these two questions, or regarding them as identical, that has sometimes misled parties in seeking their remedies.

In the previous suit between these parties the question determined was not title, but the boundary line between the King and Lownsdale claims. In that case the confusion of the boundary was occasioned by the displacement, from natural causes, of the tree or monument at the northeast corner of the King claim. It appears that the initial point of the King claim was undisputed, but, if the monument at the northeast corner of the claim, as actually located, could be ascertained, the boundary line in dispute would be a straight line. In his suit the plaintiff designated and claimed a certain line to be the boundary, which the defendants denied, and alleged and claimed another and different line to be the boundary of these adjoining lands. It is true that the defendant set up as a separate defense title by adverse possession, which the plaintiff denied; but the court properly ignored its consideration, and confined the jurisdiction to ascertaining and locating the boundary in dispute. It is clear, then, that the case not only related merely to the question of boundary, but that, within the purview of the statute, it did not, nor could not, extend to title. The title of the plaintiff to his land, and the title of the defendants to their lands, to the boundary—wherever that was—between the adjacent states, stood conceded, and the only question sought to be litigated was as to the true location of such boundary. Upon the evidence submitted, the court ascertained that the boundary line in dispute was the line claimed by the defendants, and not the one designated by the plaintiff, and directed the same to be located as the boundary between their lands, whereupon the plaintiff has brought this suit to quiet his title to the strip of land included between the boundary line as he claimed it and the boundary line as the defendants claimed it in the former suit, alleging that he has acquired title to it by adverse possession, which the defendants deny, and, among other grounds, seek to defeat by pleading the decree in the former suit as an estoppel. To give the decree in the former suit the effect of an estoppel in the present suit, the title to the strip in question must have been directly in issue and determined. The rule is elementary that the estoppel only extends to the question directly involved in the issue, and not to any incidental or collateral matter which may have arisen. To ascertain whether a former judgment or decree is a bar to present litigation, the test is, Was the same right or title put directly in issue and determined? Plainly, upon the principles already stated, the court had no jurisdiction to try title to the strip in question: nor was it tried, as the decree plainly indicates. The controversy was as to the true location of the line, and not the title to the strip of land lying between the different lines alleged by the parties; and, consequently, the title to it, not being in issue, was not adjudicated, and cannot operate as an estoppel or bar to the present suit.

In the former case the evidence of the plaintiff was directed to showing that the location of the line was as he alleged it, and in the present case to showing adverse possession by occupancy to the same line, and necessarily his evidence covers a great deal of the same ground in this as in that. In the former suit, to the suggestion that the plaintiff had acquired title by adverse possession, the court said that "the evidence shows that Mr. King held this possession, if at all, under mistake or ignorance as to his true line, and with no intention to claim beyond the true line, when discovered;" indicating that, in the opinion of the court, his evidence was not susceptible of that effect, and that it was consistent with the theory of his suit, as not intending to affect pre-existing titles, but to ascertain and locate a boundary line which was unknown or lost, and as explaining and showing that, if he occupied the land up to the fence or the line as he alleged it, he did it because he believed it to be the true line, but without any intention to claim up to it if it should turn out by the suit to be beyond the line. It did so turn out, as the court established another line. By an affirmative answer to a leading question the plaintiff is now made "to claim to own the land in controversy, whether it was covered by the patent or not." But claims of this sort, unless consistent with the acts of the parties and other circumstances of the case, are not very satisfactory proof to establish title by adverse possession to the lands covered by the title of others. Assuming that the plaintiff did occupy the land in question, his evidence, taken as a whole, judged in the light of surrounding facts, indicates that his possession or intrusion upon the land was by mistake, and, in consequence of the confusion or uncertainty as to the true line, was unsuspected by him or the defendants, because he believed it to be the true line, but without any intention on his part to claim the title to any other land than was embraced within the boundary of his claim. It is not the case of one occupying land under a mistake as to the boundary not embraced in his title, claiming it as his own for the requisite statutory period. All this becomes more apparent when his evidence is considered with reference to the other testimony, and in the light of the surrounding facts. Nor is this all. The greatest diversity exists between the witnesses as to the location of the fence upon which adverse possession is predicated; no two of them fixing it with certainty in the same place. In fact, the evidence lacks that certainty and convincing proof necessary to establish adverse possession. Besides, we are of the opinion that plaintiff has no sufficient possession to maintain this suit, so that, in any view, the decree must be affirmed, and suit dismissed.

The same principle is involved in some other cases in which it does not appear that any formal vote was taken on the question of making a contract with one or more members of the representative body.

Thus a contract between a school district and one of its directors for the building of a schoolhouse was held void, especially where it was obtained by his active exertions. Pickett v. School Dist. No. 1, 26 Wis. 561, 3 Am. Rep. 105.

And under a statute prohibiting all contracts between public officers and the municipality or other divisions of the state which they serve which would call for any payment from the treasury a board of county commissioners cannot employ one of its own members to do any service which can be performed by one who is not a member of the board, such as the inspection, examination, and measurement of work performed under a contract with the board. Waymire v. Powell, 105 Ind. 825.

And a contract for street improvements let by the trustees of an incorporated town to one of their number and to an assessor of the town is void. Case v. Johnson, 91 Ind. 478.

The land in question was dedicated and devoted to another public use, and the court finds that the extension of the street would substantially defeat the use of the land for railroad purposes. In such a case the common council have no jurisdiction over the subject-matter.

Baltimore & O. & C. R. Co. v. North and Valparaiso v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., supra.

Valparaiso v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co., supra, holds that a city has no power to condemn real estate belonging to a railroad company, in actual use for right of way and for depot purposes, and to appropriate the same to the use of the public as a street, as the statute authorizing cities to condemn and take lands for public use as a street neither in terms nor by necessary implication, authorizes the taking of property already dedicated to a public use, and land held by a railroad for right of way and for the purpose of depots, when in actual use, is so dedicated.

Coffey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought by the appellant against the appellant, the city of Fort Wayne, to enjoin the latter from opening a street across the yard and tracks of the appellee situated within the limits of the city. The material facts in the case, as they appear in the special findings of the court, are that in the year 1866 the city of Fort Wayne acquired a tract of land in fee simple by purchase and deed, contiguous to the city, for the purpose of a public park. The deed to the city contained no limitation nor conditions as to the purpose for which the land was purchased or was to be used, nor did it contain any restrictions as to the power of the city to convey the same. On the 23d day of March, 1869, and before any steps had been taken to convert the ground into a public park, the common council of the city adopted a resolution, by the terms of which it granted to the Fort Wayne, Jackson & Saginaw Railroad Company 20 acres of the land off of the west side of the tract, upon the condition that the railroad company should run its line through the tract so granted, and locate its depots for local purposes thereon, and also locate any shops it might find necessary to build at Fort Wayne upon the same tract; and upon the further condition that the property and the north side addition to Fort Wayne should become annexed to and become a part of the city of Fort Wayne. The resolution further provided that, when the railroad company had complied with the conditions of the grant, the mayor of the city should execute to it a deed of conveyance for the land donated. The city also reserved the right to cross the tracks of the appellant whenever it should determine to lay off an addition composed of the remainder of the tract. The donation of the land was made for the purpose of inducing the railroad company to make the city of Fort Wayne its southern terminus, and to induce it to locate its depots for local purposes and its shops thereon. Prior to February, 1871, the railroad company accepted the donation on the terms and conditions expressed in the resolution, took possession of the land, and constructed its roadbed through the same, put in side tracks and switches, and erected depot buildings thereon, on the faith of the resolution, and located its yards on the ground, for making up its trains, storing cars, and conducting its business as a passenger and freight railroad, and prior to the 12th day of March, 1872, had expended in so doing several thousand dollars. On the 12th day of March, 1872, the common council of the city passed a resolution directing the mayor to execute to the railroad company a deed for the land, which he accordingly did on the 26th day of the same month. At the time the first resolution above referred to was adopted, one Edgerton was a member of the common council of the city of Fort Wayne, and he was at the same time vice-president of the railroad company. The common council consisted of sixteen members, nine of whom voted for the resolution and seven against it, Edgerton voting for the resolution; but when the last resolution, directing the mayor to execute the conveyance, was passed, Edgerton was not a member of the common council. On the 8th day of April, 1878, the common council of the city of Fort Wayne passed a resolution attempting to rescind both the resolutions above mentioned, upon the alleged ground that the city had no power to bargain away the land therein described, and upon the alleged ground that the railroad company had not complied with the conditions of the grant. The resolution also required the city attorney to take such steps as might seem to him necessary to avoid the deed executed by the mayor of the city, but, so far as appears, no action was taken by him. On the 31st day of December, 1879, the Fort Wayne & Jackson Railroad Company succeeded to all the rights of the Fort Wayne, Jackson & Saginaw Railroad Company, and on the 24th day of August, 1882, the Fort Wayne & Jackson Railroad Company leased all of its property to the appellee for the period of 100 years. By a proceeding instituted for that purpose, regular on its face, the city of Fort Wayne, by its common council, has ordered an extension of Fourth street in said city, so as to cross the yard and tracks of the appellants about 250 feet from the south end of the yard. In this proceeding the property was treated as belonging to the city of Fort Wayne, and for this reason neither the appellee nor the railroad company from which it derives its title was made a party to the proceeding, or given any notice thereof in any manner whatever. At the point where Fourth street, if extended, will cross the appellee's yard it has six tracks, used for storing cars, weighing cars, making up trains, etc., and by opening Fourth street, as proposed, it will prevent the weighing of cars, and will render the south end of the yard useless for the purposes for which it was constructed. On an average, 140 cars are handled each day on these tracks, one half of which belongs to the Fort Wayne, Cincinnati & Louisville Railroad Company, which uses this yard as its northern terminus. This latter railroad company has built roundhouses and repair shops on the land donated as above mentioned, by and with the consent and aid of the city of Fort Wayne, and it has contracted with the appellee, by the terms of which it uses the tracks and depot of the latter in the transaction of its business at Fort Wayne as its southern terminus, and without the use of this yard it cannot transact its business. The extension of Fourth street will greatly discommode and diminish the business of the appellee and its yard and station grounds, and impair the value of its property and franchise. By reason of the number of tracks, and their necessary use in moving trains and transporting and weighing freight cars, it will be dangerous to life and limb for the public to travel on said street extended across the appellee's yard as proposed. In constructing and preparing this yard and depot there has been expended about the sum of $13,000, and the use of this yard and station is necessary to the appellee in conducting its business at the city of Fort Wayne. Upon these facts the court stated as a conclusion of law that the appellee was entitled to a permanent injunction, enjoining the city of Fort Wayne from extending Fourth street across its yard and tracks at the point described in the complaint. The correctness of this conclusion is questioned by the assignments of error upon this appeal.

It is contended by the appellant that the conclusion of law stated by the court is erroneous, for the reasons—First, that the city of Fort Wayne had no power to donate or convey the land in question for the purpose of a railroad, because it was purchased to be used by the people as a public park; second, because Edgerton, who voted for the donation as a member of the common council, was at the time of so voting vice-president of the railroad company, and that the donation was for that reason void; third, because the city in its grant to the railroad company reserved the right to cross its tracks.

The general rule is that the municipal corporations possess the incidental or implied right to alienate or dispose of the property, real or personal, of the corporation, of a private nature, unless restrained by charter or statute. Dill. Mun. Corp. 3d ed. p. 569; Shannon v. O'Boyle, 51 Ind. 565; 8 Washb. Real Prop. 3d ed. 64; Reynolds v. Stark County Comrs. 5 Ohio, 204; Beach v. Haynes, 12 Vt. 15; Jamison v. Fopiana, 43 Mo. 565; 97 Am. Dec. 414; Warren County Suprs. v. Patterson, 56 Ill. 111; Platter v. Elkhart County Comrs. 108 Ind. 380; Newbold v. Glenn, 67 Md. 489.

Municipal corporations cannot dispose of property of a public nature in violation of the trusts upon which it is held, nor of a public common; but there is a distinction between property purchased for a public common and not yet dedicated, and property which is purchased for that purpose and actually dedicated to that use. The case of Beach v. Haynes, supra, is very much in point here. In that case land had been purchased for a public common, and it was so expressed in the deed of conveyance, but before it was actually dedicated to that use it was conveyed away by the town of Westford, in which was vested the fee-simple title, and it was held that such conveyance vested in the grantee a good title; but in the later case of State v. Woodward, 23 Vt. 92, it was held that a municipal corporation could not convey away a public common after it had been actually dedicated to the public use. Of course, the deed which vests title in the municipality may be of such a character as to dedicate the property to the public use; but such is not the case here. The deed to the city of Fort Wayne for the land in controversy vested in it the fee-simple title without limitation or restriction as to its alienation. Such being the case, we think the city had the power to convey it for private use at any time before it was dedicated as a public park. Such seems to be the tenor of all the authorities upon the subject.

We recognize the doctrine announced in the case of Fort Wayne v. Rosenthal, 75 Ind.

156, 89 Am. Rep. 127, as sound; but in that case Rosenthal made a contract with himself, while here the contract was not between Edgerton and the city, but between the city and the railroad company. If that contract depended upon the vote of Edgerton, and there had been no further action taken by the city council, we would have a question quite different from the one here presented, for in this case it appears by the findings of the court that a sufficient number of councilmen voted for the resolution granting the land to the railroad company to pass it without counting the vote of Edgerton, while the deed of conveyance was executed pursuant to a resolution passed by the common council at a time when he was not a member. Treating the first resolution as voidable on account of Edgerton's connection with its adoption, we think the subsequent action of the common council fully ratified it. The adoption of these resolutions was not a judicial act, but was legislative or ministerial. Platter v. Elkhart County Comrs. supra.

We are unable to perceive how the reservation of the right to cross the tracks of the railroad company in the event the city of Fort Wayne should lay off an addition can have a controlling influence in this case, for it does not appear that the city has laid out any addition. The general rule is that a reservation in a deed cannot be extended beyond its terms, and the right of the city to cross the railroad track is by the terms of the reservation limited to the time when the city shall elect to lay out an addition composed of the remainder of the land held by it under its purchase for a public park. Nicholson v. Carass, 45 Ind. 479; 2 Devlin Deeds, § 979; Jackson v. Hudson, 3 Johns. 875.

The question as to whether the city of Fort Wayne, under present legislation, possesses the power to appropriate the land described in its order for the extension of Fourth street is one of much more difficulty. That there is a broad distinction between taking a part of the right of way of a railroad company for a public street by constructing the street longitudinally, and by taking it by crossing the right of way at right angles, seems to be too plain for controversy. The right to take longitudinally is quite different from the right of crossing, and is governed by entirely different rules. All the authorities are, we believe, to the effect that a municipal corporation, in the absence of legislation expressly or by necessary implication authorizing it, cannot take part of the right of way of a railroad company by the construction of a public street opened longitudinally. The decisions so holding rest upon the ground that where property is once dedicated to a public use it cannot be taken for another and different public use without express authority. It is not doubted, however, that the Legislature may grant such authority. Private corporations acquire the right to construct roads, subject to the dominant right of the state to cross such road whenever the public necessity demands that new roads or streets shall be opened; and for this reason it is held that the general power to construct and open streets or other public highways carries with it the power to construct them across railroad tracks. Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 169; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Kokomo, 180 Ind. 224; State v. Easton & A. R. Co. 86 N. J. L. 181; Morris & E. R. Co. v. Central R. Co. 81 N. J. L. 205; Baltimore & H. T. R. Co. v. Union R. Co. 85 Md. 225; Little Miami & C. & X. R. Co. v. Dayton, 23 Ohio St. 510; St Paul, M. & M. R. Co. v. Minneapolis, 85 Minn. 141; Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Whitehall, 90 N. Y. 21; Albany N. R. Co. v. Brownell, 24 N. Y. 845. While the construction of a street or other public highway across a railroad track is generally attended with some inconvenience to the company, yet it is not ordinarily inconsistent with the use of the railroad for the purposes for which it was constructed. But even this rule, which allows the construction of streets and other public highways across railroad tracks, has its limitations. They cannot be so constructed where by doing so the railroad would be unable to use its tracks at the point of the crossing for the purposes for which they were constructed; in other words, the crossing must occur at a point where the use of the highway or street will not deprive the railroad of the use of its tracks. Thus in the case of Little Miami & C. & X. R. Co. v. Dayton, supra, it was said by the supreme court of Ohio: "But where land is appropriated, pursuant to legislative authority, to an important public use, a subsequent grant cannot be held to authorize the same land to be taken for a use wholly inconsistent with, and which, in the actual circumstances, must necessarily supersede, the former use, unless such appear by express words or by necessary implication to be the legislative intent." To the same effect is Albany N. R. Co. v. Brownell, supra. In each of these cases there was an attempt to construct highways across the railroad tracks of the companies involved in the controversy. It appears by the special findings in the case now under consideration that the extension of Fourth street across the tracks and yard of the appellee will prevent the weighing of freight at that point, and will render the south end of the yard useless for the purposes for which it was constructed; that it will greatly discommode and diminish the business and its yard and station grounds, and impair the value of its property and franchise; and that it will be dangerous to life and limb for the public to travel over the street when so extended, by reason of the number of tracks, and the use to which they are necessarily put.

In view of these facts, we are constrained to hold, under the authorities above cited, that under present legislation the city of Fort Wayne is not authorized to extend Fourth street in the manner contemplated. The use of such a crossing would be destructive of the use of the tracks of the appellee at this point in the manner they are now used. In such case the authority of the municipal corporation to make such a crossing must appear in some statute, either expressly or by necessary implication. Our attention has not been called to any such statute, and we know of none.

There are some other questions in the case of minor importance, but, as we have reached the conclusion that the city of Fort Wayne is without power to make the crossing in dispute, they need not be noticed. We are of the opinion that there is no error in the record for which the judgment should be reversed.

Judgment affirmed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

City of TACOMA, Reapt.,

v.

H. M. LILIS, Appt.

1. A city cannot recover back money paid to a councilman for his services in pursuance of a vote or resolution, on the sole ground that it had failed to pass an ordinance authorizing the payment, if it had legal authority to compensate him.
2. Valid ordinances have the force of laws, and are as binding upon inhabitants of a municipality as are the statutes of the state upon its citizens generally.
3. A valid ordinance limiting the salary of councilmen is not repealed or modified by merely allowing and paying a larger salary, but the payment thereof is as to the excess unlawful.
4. A payment of salary in excess of the lawful amount by order of a municipal council to one of its members is not within the rule which precludes recovery of money voluntarily paid.
5. A councilman can perform "no extra services" in his official capacity for which he can receive compensation in addition to his salary, even if the services rendered greatly exceed in value the amount of his salary.
6. Payments for services outside the scope of his official duties, rendered by a city councilman, and which could have been appropriately performed by a private individual under a contract which is contrary to public policy, cannot be recovered back by the city in the absence of corruption or fraud.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pierce County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover money which was alleged to have been wrongfully paid to defendant for services as councilman of the city. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Crowley & Sullivan and Judson & Sharpstein, for appellant:

Admitting, for the sake of the argument, that all these allowances were made as a salary to appellant as a member of the council, for services performed coming within his ordinary duties, the council still had the power to make such additional compensation at any time and in any manner it deemed proper. There was no limitation in the organic Act.

Mechem, Pub. Off. § 857.

Appellant offered to prove what the services actually were which he did perform, and for which he received the moneys sued for. He also offered to show that as a salary the sums received by him were not excessive, but were less than a reasonable compensation for his services performed as a councilman. He offered to show that in receiving the said money he acted in the utmost good faith, without any fraud or collusion. This proof should have been received.

Mr. S. C. Milligan for respondent.

Anders, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

From the year 1887 to May 12, 1890, appellant was a member of the city council of the city of Tacoma. At the time of his election, in 1887, and for two years thereafter, no fees or salary was attached to the office of councilman, either by statute or ordinance, but, under the power given to the council by the charter of the city "to establish and regulate the fees and compensation of all its officers, excepting when otherwise provided," (Laws 1885-86, p. 203,) an ordinance was passed on April 7 and approved April 10, 1888, wherein and whereby it was provided that each of the councilmen of the city should receive a salary of $200 per annum, payable quarterly, and that said salary should begin on the second Saturday of May, 1889. Prior to the going into effect of this ordinance, appellant presented to the city council of said city bills for services performed during the year 1887-88 and the year 1888-89, amounting in the aggregate to $344. On January 12, 1890, a claim for $100 was presented for services, and on April 12, 1890, a further bill was presented to the council for $750, for services rendered from May 1, 1889, to March 1, 1890. All of these claims were allowed by the city council, and audited and ordered paid. Warrants were subsequently issued therefor, which were paid by the city treasurer out of the general fund of said city. The aggregate amount of these sums was $1,194. Appellant was also paid, in addition to the above amount, the salary of $200 per annum, after the ordinance above mentioned went into operation. The city, having elected a new council, brought this action to recover from the appellant the said sum of $1,194 so paid to him, basing its right of recovery upon the alleged ground that appellant demanded and received the same without being entitled thereto, and without any authority of law therefor. A general demurrer to the complaint having been overruled, an answer and a reply were filed, and, by consent of the parties, the cause was tried by the court without a jury.

Counsel for both parties to this controversy agree that the city government of the city of Tacoma was authorized by the city charter to fix the compensation of its own members. The case was tried upon that theory, both in this court and in the court below, and that question is, therefore, not before us for consideration. It is claimed, however, by counsel for the respondent, that payment of the salary of a councilman could only be authorized by law, contract, or ordinance; that there was no contract between appellant and the city in this instance; and, consequently, that the several payments made to appellant for services as a member of the council were received without authority of law, and should be refunded. On the other hand, it is contended by the appellant that the city, having the undisputed power, and having paid for the services rendered, is bound by the action of the council, in the absence of fraud or collusion, and that no recovery can be had against him for the money thus received. These contentions raise the first question to be considered. It cannot be doubted that the city council possessed only such powers as were specially conferred upon it by the charter, together with such other powers as were necessary to carry into effect those thus granted. A city's charter is its constitution, and its council can legally do no act not within the limits prescribed thereby. The inhabitants of the city are the incorporators, and the council are its trustees and agents, clothed only with such power to represent and act for the corporation as the charter gives them. If they transcend the authority conferred by the charter, their acts are not binding upon the city. It was the duty of the council to disburse the funds of the city for purposes authorized by law only, and, if they appropriated money to themselves which they had no right to receive, we think the city may recover it back as money had and received for its use.

The question is, then, Did the council, in any event, have the right to pay to appellant any part of the money which the city now seeks to recover? Respondent admits that appellant preformed services as one of its councilmen, and also admits, and alleges in its complaint, in substance, that the city, through its council, was authorized by the charter to fix and regulate his compensation, but insists, in effect, that because the city paid what it was authorized to pay, but did it without the sanction of an ordinance, it should now be allowed to recover it back, regardless of whether it was paid in good or bad faith. We think the position of respondent is not tenable in so far as the $344 is concerned. If the city had legal authority to compensate appellant for his official services during the time preceding the going into effect of the ordinance establishing the salary of councilmen, it cannot, after having done so in pursuance of a vote or resolution, turn round, and recover back the amount paid, on the sole ground that it failed to pass an ordinance authorizing the payment. If it was within the province of the council, as admitted by the respondent, to fix the compensation of its members, a mere irregular exercise of the authority vested in it would not render such action, in the absence of fraud or collusion, absolutely void, and of no binding effect upon the city. Ward v. Forest Grove, 20 Or. 855; Tyler v. Tualatin Academy & P. U. Trustees, 14 Or. 485. We are therefore of the opinion that the $144 and the $200 items cannot be recovered by the respondent, even if paid, as claimed by respondent, for services falling strictly within the scope of appellant's duties as councilman. Nor do we think the authorities cited by counsel for respondent militate against this conclusion. See 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 230; Sikes v. Hatfield, 18 Gray, 347; Farnsworth v. Melrose, 123 Mass. 268; Abright v. Bedford, 106 Pa. 582; Garvie v. Hartford, 54 Conn. 440.

In the section above cited from Judge Dillon's valuable work, and which is sustained by the authorities cited, that learned author says: "There is no such implied obligation on the part of municipal corporations, and no such relation between them and officers which they are required by law to elect, as will oblige them to make compensation to such officers unless the right to it is expressly given by law, ordinance, or by contract. Officers of a municipal corporation are deemed to have accepted their office with knowledge of, and with reference to, the provisions of the charter or incorporating statute relating to the services which they may be called upon to render, and the compensation provided therefor. Aside from this, or some proper by-law, there is no implied assumpsit on the part of a corporation with respect to the services of its officers. In the absence of express contract, these determine and regulate the right of recovery, and the amount." It is undoubtedly true that there is no such implied obligation on the part of municipal corporations as will oblige them to make compensation to their officers, unless the right to it is expressly given by law, ordinance, or contract; but it by no means follows that, if such a corporation has a right to pay its officers a salary, and does pay them, without violating any law, it can or ought to recover back the money simply for the reason that it was not obliged to make the payment in the first instance; and no authority has been cited by respondent to sustain such a proposition. The cases cited by respondent are either to the effect that a public officer cannot recover compensation not allowed by law, or that an illegal payment may be enjoined.

The remaining portion of the sum sought to be recovered, viz., $850, was paid to appellant at different times after the Ordinance of April 10, 1888, went into operation, and it now becomes necessary to determine the effect of that ordinance upon the power of the council to compensate its members. It may be stated as a general legal proposition that valid ordinances have the force of laws, and are as binding upon the inhabitants of a municipality as are the statutes of the state upon its citizens generally. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 308; Milne v. Davidson, 5 Mart. N. S. 409. When the city council passed that ordinance they established the law upon the subject of salary of councilmen, and they were as firmly bound by its provisions as if it had been a law passed by the Legislature of the territory. And, this being so, they had thereafter no right or authority to pay themselves any other or greater sum for services rendered in their official capacity than that specified in the ordinance, so long as it remained in force. But it is argued by the learned counsel for appellant that the city council were not prohibited either by law or by the organic Act of the territory from changing an officer's salary or fees at any time they saw proper to do so, either by ordinance or resolution, and that they did so in this case. Undoubtedly the lawmaking body of the corporation had, prior to the taking effect of the state Constitution, the right and power to increase or diminish the salary of appellant. The right to pass ordinances implies the right to repeal them, but in this instance we nowhere find in the record that the council ever attempted to change or repeal the ordinance fixing the salary of its members. It can hardly be said that the allowing and paying of claims for services alleged to have been rendered effected a repeal, or even a modification, of the ordinance, which, as we have already intimated, was the measure of the city's liability to appellant, as well as of his right to compensation. It has been held by some authorities—and we have observed none to the contrary—that a municipal ordinance cannot be repealed by mere resolution. To accomplish that result, a new ordinance must be passed. Horr & B. Mun. Ord. § 161; Jones v. McAlpine, 64 Ala. 511.

The effect upon this case would be the same, however, if we should hold that the resolutions authorizing the extra payments which were made after the ordinance went into effect changed, modified, or repealed that ordinance, for the resolutions were passed, not only after the passage of the ordinance, but after the Constitution of the state became operative. After that date, (November 11, 1889,) the city no longer had the power in any manner to change the salary of appellant during his term of office, whatever may have been its power previous to that time. It is provided in section 8, art. 11, of that instrument that "the salary of any county, city, town, or municipal officer shall not be increased or diminished after his election, or during his term of office." This is an express limitation upon the power of the council, and no increase of appellant's salary thereafter would have been legal, even if authorized by ordinance. And the principle of law that money voluntarily paid, with full knowledge of the facts, and without fraud or duress, which is invoked by appellant, seems to us to be inapplicable to this case. Appellant was an agent of the city, and was intrusted with the care and management of its funds, and, if he appropriated any of such funds to his own use, contrary to law, he is liable therefor as such agent, although he may have done it under a claim of right, and with no dishonest motive.

Another reason why the doctrine contended for by counsel ought not to be held applicable to cases like the one now under consideration is that it would enable a municipal council to violate with impunity a plain provision of the Constitution. This question was before the court in Weeks v. Tezakana, 50 Ark. 81. The case was this: Weeks was city recorder, and his salary had been reduced. He claimed to be entitled to the salary as originally fixed, and sued the city to recover it. The city claimed a set-off on account of overpayment after the ordinance reducing his salary took effect. The trial court held that the money, having been voluntarily paid, could not be recovered back. The supreme court ruled otherwise, using this language: "But the court below seems to have considered that the town, having voluntarily paid Weeks this salary, under no misapprehension of the facts, could not recover it back. However true this may be as a general rule, it ought not to be extended to cases where the officer receiving payment was a member of the council or body which ordered such payment. This would enable every municipal body to evade the salutary restraints imposed by the statute. They might vote themselves extravagant salaries, after induction into office, and, when they had once received the money, might set the municipality at defiance." See also Petersburg v. Mappin, 14 Ill. 193, 56 Am. Dec. 501; East Missouri v. Horseman, 16 U. C. Q. B. 582; Daniels v. Burford, 10 U. C. Q. B. 478.

We have not overlooked the objection made by appellant that the testimony on the part of plaintiff fails to prove that the moneys received by him were received as compensation for services which he was bound to perform by virtue of his office, and that the judgment of the court below was, therefore, wrong, even on plaintiff's own showing; but we think the objection should not be sustained. The bill for $750, presented by appellant, and which was ordered paid, and which it is admitted was paid, purports upon its face to be for services as councilman from the 1st of May, 1889, to 1st of March, 1890. This was at least prima facie proof of the character of the claim, and we do not think it was destroyed or neutralized by the record of the proceedings of the council, which was introduced in evidence by the plaintiff, and which is as follows. "The several committees have reported in favor of allowing bills for seventy-five dollars per month each for extra services of the mayor, Councilmen Fuller, Horsfall, Lillis, Houghton, Douglass, and Unhliman. The same were ordered paid by unanimous vote."

A councilman, while acting as such, can perform no "extra services" for the city. By accepting the office, he undertakes to discharge all of its duties, whatever they may be, and whether they are increased or diminished during his term. Evans v. Trenton, 24 N. J. L. 766; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 233. But it may be true, as claimed by appellant, that the $350 which he received in 1890 was paid to him for services which were no part of his official duties. If so, he ought not to be compelled to refund it, even though the contract under which the services were rendered was in contravention of section 165 of the charter. If appellant performed labor for the city which was beneficial, and which was outside of the scope of his official duties, and might have been done by any other person, and for which he has been paid, it cannot now retain the benefit, and recover back the consideration paid. Such a proceeding would be highly inequitable, and could not be tolerated for a moment in a court of justice. See Macon v. Huff, 60 Ga. 231; Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 71, 25 L. ed. 960. Although we agree with counsel for respondent that the contract between the city council and appellant in relation to the services for which the latter claims to have been paid was unauthorized by law, and contrary to public policy, yet, inasmuch as it was fully executed by both parties, the city, in the absence of any allegation of corruption or fraud in the transaction, cannot now be permitted to take unjust advantage of appellant on the ground that the contract was originally invalid. Argenti v. San Francisco, 16 Cal. 256.

Appellant alleges, in substance, in his answer as an affirmative defense, and offered to prove at the trial in the superior court, that the services for which the extra compensation was paid were not such as were required of him in the performance of his duties as councilman; that said services were authorized by the city; and that the city received the benefit thereof. The charter does not undertake to prescribe in detail the duties of councilman, and it would be difficult, if it were necessary, for the court to enumerate them all. But it certainly cannot be true in all cases that a councilman discharges all of his official duties by attending the meetings of the council, and taking part in its deliberations. As in other legislative bodies, much of the work is performed by committees; and when a member is serving on a committee of the council he is only discharging the ordinary duties of his office, and is not entitled to extra compensation therefor. Nor is the amount of time or labor required to properly discharge the duties of a public office material. If necessary, the public is entitled to his whole time. He cannot be compelled to retain his office longer than he desires; and, if the salary is inadequate, or the duties of the office require more time than he can afford to devote to them, he is at liberty to resign. Neither is it material that the amount claimed as extra compensation is a reasonable one for the services performed. When the compensation is fixed by law, nothing more can be claimed, whether the amount so established is reasonable or unreasonable. While we do not think that appellant was entitled to any compensation beyond his regular salary for "examining machinery, hose, and equipments connected with the fire department of the city, or for examining the condition of the streets, and the work done thereon, or for looking after the public property generally," it seems plain to our minds that it was no part of his official duty to act as superintendent of the work of contractors upon the streets, bridges, or buildings of the city, or to set up or adjust machinery; and if he could have shown that he did such work at the request of the city, and that it was meritorious, we think he should have been permitted to do so, or that he performed any other services of such a character that they might as appropriately have been performed by a private individual, and for which the latter would have been entitled to compensation. What he did in the capacity of councilman he was bound to do for the salary fixed by the ordinance, although the amount so fixed may have been deemed a very inadequate remuneration for the services rendered. Evans v. Trenton, supra. We think the complaint states a cause of action, and that the demurrer was properly overruled.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

Rudolph FRANKE, Resp't.,

v.

Wilhelmine Augusta FRANKE, Appt.

(.....Cal.....)

1. False representations by a woman

NOTE.—Antenuptial pregnancy or unchastity as a ground of divorce or annulment of marriage.

1. Pregnancy.

Antenuptial pregnancy by another man is, if concealed from the husband, a fraud upon him which 18 L. R. A.

to a man with whom she had had illicit intercourse and who knew her to be pregnant, that he was the only person with whom she had been incontinent, made to induce him to marry her, are not fraud for which the marriage will be annulled.

2. Pregnancy of a wife at the time of will justify a decree of divorce or annulment of the marriage. Morris v. Morris, Wright (Ohio) 630; Carris v. Carris, 24 N. J. Eq. 516; Baker v. Baker, 13 Cal. 87; Donovan v. Donovan, 9 Allen, 140; Reynolds v. Reynolds, 3 Allen, 606; Montgomery v.

marriage does not constitute physical incapacity for which the marriage will be annulled under Civ. Code, §§ 53, 55; but such incapacity must be such physical defect or incurable disease as will prevent sexual coition.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Alameda County in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying a motion for new trial in an action brought to annul a marriage on the alleged grounds of fraud and incompetency. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Carroll Cook and J. E. Foulds, for appellant:

Under the findings the plaintiff is entitled to no relief, and the judgment should be reversed.

Foss v. Foss, 12 Allen, 26; Crehore v. Crehore, 97 Mass. 330, 93 Am. Dec. 98; Carris v. Carris, 24 N. J. Eq. 522; Baker v. Baker, 18 Cal. 87; Reynolds v. Reynolds, 3 Allen, 609.

A husband, to be qualified to ask relief of this nature against the woman whom he has taken as his wife, must be pure himself—pure at least so far as she is concerned.

Selheimer v. Selheimer, 40 N. J. Eq. 413.

If he has been guilty of antenuptial incontinence with her, if before marriage he tempted her, and she yielded, he has no right to complain of her impurity or deception. He is just as unclean as she is.

Caton v. Caton, 6 Mackey, 809; Scroggins v. Scroggins, 14 N. C. 535.

Messrs. Reed & Nusbaumer, with Messrs. A. A. Moore and C. Tuttle, for respondent:

One of the essentials of marriage is that at the time of entering into the marriage state the wife should be physically competent to bear a child to her husband.

Incapacity may consist of inability to bear a child to her husband at the time of the marriage by reason of her pregnancy by another man, which is the broad consideration set forth in Cal. Civ. Code, § 53.

Montgomery, 3 Barb. Ch. 122, 5 L. ed. 845; Ritter v. Ritter, 5 Blackf. 81.

This is true even if there is no statute specifying such cause for relief from the marriage. Carris v. Carris and Morris v. Morris, supra.

But antenuptial pregnancy by the husband is no ground for a decree of nullity. McCulloch v. McCulloch, 69 Tex. 682.

And fully supporting the main case the decisions almost uniformly hold that if the husband had himself been guilty of illicit intercourse with the wife before marriage he can have no relief from it on account of her pregnancy by another man, although he was ignorant of it at the time of the marriage. States v. States, 37 N. J. Eq. 196; Selheimer v. Selheimer, 40 N. J. Eq. 412; Crehore v. Crehore, 97 Mass. 330, 93 Am. Dec. 98; Foss v. Foss, 12 Allen, 26; Hoffman v. Hoffman, 30 Pa. 417.

In the Crehore Case the woman, in order to induce the husband to enter into marriage, denied that she was pregnant after having first told him that she was, when he declared that in that case he would not marry her as the child could not be his.

And this is the rule although the statute makes fraud a ground of divorce. Foss v. Foss, supra.

But in the Todd Case it was not proved that the representations were believed.

In Slesung v. Slesung, 65 Mich. 163, a decision contrary to those above that the husband was entitled to relief for such false representations as to the paternity of the child was affirmed by an equal division of the court on the ground that a fraud had been practiced upon him.

And the false representations of the wife by which the husband was induced to enter into the marriage to the effect that she was pregnant by him will not be ground for relief against the marriage if he had in fact had illicit intercourse with her before marriage. Fairchild v. Fairchild, 43 N. J. Eq. 473.

At least if such false representations are not believed by the husband at the time of the marriage. Todd v. Todd, 17 L. R. A. 350, 1 Pa. Adv. Rep. 643.

But contrary to the decisions cited to the first proposition is a North Carolina decision to the effect that concealed pregnancy is no ground for divorce although the husband supposed the wife to be chaste. Long v. Long, 77 N. C. 304.

This rule was laid down broadly in this case, although in fact the petitioner for the divorce failed to allege that he was not the father of the child or 18 L. R. A.

that he had not had intercourse with his wife before marriage.

This case was decided under a statute specifically providing for a divorce only on the ground of adultery or impotence. (See as to the present statute Steel v. Steel, infra.) But it was based largely on an earlier decision in the same state under a statute which allowed a divorce whenever the court was satisfied of the justice of the application. In the earlier case it was decided that one who married a woman who had been then pregnant four and a half months during all of which time he had been frequently in her society, was not entitled to a divorce if he knew of her lewdness at the time of the marriage or continued to cohabit with her after discovering her condition up to the time of the birth of the child. Scroggins v. Scroggins, 14 N. C. 535.

On the other hand, in Ritter v. Ritter, 5 Blackf. 81, under a similar statute which allowed a divorce in addition to certain specified causes "for any other cause and in any other case where the court in their discretion shall consider it reasonable and proper," it was held that the refusal of the divorce for concealed antenuptial pregnancy resulting from the intercourse with another man was not a reasonable exercise of the discretion of the court, and the decision was reversed by the appellate court.

In Dawson v. Dawson, 18 Mich. 335, the right to a divorce in such a case is recognized, but it is held that the husband must prove satisfactorily that he was actually deceived and must negative any legal inference that he knew or as a man of ordinary intelligence had reasonable ground to believe what the wife's condition was at the time of the marriage.

The fraudulent concealment of pregnancy from intercourse with a black man and from which a colored child is subsequently born for which a legislative divorce is granted between white persons does not make the marriage void ab initio so as to prevent the wife from obtaining a settlement at her husband's residence. Guilford v. Oxford, 9 Conn. 321.

The right of a wife to alimony pendente lite is not defeated in a suit by her husband for divorce by the fact of her fraud in concealing her antenuptial pregnancy, although this may be ground for divorce. Frith v. Frith, 18 Ga. 273.

In harmony with the majority of authorities

Barden, 14 N. C. 548; Scott v. Shufeldt, 5 Paige, 43, 3 L. ed. 630; Sissung v. Sissung, 65 Mich. 168.

Vanellief, C., filed the following opinion: Action to annul marriage, on the ground that plaintiff's consent to marry was obtained by fraud, and upon the further and distinct ground that the defendant was physically incapable of entering into the marriage state. The cause having been tried by the court, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

The complaint, after stating the marriage on the 15th day of September, 1889, generally and meagerly alleges the cause of action as follows: "(3) For the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to consent to the said marriage, the defendant falsely and fraudulently represented that she was chaste and virtuous, and physically competent to marry plaintiff, and concealed from plaintiff her real condition, claiming then to be pregnant by plaintiff, but chaste and virtuous as to all other men, and that, save plaintiff, she had never had sexual intercourse or connection with any man. All which representations were false and fraudulent. (4) That defendant was not then and there physically competent to marry plaintiff, but was at the time of said marriage pregnant by some other man than plaintiff. (5) That plaintiff relied upon said representations, and was induced to consent to the said marriage by the said representations, and, if the same had not been made, and said concealment practiced, he would have never consented to the said marriage. (6) That upon the discovery of the falsity of the said representations the plaintiff ceased to cohabit with the defendant, and has never since cohabited with her." The answer of the defendant specially denies above cited it is held that antenuptial pregnancy by a third person makes a woman "physically incapacitated" for marriage with an innocent man within the meaning of D. C. Rev. Stat., § 738, prescribing grounds for divorce. Caton v. Caton, 6 Mackey, 809.

Somewhat connected with this subject also is a decision that a man by whom a woman became pregnant and who has been arrested for aiding an abortion cannot have a marriage annulled because he entered into it to escape the prosecution. Frost v. Frost, 42 N. J. Eq. 55.

The statutes of the following states as shown by Simson's American Statute Law now expressly provide that antenuptial pregnancy by a third person shall be ground for a divorce, viz.: Alabama, Georgia, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Mississippi, Missouri, North Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, West Virginia, Wyoming.

These statutes cannot be said to change the law except in North Carolina. The change of statute in that state is recited in Steel v. Steel, 104 N. C. 631.

Where the wife was pregnant at the time of the marriage the presumption is that the child is that of the husband, but this is not conclusive. Baker v. Baker, 13 Cal. 87; Wright v. Hicks, 15 Ga. 160, 60 Am. Dec. 687, 12 Ga. 156; State v. Herman, 35 N. C. 502; Dennison v. Page, 29 Pa. 420, 72 Am. Dec. 644; McCulloch v. McCulloch, 69 Tex. 682; Bowles v. Bingham, 3 Munf. 442, 5 Am. Dec. 497; Stegall v. Stegall, 2 Brock. 256; Montgomery v. Montgomery, 3 Barb. Ch. 182, 5 L. ed. 845; Miller v. Anderson, 43 Ohio St. 473.

On the general question of the presumption of the legitimacy of a child born in wedlock see notes to Woodward v. Blue (N. C.) 10 L. R. A. 662, and Goss v. Froman (Ky.) 8 L. R. A. 102.

2. Existence of a bastard child.

The same court that decided against the right to a divorce for antenuptial pregnancy in Soroggrins v. Soroggrins, 14 N. C. 535, decided at the same term that a white man who marries a woman knowing that she has then an illegitimate child which she artfully leads him to believe is his but which he subsequently finds to be the child of a black man is entitled to a divorce. Barden v. Barden, 14 N. C. 548.

And so in Scott v. Shufeldt, 5 Paige, 43, 3 L. ed. 630, a woman's fraud and perjury in charging a white man with the paternity of her bastard child which has then been born and which she knows from its color if for no other reason to be the child of a negro is ground for annulling a marriage which the white man enters into to avoid the bastardy prosecution, although he may have had some reason to suspect that the child was his own.

On the other hand, the fact that a woman at the time of marriage was the mother of an illegitimate child, and that she falsely alleged that she was a widow and that the child was that of a former husband, is not a ground for divorce. Farr v. Farr, 2 McArthur, 35.

And the concealment by a woman of the fact that she had been the mother of an illegitimate child some years before is not ground for annulling the marriage. Smith v. Smith, 8 Or. 100. But see, as to statutes concerning unchastity, infra.

3. Unchastity.

The prior unchastity of a woman, concealed from her husband, does not constitute such a fraud on him as to avoid the marriage. Allen's App. 99 Pa. 196.

In Leavitt v. Leavitt, 13 Mich. 452, the same decision is made although in that case the husband had lived with the wife for many years and they had reared a large family of children before he discovered the alleged fact of her antenuptial unchastity.

The same rule is declared in the English cases. Reeves v. Reeves, 2 Phillim. 125, 1 Eng. Ecol. Rep. 208; Perrin v. Perrin, 1 Add. Ecol. Rep. 1, 2 Eng. Ecol. Rep. 11; Best v. Best, 1 Add. Ecol. Rep. 411, 2 Eng. Ecol. Rep. 158; Graves v. Graves, 3 Curt. Ecol. Rep. 235, 7 Eng. Ecol. Rep. 425.

Even where the statute provides for the nullity of a marriage "obtained by force or fraud," the concealment of antenuptial unchastity is not a ground of nullity. Varney v. Varney, 52 Wis. 120, 28 Am. Rep. 728.

In a case where a wife had before marriage been guilty of incest with her uncle, and her husband entered into the marriage supposing her to be chaste, the court said: "If this application rested solely upon the ground of fraud practiced prior to the marriage the unusual circumstances would naturally incline a court to add another exception to the general rule." But as adultery after marriage was another ground of relief the court did not rest its decision upon the prior incest alone. Steel v. Steel, 104 N. C. 631.

But in Virginia and West Virginia prior prostitution of the wife unknown to the husband at the time of the marriage is ground of divorce, and in Maryland any prior fornication by the wife is sufficient ground therefor, while in West Virginia the notoriously licentious character of the husband not known to the wife at the time of the marriage is ground for divorce in her favor. B. A. R.

that she made the false and fraudulent representations charged, and denies that she was physically incompetent to marry the plaintiff; admits that she was pregnant by the plaintiff at and before the marriage, and denies that she was so by any other man, and alleges that before the marriage she fully informed the plaintiff of her true condition.

The court found as follows: "(1) That on the 15th day of September, 1889, at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, plaintiff and defendant intermarried. (2) That on or about the 20th day of April, 1889, plaintiff and defendant had voluntary sexual intercourse with each other, and that on or about the 14th day of August, 1889, and at divers other times in said month before the date of said marriage, defendant and defendant's then attorney, James Herrmann, represented to plaintiff that defendant was pregnant and with child by plaintiff, and that she was chaste and virtuous as to all other men, and that she was physically competent to marry plaintiff. (3) That plaintiff, to satisfy himself of the truth or falsity of these representations, did, before his said marriage with said defendant, act as a careful and prudent man should act, and in all respects used due and proper care. (4) That at and after the making of said representations, and at and after the marriage of said plaintiff and defendant, defendant concealed from plaintiff her true condition. That defendant, at and prior to the making of said representations, and at the time of her marriage with said plaintiff, was pregnant, not by plaintiff, but by a man other than plaintiff. (5) That plaintiff, at and after the time of his marriage with defendant, believed in and relied upon the said representations, and in consequence of said representations and belief plaintiff was deceived into and induced to consent to said marriage; and if said representations had not been made, and said concealment of her true condition practiced by defendant upon plaintiff, plaintiff would not have intermarried with defendant. That the said representations, and each and all of them, were untrue and false and fraudulent, and at the time said representations were made by defendant to plaintiff defendant well knew that they were untrue, false, and fraudulent. (6) That defendant, by reason of the fact that she was pregnant by a man other than plaintiff, was at the time she married plaintiff physically incompetent to marry him, and that her concealment from plaintiff of her true condition was a fraud upon plaintiff. (7) That plaintiff did not discover the fraud which had been practiced upon him by defendant until on or about the 28th day of October, 1889, and that immediately upon such discovery he ceased to cohabit with defendant, has never since cohabited with her, and acted promptly and with the highest good faith to procure an annulment of his marriage."

It is claimed by appellant that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings of fact in several material particulars, and also that the findings do not warrant the judgment. The only evidence of sexual intercourse between the parties before their marriage is the testimony of the plaintiff, which is not fully nor quite fairly represented by the findings, either as to the first time nor the number of times it occurred, or as to the period during which it continued, since these circumstances were material as we shall see, as bearing upon plaintiff's antenuptial knowledge of defendant's character for chastity. The plaintiff testified that in March, 1889, he was a widower, forty years of age, residing in Oakland, Alameda county, with his family of five children.—a son aged fourteen years, a daughter aged eleven years, and three younger children. That the defendant then resided with her parents in San Francisco, and (as appears by other testimony) was only seventeen years of age. That for some time plaintiff had been acquainted with her parents, but had not known the defendant until she came to his house in Oakland, to visit his children, in March, 1889. He did not meet her again until the 18th or 19th day of April following, when she again visited his children, and remained at his house all night. After playing cards with her and his children until about nine o'clock that evening, he directed her and his children to retire to bed, which they did, she going to a bedroom with some of the children, and he remaining in the sitting room on a sofa, where he fell asleep. About an hour after defendant had gone to her bedroom, she returned to the room where he was sleeping on the sofa, and awoke him by tickling his nose with a feather duster. He then told her "that was dangerous business, and that she had better go to bed, and have nothing to do with it." She persisted, however, "fooling around him and playing," and the result was that both went to his bedroom, and there, for the first time, had sexual intercourse, which was repeated the next day about 11 o'clock A. M. Thereafter she visited at his house about once a week, staying all night, and going to his bed. He does not remember how often these visits occurred, but thinks ten or twelve times. They must have continued through the month of May and a part of June. He further testified that on the first occasion he told her he "was afraid of the business," and that she said: "You needn't be afraid; that is all right; I have got my protector," (meaning her beau.) As a matter of precaution, however, he used what he called "a protector," to prevent conception, which he seems to have had at hand on the first occasion, but which he says was not successful about the third time it was used, and within the month of April. The use of this instrument is one of the reasons assigned by him for doubting at the time of the marriage, that he was the father of the child.

On August 22, 1889, the defendant—then Miss Bruhn, and still a minor—by her guardian, Peter F. Bruhn, her father, commenced an action against the plaintiff herein to recover $50,000 damages for seduction, alleged to have been accomplished on the 18th day of March, 1889. It appears that plaintiff herein had notice that defendant was pregnant, and claimed that he was the father of the child, before the action for seduction was commenced, but it does not appear by what means he was notified, nor that any demand had been made upon him either to marry or pay damages before the commencement of that action. Nor does it appear that he was ever requested by defendant or her parents to marry her. He testified that he called upon her at her father's house a day or two after the action for seduction was commenced, and complained that no effort had been made to settle the matter quietly with him before commencing the action, and that she then said she had not advised the action, and that her father had commenced it without her approval. He then told her in the presence of her mother that if he was the father of the child, he was willing to marry her, and "that they had no business to go to law about it." Plaintiff further testified that the defendant first told him that he and no other man was the father of the child at her lawyer's office, on the day they got their marriage license, (September 15,) and that her lawyer—Mr. Herrmann—then made her swear to it; and that her lawyer promised that if the time of the birth of the child should not correspond with plaintiff's reckoning, he (the lawyer) "would get plaintiff free without a cent." It also appears that while the seduction suit was pending the plaintiff therein and her lawyer offered to settle and dismiss the suit for $1,300 if plaintiff was not content to marry. He preferred to marry, though, he said, he always doubted that he was the father, rather than "throw money away" in payment of alleged damages. The child was born October 27th, six months and nine days after the first admitted act of coition, and one month and twelve days after the marriage, and, in the opinion of medical witnesses, had the appearance of a child not prematurely born. The circumstances, with the testimony of plaintiff as to the time of his first intercourse with defendant, must be regarded as sufficient to justify the findings that plaintiff was not the father of the child, and that defendant's representations before marriage, that she had been virtuous as to all other men than plaintiff, were willfully false. Yet, considering her age and inexperience, she may not have known before marriage that plaintiff was not the father, though for good reason she may have doubted that he was. But assuming, as we must, that the finding that he was not the father is true, she willfully asserted what she did not know to be true, and what she had good reason to doubt, at least; and to this extent the finding that "she well knew" that her representation that plaintiff was the father "was false and fraudulent" should be qualified. The finding that plaintiff and defendant had sexual intercourse "on or about the 20th day of April, 1889," should also be qualified and characterized by the circumstances of the intercourse, shown by the testimony of the plaintiff; otherwise, material traits and features of the character of that intercourse are hidden from view. The comparative ages and experience of the parties, his relation to her as a visitor of his children at his house, the conduct of both parties on the first occasion, the frequency of the intercourse, the length of time it continued, and the absence of any pretense of virtue on her part while it continued, are material, as tending to show her then apparent character for virtue, the extent to which he was particeps criminis in her incontinence, and that he had not sufficient reason to be deceived by her false representations made to him for the first time on the day he procured the marriage license.

But, accepting the findings as they appear in the record, I think they do not warrant the judgment on the ground of fraud. The Civil Code, § 82, provides that a marriage may be annulled on the ground "that the consent of either party was obtained by fraud." The only case in this state in which a marriage has been annulled on this ground is that of Baker v. Baker, 13 Cal. 88. In that case the defendant (wife) was pregnant by a stranger at the time of marriage, but the husband had no sexual intercourse with her, or any other reason to suspect her chastity, before marriage, and did not know or suspect that she was pregnant at the time of marriage; whereas, in this case, the plaintiff participated in the incontinence of his wife before marriage, and also knew her to be pregnant at the time of marriage, and even then doubted, as well he might, that he was the father. Our Civil Code does not define the kind or degree of fraud required to annul a marriage, but no one will contend that every kind and degree of fraud which would be sufficient to annul an ordinary contract would also be sufficient to annul a marriage contract, consent to which had been induced by it. Under these circumstances, it is proper to consult the decisions of the highest courts of other states construing similar statutes. Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 496. Statutes of other states similar to sections 58 and 82 of our Civil Code, authorizing the nullification of marriage on the ground of fraud simply, without defining the kind or degree of the fraud, have been uniformly construed as being merely jurisdictional, and to mean that kind of fraud defined by the unwritten law applicable to marriage contracts, (Bishop, Mar. & Div. §§ 475 and 478; Foss v. Foss, 12 Allen, 26; Scroggins v. Scroggins, 14 N. C. 535;) and under such statutes it has been held almost uniformly that where a man marries a woman whom he has debauched before marriage, and whom he knew to be pregnant with child at the time of marriage, the marriage will not be annulled on the ground that he was deceived by the false assurances of the wife before marriage that he was the father of the child, and that she had been chaste with all other men. Having experienced and participated in her incontinence before marriage, he is thereby sufficiently apprised of her want of chastity to deprive him of the right to complain that he was deceived by her false assurances that he was the only participant in her illicit intercourse. Reynolds v. Reynolds, 8 Allen, 609; Foss v. Foss, 12 Allen, 26; Crehore v. Crehore, 97 Mass. 330, 93 Am. Dec. 98;

Scroggins v. Scroggins, 14 N. C. 535; Long v. Long, 77 N. C. 805; Carris v. Carris, 24 N. J. Eq. 517; Seilheimer v. Seilheimer, 40 N. J. Eq. 412; Varney v. Varney, 52 Wis. 120, 88 Am. Rep. 726; Bishop, Mar. & Div. § 483 et seq.

The only authority for any exception to the rule, as above stated, which I have been able to find, is to be found in the extreme cases of Barden v. Barden, 14 N. C. 548, and Scott v. Shufeldt, 5 Paige, 43, 8 L. ed. 620, in each of which the parties were white, and the child begotten before marriage was a mulatto. Each of these cases was decided upon the facts stated in the complaint, and upon a demurrer. In the first, Ruffin, J., who delivered the opinion of the court, expressly characterized his concurrence in it as "a concession to the deep-rooted and virtuous prejudices of the community upon the subject." Another distinguishing attribute upon which the exception is said to have been grounded is that "the blood of the woman, as physiologists tell us, has been tainted by mingling with that of the first (mulatto) child, and she is incapable of bearing children that will not show the mixture of African blood." See dissenting opinion of Rodman, J., in Long v. Long, 77 N. C. 804. In each of those cases the mulatto child had been born before the marriage, but the putative father, in one case, had not seen it, and in the other had not discovered that it was a mulatto, until after marriage. In the New York case (Scott v. Shufeldt) the court said: "If the child had not been born at the time of the marriage, the complainant would have had some difficulty in showing that he had been intentionally deceived and defrauded by the defendant, as she might possibly have supposed the child to be his, although she had also had connection with a negro about the same time." Possibly other extremely hard cases may occur sufficiently distinguishable from the cases above cited to justify additional exceptions to the rule, but such cases need not be anticipated, since this case certainly is not one of them.

So far as plaintiff's alleged grievance is founded upon fraud, the substance of it is, according to his own testimony, that at the mature age of forty years, after a matrimonial experience during which five children were born to him he was seduced by a girl aged seventeen years,—the daughter of a neighbor,—while visiting his children at his own house, and therefore virtually under his protection, and whom, indeed, he says, he endeavored to protect from the natural consequence of her indiscretion, so far as he could, in his then helpless condition, by the use of "a protector," which it seems he had prudently provided for such an occasion. Nevertheless she afterwards claimed that such natural consequence had not been averted, and brought suit against him for seduction, falsely charging that he was the father of her unborn child, and praying judgment for damages. That, rather than "give money away" in settlement of that suit, he elected to marry her on her assurance that he was the father, and the further assurance of her attorney that if the time of the birth of the child should not correspond with plaintiff's reckoning, the attorney would get him free "without a cent;" though at the time of the marriage he doubted that he was the father of the child, and although by postponing the nuptials two months he might have verified his reckoning. The whole substance of the fraud proved consisted of her false representations that she had been chaste with all other men than plaintiff, which, under the circumstances of this case, partly on grounds of public policy, has been deemed insufficient in degree to warrant the annulment of a marriage. The reasons for the rule are fully set forth in the case above cited.

The finding that defendant was physically incompetent to marry the plaintiff is not justified by the evidence, as there is no evidence tending to prove that she was diseased or defective in physical organization. This ground for annulment of marriage, as expressed in sections 58 and 82 of the Civil Code, is entirely distinct from that of fraud. It consists solely of such physical defect or incurable disease existing at the time of marriage as will prevent sexual coition. Bishop, Mar. & Div. §§ 757, 766, 768. The case of Baker v. Baker, 13 Cal. 88, has no bearing whatever upon the question of physical incapacity as a cause for the annulment of a marriage. That was an action for a divorce on the sole ground of fraud, and the judgment of the appellate court was placed upon that ground alone, in accordance with the fifth subdivision of section 4 of the Act of March 25, 1851, (Wood's Dig. [1st ed.] p. 491.) which section also made "natural impotence, existing at the time of marriage," a cause of divorce; but there was no pretense of such impotence in that case; nor was there any statute in this state, prior to the decision in that case, providing for the annulment of a marriage on the ground of physical incapacity. The case of Baker v. Baker was considered in Carris v. Carris, 24 N. J. Eq. 522, and construed as being consistent with the decision in the latter case. I think the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: Haynes, C.; Belcher, C.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

(.....III.....)

The issue of a woman has not a vested interest in the real estate devised in trust during her life to apply the income to her use and upon her death to convey to her issue if she leaves any surviving in such shares as she shall appoint, otherwise to them in equal shares per stirpes and if she leaves none then to other persons, which will make such issue necessary parties to a suit against the trustees as the latter take the title in fee.

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a decree of the Circuit Court for Cook County dismissing their bill filed to review and set aside a decree directing the sale of certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Walker & Eddy, for appellants: Appellants' bill is an original bill in the nature of a review, impeaching a decree for want of necessary parties.

Story, Eq. Pl. § 426.

Where an improper decree has been made against an infant, although the same were not gained by fraud or collusion, or surprise, it ought to be impeached by original bill; and the infant aggrieved by it need not stay till he is of age, but he may apply to reverse it as soon as he thinks fit.

The interest of the trustees of the Robinson estate in the piece of realty known as section 21 was an estate for the life of Mrs. Green.

8 Redf. Wills, 617.

The trustee takes exactly that quantity of interest that the purposes of the trust require. 2 Jarman, Wills, 805; Ward v. Amory, 1 Curt. C. C. 419; Coulter v. Robertson, 24 Miss. 278, 57 Am. Dec. 168; Norton v. Norton, 2 Sandf. 296.

The legal estate in the trustee shall not be carried further than is required for the complete execution of the trust.

Though a fee simple be given in appropriate terms to trustees, and though appointees or heirs are to take interests only upon the happening of a contingency, still, when that contingency happens, if the trust has then been fully performed, the appointees or heirs, as the case may be, will at once take a legal estate of the extent given by the will as purchasers.

If there be a devise to trustees and heirs during the minority of a beneficial devisee, and then to him, or upon trust to convey to him, it conveys a vested remainder in fee, and takes effect in possession when the devisee attains twenty-one.

4 Kent, Com. 205.

The sixth clause of the will, which gave to the trustees "power to lease any of the real estate, etc., and likewise power to sell and convey any of such real estate," did not so enlarge the estate of the trustees as to make it an estate in fee, but simply conferred upon the trustees certain powers of disposition which may be executed without any legal title.

The "present capacity of taking effect in possession on the termination of the life interest, is the prime badge of a vested remainder. Appellants have a present capacity of taking the remainder in possession on the termination of Mrs. Green's life interest at her death; that event must happen, and it not only may but probably will happen before the death of either complainant.

Messrs. Smith & Harlan, Lyman & Jackson and C. H. Kelsey for appellees.

Wilkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

To the May term, 1891, of the circuit court of Cook county, appellants filed their bill, in the nature of a bill of review against appellees, to set aside a decree, and sale in pursuance thereof of section 21, township 39 N., range 18 E., Cook county, Ill., the decree having been rendered on the bill of William H. Peters, receiver of the Norfolk National Bank, of Virginia, against the administrator and heirs-at-law of Robert W. Hyman, deceased, and Henry A. Barling, Edward D. Mandell, and Edward H. Green, trustees under the last will and testament of Edward Mott Robinson, deceased, together with Hetty H. R. Green, daughter of said Robinson, and others, filed in said circuit court of Cook county, August 24, 1887. The record of that cause has been twice before us. See Barling v. Peters, 181 Ill. 78, 184 Ill. 606. The present bill sets out at length the various steps in that proceeding, but they will sufficiently appear, for the purposes of this decision, by reference to the above cited cases.

The following facts are pertinent to the present inquiry: On the 14th of June, 1865, Edward Mott Robinson died, leaving a last will and testament, which was afterwards duly probated. He left surviving him an unmarried daughter, Hetty Howland Robinson, to whom he willed certain real estate in the city of San Francisco, and a large money legacy. He also gave certain other specific legacies, and then made the following residuary bequest: "Fifth. All the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, both real and personal, remaining after the payment of my debts, after satisfying the bequests and dispositions heretofore contained, I give, devise, and bequeath unto Henry A. Barling and Abner H. Davis, of the city of New York, and Edward D. Mandell, of New Bedford, in the state of Massachusetts, as trustees, to be holden by them, and the survivors and survivor of them, upon the trusts following: that is to say, as to the real estate, to collect and receive the rents, issues and profits thereof, and, as to the personal estate, to invest and keep invested the same, with power to call in and change the investments from time to time; such investments and reinvestments to be in such securities and property, and in such manner, as such trustee shall deem safe and prudent; and to continue so to hold the same in trust during the life of my said daughter, Hetty Howland Robinson, and to apply the net rents, issues, profits, interest, and income arising from the property embraced in such 18 L. R. A.

trust to the sole and separate use of my said daughter, Hetty Howland Robinson, during her life, separate and apart from any husband she may marry, and free from the debts, control, or interference of any such husband; such application to be of such income only from time to time as it shall accrue and be received, and not be subject to any previous disposition or incumbrance by way of anticipation, and, upon the death of my said daughter, Hetty Howland Robinson, to convey, transfer and deliver over the capital of such trust estate, real and personal, as the same shall then exist, to the issue of my said daughter, Hetty Howland Robinson, if any issue she shall leave her surviving, in such shares and proportions as my said daughter, Hetty Howland Robinson, shall appoint by her last will and testament, and, if she shall make no direction or appointment, then to such issue in equal shares, per stirpes, and not per capita; and in case my said daughter, Hetty Howland Robinson, shall leave no issue her surviving, then upon her death to convey, transfer and deliver over the capital of such trust estate, real and personal, as the same shall then exist, excepting four hundred thousand dollars thereof hereinafter disposed of, in such event, to such person or persons, and for such estate, as my said daughter, Hetty Howland Robinson, shall by her last will and testament direct or appoint, and in default of such direction or appointment, or so far as the same may not extend or be effectual, then to the person or persons who by the present laws of the state of New York would have taken the same as heirs-at-law and next of kin of my said daughter, Hetty Howland Robinson, if she had died seised and possessed thereof intestate; and as to the said above reserved four hundred thousand dollars of such trust estate, I give and bequeath the same, at the termination of the said trust, upon such contingency of my said daughter dying without leaving issue, in manner following: that is to say, I give and bequeath one hundred thousand dollars thereof to my brother William A. Robinson, of Providence, Rhode Island, if he be then living, and, if he be not living, then to the issue then living of said William A. Robinson, in equal shares, per stirpes, and not per capita; and one hundred thousand dollars thereof to my sister Annie A. Chase, of Salem, Massachusetts, if she be then living, and, if she be not then living, then to the issue then living of said Annie A. Chase, in equal shares, per stirpes, and not per capita; and one hundred thousand dollars thereof to my brother Attmore Robinson, of South Kingston, Rhode Island, if he be then living, and, if he be not then living, then to the issue then living of said Attmore Robinson in equal shares, per stirpes, and not per capita; and the remaining one hundred thousand dollars thereof to my brother Sylvester C. Robinson, of Salem, Massachusetts, if he be then living, and, if he be not then living, then to the issue then living of said Sylvester C. Robinson, in equal shares, per stirpes, and not per capita. Sixth. I give to the trustees of the trust above created, and to the survivors and survivor of them, power to lease any of the real estate embraced in such trust for any lawful term or terms, and likewise power to sell and convey any of such real estate. And I will and direct that, as to such part of my estate as at the time of my death shall be invested in ships or interest in ships, it shall be at the option of said trustees, and likewise of my executors, in their discretion, when to sell the same, and they may continue to hold and run any such ship or ships, for the benefit and at the risk and charge of my estate, for such time as to them may seem fit." In 1866, the daughter, Hetty Howland, married Edward H. Green, and of that marriage the complainants in this bill were born,—the son, Edward H. R., August 23, 1868, and the daughter, Hetty S. H., January 7, 1871.

The theory of this action is that, upon their births, these children, the issue of the daughter of said Robinson, took, under said fifth clause of his will, a present interest in the residuum of his estate, to which belonged said section 21, and that, therefore, before their rights in that real estate could be sold under a decree of court, they must have been parties to that decree; hence this is denominated by their counsel "an original bill, in the nature of a bill of review, impeaching a decree for want of proper parties." There are also allegations in the bill charging fraud and collusion on the part of said trustees in suffering said decree to be rendered. The rights of appellants, however, when the Peters bill was filed, were precisely the same as they are now, and, therefore, unless they were necessary parties to that bill, they can have no standing in the present action for want of interest in the subject-matter. The case may therefore be properly considered on the single question, had appellants at the time the former bill was filed such an interest in the subject-matter of that suit as made them necessary parties thereto? It is scarcely necessary to reiterate the rule in chancery pleading and practice that all persons who are legally or equitably interested in the subject-matter and result of the suit must be made parties. The interest must, however, always be a present, substantial interest, as distinguished from a mere expectancy, or future, contingent interest. American Bible Soc. v. Price, 115 Ill. 623; Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 141, 145, 150. While many points are raised and discussed by counsel for appellants, the pivotal question in the case is, Did appellants, as issue of Hetty Howland Robinson, upon coming into being, take a vested interest, under the foregoing fifth clause, in all the real estate therein devised? The first proposition asserted in support of the affirmative of that question is that "the interest of the trustees of the Robinson estate in the piece of realty known as 'section 21' was an estate for the life of Mrs. Green." From this premise it is argued that the issue of Mrs. Green took, under said clause, an estate in remainder in said section as soon as they were born, which became a vested remainder under the rule that "when a remainder is so limited as to take effect in possession, if ever, immediately upon the determination of a particular estate, which estate is to determine by an event which must happen immediately by the efflux of time, the remainder vests in interest as soon as the remainderman is in esse and ascertained, provided nothing but his own death before the determination of the particular estate will prevent such remainder from vesting in possession." It is also insisted, and many authorities are cited as supporting the contention, that "immediately upon the death of Mrs. Green both the legal and equitable title to the estate will vest instantly in her children, regardless of whether or not the trustees execute any deed or conveyance." Manifestly, unless the first of the foregoing propositions can be sustained, the argument must fall with it. If the trustees took the title to said real estate in fee simple, no remainder was left to vest in the issue of Mrs. Green, or any one else, and hence there could be no vesting of title upon the death of Mrs. Green, without a conveyance by said trustees. The language in said fifth clause, "I give, devise, and bequeath unto Henry A. Barling," etc., "as trustees" prima facie vests in said trustees the title in fee, the effect being the same as though the devise had been to them and their heirs. Rev. Stat. § 13, chap. 80, entitled, Conveyances; West v. Fite, 109 Ill. 436. While in conveyances and devises of real estate in trust, words of inheritance will not necessarily pass the title in fee, they will have that effect unless it appears that the trust can be discharged by the trustees taking a less estate. Prima facie the absolute title in fee passes. Even in the absence of statutory provision as to the effect of the omission of the word "heirs," the rule, as stated by Perry in his work on Trusts, (sec. 815), is as follows: "So if land is devised to trustees without the word 'heirs,' and a trust is declared which cannot be fully executed but by the trustees taking an inheritance, the court will enlarge or extend their estate into a fee simple, to enable them to carry out the intention of the donors. Thus, if land is conveyed to trustees without the word 'heirs,' in trust to sell, they must have the fee; otherwise they could not sell." And he adds: "A fortiori, if an estate is limited to trustees and their heirs in trust to sell or mortgage or to lease, at discretion, or if they are to convey the property in fee, or to divide it equally among certain persons, for to do any or all of these acts requires a legal fee." By the terms of this will, the absolute title is not only prima facie vested in the trustees by the terms of the devise, but it is clear that they cannot perform the duties imposed upon them without having that title. To say that they take the title only during the life of Mrs. Green is to wholly ignore the fact that, by the express terms of their trust, they are to perform active duties after her death.

They must then convey to the issue of Mrs. Green, if she leaves any, not jointly, or as tenants in common, (as seems to be assumed), but in such shares as the mother may by her last will and testament direct. Had section 21 continued to be a part of the trust estate until the period of distribution, and Mrs. Green leaves issue, the trustees might have been directed by her, in her last will, to convey it all to one of such issue, to the exclusion of all others, giving them other property. If it had continued to be a part of such estate, and she made no appointment or direction as to the shares and proportions in which it should be conveyed, still more responsible duties would devolve upon the trustees. They must, in that event, first divide the estate into equal shares among the issue of Mrs. Green, if she leaves any, and then convey it in such equal shares. They might unquestionably under that power convey all or any portion of said section to one of such issue, if in doing so they could at the same time make an equal division of the entire estate. Moreover, the will contemplates that no issue may survive the daughter, and therefore directs the trustees in that event to convey to other parties. There is no more reason for saying the title to the trust estate will vest in the issue of the daughter at her death without a conveyance, than, if she dies without issue, it will without conveyance vest in "the person or persons who, by the present laws of the state of New York, would have taken the same as heirs-at-law and next of kin of Hetty Howland Robinson, if she had died seised and possessed thereof intestate." In any event the trustees must convey. In Kirkland v. Coz, 94 Ill. 400, we were called upon to determine what title passed to trustees under the will of Michael Walsh, deceased, in which the devise was not different in effect from that in this will. Among other directions in the declaration of trust was the following: "The balance of my estate, upon the happening of such contingency, viz., the death of my daughter without issue, I wish divided equally between," etc., naming four corporations. After quoting the foregoing rule from Perry on Trusts, we said: "The property is devised to the trustees to sell and convey, if they deem it advisable, or to hold and control it until it is to be transferred as directed; and in the contingency that has arisen it was intended that it should be the duty of the trustees to make the equal division of the property between the corporations designated, and convey it accordingly; for the grant to these corporations is in severalty, and not as tenants in common, and their title must necessarily rest on the conveyance of the trustees." So here, if for no other purpose, the trustees must hold the title after the death of the daughter, in order that they may, if the contingency named in the trust arises, divide the estate, and convey it in severalty. Many cases are cited by the learned counsel for appellants in support of their contention that the estate of the trustees is only for the life of Mrs. Green, some of which are said to be directly in point. They are all distinguishable from this case in the fact that here active duties are imposed upon these trustees to be performed after the death, and which cannot be known until that time. No beneficial results could be obtained by a review of those cases. We have been unable to find in any one of them a principle in conflict with the views here expressed. It is also to be observed that by the sixth clause of this will the trustees are given power to sell and convey any or all of the realty belonging to the trust estate, and by the fifth clause they are to "convey, transfer," etc., the estate, real and personal, as it exists at the death of the daughter; thus showing that the testator contemplated that a change in his realty between the time of his death and the time of distribution, by sales and conveyances by the trustees, might take place. If we keep in mind the distinction between a mere contingent future interest in the trust estate generally, and a present title or interest in said section 31, the case is free from difficulty. Notwithstanding the fact that these appellants may have an expectancy in the trust estate as it shall exist at the death of their mother, that does not entitle them to be made parties to every suit that the trustees may be called upon to bring or defend, in order to preserve their trust. As we said in American Bible Soc. v. Price, 115 Ill. 644: "The title is in the trustees, and the duty is imposed upon them to protect and preserve this interest for whomsoever shall be ultimately entitled to it. They are parties to the suit, and they stand for and represent, in this litigation, the ownership ultimately entitled to this fund, and such ownership is bound by their representation." So we say here, the title was in the trustees when the Peters suit was brought; they were parties to the action; and they stood for and represented, in that litigation, all parties having a future interest in the trust estate. These appellants are bound by that representation. See also Temple v. Scott (Ill.) 82 N. E. Rep. 866, (filed at October Term, 1892).

The decree of the Circuit Court is in harmony with the views here expressed, and will be affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS (2d Div.).

Enoch C. SWAIN, Resp't.,

v.

(.....N. Y.....)

The damages recoverable from one who sells poisonous coloring matter to be used in the manufacture of ice cream, representing it to be harmless, may include the value of the cream ignorantly spoiled by its use, and also compensation for loss of business by the manufacturer which results from his innocently delivering the poisoned cream to his customers.

NOTE.—Measure of damages for breach of implied warranty.

Whether the warranty is express or implied is immaterial, as in legal effect they are the same. Callender Insulating & Waterproofing Co. v. Badger, 30 Ill. App. 317.

In this case the measure of damages for selling defective electric wires unfit for the purpose for which they were intended was the sum paid.

In Randall v. Newson, L. R. 2 Q. B. Div. 102, where a carriage pole which had been furnished by the defendant broke, and as a result the horses were injured, it was held that the sale of the pole carried with it an implied warranty that it was fit for the use to which it was to be put, and that it should be left to the jury whether or not the injury to the horses naturally resulted from the defective pole.

APPPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Kings County Circuit in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the sale to plaintiff of poisonous coloring matter to be used in the manufacture of ice cream.

Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Jay & Candler, for appellant:

The court erred in permitting evidence of general decline in business, as the complaint was insufficient to entitle the plaintiff to give evidence on that subject.

Wherever the gist of an action is special damages, and the damage alleged is loss of business, it is perfectly well established that the customers must be named who are claimed to have given up dealing with the plaintiff.

A general allegation, such as that in the complaint in this action, is insufficient.

In Hoe v. Sanborn, 36 N. Y. 98, it was said that whether the warranty was considered as express or implied the rule of damages for its breach was the difference between the value of the goods if they had corresponded with the warranty, and their actual value. See also Benjamin, Sales, Bennett's ed. 906.

In Reggio v. Braggiotti, 7 Cush. 166, the court held that the measure of damages for breach of an implied warranty in sale of goods supposed to be opium was the difference between the value of the goods sold and the value of goods that would have corresponded to the warranty.

In Van Wyck v. Allen, 69 N. Y. 61, 25 Am. Rep. 123, where seed which had been sold as of a certain variety of cabbage seed produced no crop the rule of damages was laid down to be the fair value of the crop had the seed been as asserted.

In White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118, 27 Am. Rep. 12, the facts being similar to those in the above case, the rule was held to be the difference in value between the crop actually produced, and the crop that would naturally have been produced that year.

Van Wyck v. Allen and White v. Miller, supra, followed the rule laid down in Passinger v. Thornburn, 34 N. Y. 634, 90 Am. Dec. 753, which was the case of a special warranty.

But in Kansas it has been held that all the losses necessarily sustained by the failure of seed to germinate may be recovered in an action for breach of an implied warranty that it was suitable for sowing. Shaw v. Smith, 11 L. R. A. 681, 45 Kan. 334; Shaw v. Jones, 45 Kan. 339.

For breach of the implied warranty in a sale of a drug to be used for destroying the cotton worm it was held that the seller was liable for the actual expenses incurred in the purchase and application of the compound to the cotton, and for the loss of time, and for every other element of actual damages resulting as a natural or legal sequence from the breach. Jones v. George, 56 Tex. 149, 42 Am. Rep. 699.

In French v. Vining, 102 Mass. 122, 3 Am. Rep. 440, where a cow had died from the effects of poison in hay sold by defendant, it was held that the measure of damages was the value of the cow.

Copas v. Anglo-American Provision Co., 73 Mich. 541, where hams were sold, there was held to be an 18 L. R. A.

This principle, that the defendants have a right to force the plaintiff to prove the individual third persons whom the plaintiff claims were induced to do something injurious to the plaintiff, or prevented from doing something beneficial to the plaintiff, is of general application.

The court erred in refusing to direct a verdict for the defendants because the damage to the plaintiff's business, if any, was the result of persons losing confidence in the plaintiff himself.

implied warranty that they were fit for food, and that if wholly worthless the purchaser could recover back the price paid, if not wholly worthless the difference between the price paid and the actual value.

In Best v. Flint, 58 Vt. 543, it was said that the plaintiff who in selling unmarketable hogs to the defendant had broken the implied warranty that they should be fit for the purpose for which they were intended, must allow the damages sustained in reduction of the price.

A sale of ice to a retail dealer with knowledge that he intends to use it to supply his customers without disclosing the fact, known to the vendor, that it is unfit for the purpose, is a deceit entitling the purchaser to an abatement of price, although he has sold the ice, and no representations were made by the vendor as to the quality, and the purchaser made inquiries of others in respect thereto. *Joplin Water Co. v. Follett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1888 and 1889 the defendants were druggists and engaged in business at the city of New York. In those years the plaintiff was a manufacturer of ice cream and ices at the city of Brooklyn, which he sold to persons and families for immediate consumption. The defendants knew the character of the business in which the plaintiff was engaged. December 28, 1888, the defendants, for $2, sold and delivered to the plaintiff a bottle of "carlet red," which they had previously manufactured, representing "that it was absolutely pure and harmless." The defendants knew that it was purchased for coloring certain kinds of ice creams and ices. One of the defendants testified that the formula for "carlet red" is "one ounce of red aniline, half a gallon of alcohol, and two pounds of glycerine, which, when mixed, makes 96 fluid ounces of 'carlet red.'" March 4, 1889, the plaintiff manufactured some strawberry ice cream and apricot ice, using "carlet red" to give them color, and sold them to about forty different families, who were customers of his. About 200 persons who ate of the cream and apricot ice were sick with symptoms of arsenical poisoning. An analysis of the "carlet red" showed that it contained arsenic. Some of the persons who ate of these articles became slightly, and others seriously, ill. By reason of the sickness, complaints, and the discovery by the chemists of arsenic in the "carlet red," the plaintiff destroyed all of the ice creams and ices colored with that material, and he asserts that the occurrences greatly injured his business. He brings this action to recover (1) the value of the ice cream and ices destroyed, and (2) the damages occasioned by the loss of customers, of sales, and profits thereon subsequent to the occurrences complained of. The trial court submitted the questions of fact to the jury in a charge which was not excepted to in any respect except as to the rule of damages laid down, and we must determine the case upon the theory that the issues of fact were well found for the plaintiff.

The important question presented by this appeal is, What damages was the plaintiff entitled to recover? The principle on which damages should be assessed is well stated in the recent case of Wakeman v. Wheeler & Wilson Mfg. Co., 101 N. Y. 205, 54 Am. Rep. 676, 18 L. R. A.

where it is said: "When it is certain that damages have been caused by a breach of contract, and the only uncertainty is as to their amount, there can rarely be good reason for refusing, on account of such uncertainty, any damages whatever for the breach. A person violating his contract should not be permitted entirely to escape liability because the amount of the damages which he has caused is uncertain. It is not true that loss of profits cannot be allowed as damages for a breach of contract. Losses sustained and gains prevented are proper elements of damage." That the plaintiff was damaged by reason of the impurity of the "carlet red" has been found by the jury upon conflicting evidence, and the verdict is binding upon this court upon the questions of fact. This injury was brought about by the breach of the contract by the defendants. When one violates his contract or his duty to another, the theory of the law is that compensation shall be made for the injury directly and proximately caused by the breach of contract or duty. Ordinarily, upon the sale and delivery of a chattel, accompanied by a warranty of its quality, which is broken, the measure of damages is the difference between its value, had it been as warranted, and as it proved to be. But it seems to be conceded that this rule is not applicable to the case at bar, if it is, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the value of the property destroyed, but the difference in the value of the "carlet red" as it was warranted to be and as it was found to be, which could not have exceeded the purchase price of $2. In case a manufacturer of goods sells them to a purchaser to be used for a particular purpose, which is known by the vendor at the time of the sale, a more liberal rule prevails than in cases where like articles are sold as merchandise, for general purposes. In the former cases, profits lost and expenses incurred may be recovered. Passinger v. Thorburn, 84 N. Y. 634, 90 Am. Dec. 753; Van Wyck v. Allen, 69 N. Y. 61, 25 Am. Rep. 136; White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118, 27 Am. Rep. 13; White v. Miller, 78 N. Y. 893, 34 Am. Rep. 544; Messmore v. New York Shot & Lead Co. 40 N. Y. 422; Booth v. Spuyten Duyvil Roll. Mill Co. 60 N. Y. 487. This broader rule rests on the theory that the vendor, having sold the articles with the knowledge that they were purchased for a particular purpose, should be held liable for such damages as naturally flow from the breach of his contract, and which he, or any reasonable man, might apprehend would follow from the breach. In the present case the defendants knew the precise use which the "carlet red" was to be put to, and we think it is reasonable to hold that they should have apprehended that the use by the plaintiff of a poisonous or deleterious article would destroy his business. It seems to us that the natural and probable result of the sale of a poisonous for a wholesale article, to be used by the purchaser in the preparation of food to be distributed to and eaten by its patrons, would entail a loss of business and of profit to the purchaser. Had the defendants incorrectly, but without malice, reported that the plaintiff had sold unwholesome or poisonous ice cream, they would have been liable for the plaintiff's loss of custom, (Hallock v. Miller, 2 Barb. 630; Bergmann v. Jones, 94 N. Y. 51;) although not, in the case supposed, for punitive or exemplary damages. The rules governing the assessment of damages are the same in contract as in tort unless exemplary damages are recoverable. Baker v. Drake, 58 N. Y. 211, 18 Am. Rep. 507; 2 Sedgw. Damages, 8th ed. p. 29, § 80; Id. p. 4, § 429.

In Crain v. Petrie, 6 Hill, 522, 41 Am. Rep. 765, an executory contract existed between Petrie and Gage, a butcher, by which the latter agreed to purchase of the former a quantity of mutton. Gage refused to accept of the mutton, because he learned that Crain had sold diseased sheep to Petrie. The action was to recover damages for selling diseased sheep. The plaintiff sought to recover the damages occasioned him by the nonfulfillment of Gage's contract, and also the damages sustained by the refusal of others to purchase mutton of him. The court, in discussing the right to recover special damages, said that such damages "must appear to be the legal and natural consequences arising from the tort, and not from the wrongful act of a third party, remotely induced thereby.

That the refusal of Gage to receive and sell good and well-cured hams, shoulders," etc., "contrary to a previous arrangement with him, in consequence of the reports that the plaintiff had purchased a lot of diseased sheep of the defendant, was a wrongful breach of contract by Gage, for which the plaintiff had an adequate remedy against him, and therefore such damages could not be recovered against Crain, who sold the sheep." The court in its opinion cites Vicars v. Wilcocks, 8 East, 1, and Morris v. Langdale, 2 Bos. & P. 284, which lay down the same rule, but these cases have been expressly overruled. Lumley v. Gye, 2 El. & Bl. 216; Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. Cas. 577, 586, 590, 600; Green v. Button, 2 Crompt. M. & R. 707, Tyrw. & G. 118; Mayne, Damages, 4th ed. 661; Starkie, Slander & Libel, 4th Eng. ed. 320, 488; 1 Suth. Damages, 68; 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 464. The only authorities referred to by the two text-writers cited in Crain v. Petrie, supra, are the two overruled cases. Petrie's case is distinguishable from the one at bar in the fact that he did not purchase the sheep to sell to persons who were to use them for food, but he intended to sell them to a butcher, who was to sell to consumers; besides, it was not shown in that case that the defendant knew that the plaintiff purchased the sheep for the purpose of having them converted into food, even by others. Again, Petrie did not sell the diseased sheep, so he sustained no loss by reason of their sale.

The case at bar is distinguishable from a class of cases in which the damages sought to be recovered arise from a breach of the contract or of duty, or from the wrongful act of a third person, which breach of contract, duty, or wrongful act may have been remotely caused by the person sued. In such cases the person injured has a right of action against those who have violated their contract or duty, or have committed a wrongful act, to his injury, but here this plaintiff has no cause of action against his former customers, who refused to patronize him because of his sale of poisonous ice cream.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

Parker, Brown, and Landon, JJ., concur.

Bradley, J., concurring:

The jury found that the plaintiff's product of ice cream, etc., which became useless by reason of its infection with the compound purchased of the defendants, and was destroyed, had the value of $50. To that extent the damages sustained clearly came within the rule of relief. But the plaintiff claims, further, that he was injured in his business by this act of the defendants, and the evidence in its support was that of his average monthly receipts for the year ending in March, 1889, and those for the three months following that time. This basis of estimate was somewhat speculative or uncertain, as there may, within that period of three months, have been some other causes for a less average of monthly receipts during such time than for the entire year preceding. But, as no exception was taken to the charge as made by the court, or to its refusal to charge on the subject of damages, other than such as went to the right of the plaintiff to recover anything, the question whether the plaintiff should be allowed to recover special damages for injury to his business was not specifically or necessarily raised after the close of the evidence. Nor is the exception taken to the denial of the motion to reduce the damages awarded by the verdict available on this review. Oldfield v. New York & H. R. Co. 14 N. Y. 310; Standard Oil Co. v. Amazon Ins. Co. 79 N. Y. 506. The only question here in that respect arises upon the exception taken to the reception of the evidence on the subject of the average monthly receipts, before referred to, of the plaintiff's business; and the admissibility or the inadmissibility of that evidence is dependent upon the question whether or not the plaintiff's loss, occasioned by injury to his business, may be deemed a proper element of damages. It may be if there was no intermediate efficient course to which the injury may have been imputed. In such case the result usually may be attributed to the primary as the proximate cause. Such was the case of the lighted squib thrown by the party charged into a crowd of people, and then, for self-protection, thrown by one after another until it injured the party who recovered damages for the injury, (Scott v. Shepherd, 2 W. Bl. 892, 3 Wils. 408;) and where the boy, in escaping the threatened attack of the party pursuing him, ran against and knocked out the faucet of a cask of wine, the pursuing party was held liable for the loss, (Vandenburgh v. Truax, 4 Denio, 464.) The injurious results which may or ought to be foreseen of a wrongful or negligent act are also deemed the proximate consequences of it. This was illustrated in the familiar case of the person in the balloon descending into the garden under circumstances which invited people to go to his assistance, and in doing so trampled the vegetables, etc., for which he was held liable. Guille v. Swan, 19 Johns. 381. In those cases, and others similar in principle, the damages suffered were deemed the proximate result of the wrongful or negligent acts of the parties charged.

In the present case, so far as the plaintiff's property was injuriously affected or contaminated by the use of the compound sold him by the defendants, the damages were attributable directly to the act complained of, and to that extent he was properly permitted to recover. Jeffrey v. Bigelow, 13 Wend. 518; Mullett v. Mason, L. R. 1 C. P. 559. Beyond that, the damages claimed for injury to business, and for loss of profits which the plaintiff may otherwise have realized from his trade, were special and consequential. The question is whether they were the natural and proximate result of the act chargeable to the defendants. In Crain v. Petrie, 6 Hill, 522, the defendant was charged with fraudulently selling diseased sheep to the plaintiff, who was engaged in the butchering business and selling mutton. The plaintiff there gave evidence, subject to exception, that one Gage, who had agreed to take mutton from him, and also other customers of the plaintiff, declined to do so in consequence of the report that he had purchased the diseased sheep. The court, on review, held that the reception of the evidence was error; that, so far as related to the refusal of Gage to take mutton, it was a breach of contract, for which the plaintiff had his remedy against him, and that the discontinuance of purchases by others "resulted from a want of confidence in the care, skill, or integrity of the plaintiff himself; the people assuming that he might sell the meat of diseased sheep for a good and merchantable article." And Chief Justice Nelson there said: "The consequential loss which the plaintiff was allowed to prove at the trial was too remote and speculative to come within any established rule on the subject;" and that "to maintain a claim for special damages this must appear to be the legal and natural consequences arising from the tort, and not from the wrongful act of a third party, remotely induced thereby; in other words, the damages must proceed wholly and exclusively from the injury complained of." The proposition there, in its relation to the claim founded upon the refusal of Gage to take mutton as he had agreed, is clearly distinguishable in principle from that in the case at bar. The refusal of Gage was a violation of his contract, and it might be treated as the efficient and immediate cause of the damages so occasioned to the plaintiff within the doctrine that when the original wrong is rendered injurious by reason only of the intervention of some independent wrongful act of another, the latter will be treated as the proximate cause of the injury, which will be imputed to it alone. Hoey v. Felton, 11 C. B. N. S. 142; Vicars v. Wilcocks, 8 East, 1; Ward v. Weeks, 7 Bing. 211; Terrwilliger v. Wanda, 17 N. Y. 54, 72 Am. Dec. 420; Louvery v. Western U. Tel. Co. 60 N. Y. 18 L. R. A.

198, 19 Am. Rep. 154. This rule was not applicable to his other customers, who for like reason had ceased to buy his meat; and apparently there is no distinction in principle between the Crain Case, in that respect, and the present one, so far as relates to the claim for special damages resulting from the loss or reduction of the business of the plaintiff; and therefore, by giving controlling application to this case of the views of Mr. Chief Justice Nelson, as broadly as expressed in Crain v. Petrie, the consequential injury to the plaintiff's business might not be treated as imputed to the act of the defendants as the legal or proximate cause, but would be deemed attributable, in that sense, to the want of confidence in the care, skill or integrity of the plaintiff. As has already been observed, there may be in the causation a succession of dependent acts or events, through which may be traced the primary as the proximate cause of the resulting injury; and, when injurious consequences which proceed from a wrongful or negligent act may or ought to have been foreseen, the author of it is responsible. A dealer in food products, who is known to use deleterious substances in their production, cannot expect much patronage in that line of trade, and it could, with ordinary forecast, be foreseen that the supply to him of poisonous compounds to use for such purpose would, if made public, be materially prejudicial to his business. The publicity of the fact of the purchase by him of poisons to be so used would have an effect in that direction similar to that of the report of his use of them for such purpose, and differing, if at all, in degree only.

In the present case, the published imputation that the plaintiff had sold poisonous ice cream seems to have been justified by the fact, and the compound by which his product was so infected was innocently used by the plaintiff, upon the faith of the defendants' representation that it was wholesome. The disposition made of the Crain Case was not dependent upon the exception to evidence offered to prove that the customers other than Gage had ceased to deal with Petrie. It could rest upon the proposition that the violation by Gage of his contract was the only cause to which the damages resulting from his refusal to take mutton were legally imputable, and for which he alone was liable to Petrie, the plaintiff in that action at the trial, and defendant in error on the review; and, in view of the legal principles to which advertence has been made, the Crain Case may properly and should be limited to that proposition in its application to the present one. There was here no intermediate wrongful or negligent act to which the consequential injury to the plaintiff or the special damages sustained by him can be imputed. In view of the facts as found by the jury in respect to the nature of the compound, those damages followed, according to the ordinary course of events, from the cause complained of, and may be deemed the legitimate sequence of it. The judgment should be affirmed.

Damages for injuries after the commencement of a suit cannot be given in an action for a continuing nuisance such as a roof and eave trough so placed as to send water against plaintiff's house upon the occurrence of every rain storm.

(November 2, 1892.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Third District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Sangamon County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful erection of a building so near to plaintiff's property that water was thereby cast upon and into plaintiff's buildings in such a manner as to diminish their value. Reversed.

Statement by Magruder, J.:

This is an action on the case, begun on April 17, 1890, in the circuit court of Sangamon county, by the appellee against the appellant company. In the trial court the verdict and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff, which judgment has been affirmed by the appellate court. The declaration consists of two counts. The first count alleges that plaintiff was possessed of certain premises in Springfield, in which she and her family resided, and that the defendant, to wit, on April 20, 1885, wrongfully erected a certain building near said premises in so careless, negligent, and improper a manner that on said day and afterwards, "and before the commencement of this suit," large quantities of rain water flowed upon, against, and into said premises and the walls, roofs, ceilings, beams, papering, floors, stairs, doors, cellar, basement, and other parts thereof, and weakened, impaired, and damaged the same, by reason whereof said messuage and premises became and are damp and less fit for habitation. The second count alleges that plaintiff was the possessor, occupier, and owner of said messuage and premises, in which she and her family dwelt, and the defendant to wit, on said day, caused quantities of water to run into, against, and upon the same, and the walls, roofs, floors, cellars, etc., thereof, and thereby greatly weakened, impaired, wetted, and damaged the same. By reason whereof said premises became and were and are damp, inconvenient, and less fit for habitation. The plea was not guilty. The proof tends to show that plaintiff's building is a two-story brick building, with a cellar underneath, the front room on the first floor being used as a butcher's shop, and the rest of the building being used as a dwelling; that the building was erected several years before that of the defendant; that defendant's building is on the lot west of plaintiff's lot, and is about sixty feet long, having an office in front and a beer-bottling establishment in the rear, and has one roof, which slants towards plaintiff's property; that there are three windows on the west side of plaintiff's house, besides the three cellar windows; that her wall is a little over two feet from the west line of her lot; that when it rains the water flows against her west wall, and some of it into her windows and cellar from the roof of defendant's building; that the eave trough is so far below the eave that the water runs over it into the windows, etc.

Messrs. Palmer & Shutt, for appellant:

The defendant's breach of duty was the building of the roof and its pitch which caused the injury to the extent of the flow of the water upon the roof. It was against this he was bound to protect the plaintiff.

Gould v. McKenna, 86 Pa. 297, 27 Am. Rep. 707.

The right of the defendant to erect and maintain a building upon its own premises is not questioned; and it may construct it in such manner as it chooses. It is only when, and so long as, it injures, or continues to injure others, by such use of property, that it can be regarded as a wrongdoer.

In such a case a party can only recover damages for acts done before the suit was commenced.

Cooper v. Randall, 59 Ill. 321.

One may bring a suit for the deterioration in value of real property from a nuisance, alleging its permanency, and by such an action the plaintiff consents to the continuance of the nuisance, and accepts the judgments recovered, as a compensation therefor,—such recovery will have the effect to give the defendant a permanent right to do the acts which constitute the nuisance, as fully as though there had been a condemnation of the property by the exercise of the right of eminent domain.

In the case of nuisances which are transient rather than permanent in their character, the continuance of the injurious acts is considered a new nuisance, for which a fresh action will lie.

future injury to the property may be recovered in one suit, and such recovery will be a bar to all future actions therefor.

Kankakee & S. R. Co. v. Horan, 181 Ill. 301.

The above cases demonstrate that there is no purpose to depart from the well-recognized common-law rules, limiting damages for nuisances of a transient or private character, or those where the future damages can only result from the continued wrongdoing of the defendant to such as arise from acts committed prior to the commencement of the action. No injury can be deemed a permanent one within the rule, but such as results from the existence of a lawful structure, and where the legal right to maintain it in its then condition exists, and where the judgment is to be deemed in effect the conveyance or recognition of such right.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Proof was introduced of damage done to plaintiff's property after the commencement of the suit by reason of rain storms then occurring. The defendant asked, and the court refused to give, the following instruction: "The court instructs the jury that the suit now being tried was commenced in the month of April, 1890, and that they are not to take into consideration the question as to whether or not any damage has accrued to plaintiff's property since the commencement of this suit." The question presented is whether plaintiff was entitled to recover only such damages as accrued before and up to the beginning of her suit, leaving subsequent damages to be sued for in subsequent suits, or whether she was entitled to estimate and recover in one action all damages resulting both before and after the commencement of this suit. The rule originally, at common law, was that in personal actions damages could be recovered only up to the time of the commencement of the action. 8 Com. Dig. title, Damages, D. The rule subsequently prevailing in such actions is that damages accruing after the commencement of the suit may be recovered, if they are the natural and necessary result of the act complained of, and where they do not themselves constitute a new cause of action. Wood's Mayne, Damages, § 108; Birchard v. Booth, 4 Wis. 67; Slater v. Rink, 18 Ill. 527; Fetter v. Beale, 1 Salk. 11; Honell v. Goodrich, 69 Ill. 556. In actions of trespass to the realty, it is said that damages may be recovered up to the time of the verdict, (Com. Dig. 863, title, Damages, D;) and the reason why, in such cases, all the damages may be recovered in a single action, is that the trespass is the cause of action, and the injury resulting is merely the result of damages. 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 16, case cited in note 2. But in the case of nuisances or repeated trespasses recovery can ordinarily be had only up to the commencement of the suit, because every continuance or repetition of the nuisance gives rise to a new cause of action, and the plaintiff may bring successive actions as long as the nuisance lasts. McConnell v. Kibbe, 29 Ill. 488, and 33 Ill. 175; Chicago, R. I. & P. E. Co. v. Moffitt, 75 Ill. 524; Chicago, B. & Q. E. Co. v. Schaffer, 124 Ill. 112. The cause of action, in case of an ordinary nuisance, is not so much the act of the defendant as the injurious consequences resulting from his act, and hence the cause of action does not arise until such consequences occur; nor can the damages be estimated beyond the date of bringing the first suit. 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 17, and cases in notes. It has been held, however, that where permanent structures are erected, resulting in injury to adjacent realty, all damages may be recovered in a single suit. Id. p. 20, and cases in note.

But there is much confusion among the authorities which attempt to distinguish between cases where successive actions lie and those in which only one action may be distinguished. This confusion seems to arise from the different views entertained in regard to the circumstances under which the injury suffered by the plaintiff from the act of the defendant shall be regarded as a permanent injury. "The chief difficulty in this subject concerns acts which result in what effects a permanent change in the plaintiff's land, and is at the same time a nuisance or trespass." Sedgw. Damages, 8th ed. § 94. Some cases hold it to be unreasonable to assume that a nuisance or illegal act will continue forever, and therefore refuse to give entire damages as for a permanent injury, but allow such damages for the continuation of the wrong as accrued up to the date of the bringing of the suit. Other cases take the ground that the entire controversy should be settled in a single suit, and that damages should be allowed for the whole injury, past and prospective, if such injury be proven with reasonable certainty to be permanent in its character. Id. § 94. We think, upon the whole, that the more correct view is presented in the former class of cases. 1 Suth. Damages, 199-202; 3 Suth. Damages, 869-899; 1 Sedgw. Damages, 8th ed. §§ 91-94; Uline v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 101 N. Y. 98; Duryea v. New York, 26 Hun, 120; Blunt v. McCormick, 3 Denio, 288; Cooke v. England, 27 Md. 14, 92 Am. Dec. 680, notes; Reed v. State, 108 N. Y. 407; Hargreaves v. Kimberly, 28 W. Va. 787, 53 Am. Rep. 121; Ottenot v. New York, L. & W. R. Co. 119 N. Y. 603; Cobb v. Smith, 38 Wis. 21; Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Wright, 21 N. J. L. 489; Wells v. New Haven & N. Co. 151 Mass. 46; Barriek v. Schif-ferdecker, 123 N. Y. 52; Sibley Mfg. Co. v. State, 104 N. Y. 562; Aldworth v. Lynn, 153 Mass. 58, 10 L. R. A. 210; Troy v. Cheshire R. Co. 28 N. H. 83, 55 Am. Dec. 177; Cooper v. Randall, 59 Ill. 817; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Hoag, 90 Ill. 389. We do not wish to be understood, however, as holding that the rule laid down in the second class of cases is not applicable under some circumstances, as in the case of permanent injury caused by lawful public structures, properly constructed and permanent in their character. In Uline v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., supra, a railroad company raised the grade of the street in front of plaintiff's lots so as to pour the water therefrom down over the sidewalk into the basement of the houses, flooding the same with water, and rendering them damp, unhealthy, etc., and injuring the rental value, etc. In discussing the question of the damages to which the plaintiff was entitled the court says: "The question, however, still remains, what damages? All her damages upon the assumption that the nuisance was to be permanent, or only such damages as she sustained up to the commencement of the action? . . . There has never been in this state before this case the least doubt expressed in any judicial decision . . . that the plaintiff, in such a case, is entitled to recover only up to the commencement of the action. That such is the rule is as well settled here as any rule of law can be by repeated and uniform decisions of all the courts, and it is the prevailing doctrine elsewhere." Then follows an exhaustive review of the authorities, which sustain the conclusion of the court as above announced. In Duryea v. New York, supra, the action was brought to recover damages occasioned by the wrongful acts of one who had discharged water and sewage upon the land of another, and it was held that no recovery could be had for damages occasioned by the discharge of the water and sewage upon the land after the commencement of the action. In Blunt v. McCormick, supra, the action was brought by a tenant to recover damages against his landlord because of the latter's erection of a building adjoining the demised premises, which shut out the light from the tenant's windows and doors; and it was held that damages could only be recovered for the time which had elapsed when the suit was commenced, and not for the whole term. In Hargreaves v. Kimberly, supra, the action was case to recover damages for causing surface water to flow on plaintiff's lot, and for injury to his trees by the use of coke ovens near said lot, and for injury thereby to his health and comfort; and it was held to be error to permit a witness to answer the following question: "What will be the future damage to the property from the acts of the defendant?" the court saying: "In all those cases where the cause of the injury is in its nature permanent, and a recovery for such injury would confer a license on the defendant to continue the cause, the entire damage may be recovered in a single action, but where the cause of the injury is in the nature of a nuisance, and not permanent in its character, but of such a character that it may be supposed that the defendant would remove it rather than suffer at once the entire damage which it may inflict if permanent, then the entire damage cannot be recovered in a single action; but actions may be maintained from time to time as long as the cause of the injury continues." In Wells v. New Haven & N. Co., supra, where a railroad company maintained a culvert under its embankment, which impaired land by discharging water on it, it was held that the case fell within the ordinary rule applicable to continuing nuisances and continuing trespasses. Reference was made to Uline v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., supra, and the following language was used by the court: "If the defendant's act was wrongful at the outset, as the jury have found, we see no way in which the continuance of its structure in its wrongful form could become rightful as against the plaintiff, unless by release or grant by prescription or by the payment of damages. If originally wrongful, it has not become rightful merely by being built in an enduring manner." In Aldworth v. Lynn, supra, where the action was for damages sustained by a landowner through the improper erection and maintenance of a dam and reservoir by the city of Lynn on adjoining land, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts says: "The plaintiff excepted to the ruling that she was entitled to recover damages only to the date of her writ, and contended that the dam and pond were permanent, and that she was entitled to damages for a permanent injury to her property. An erection unlawfully maintained on one's own land, to the detriment of the land of a neighbor, is a continuing nuisance, for the maintenance of which an action may be brought at any time, and damages recovered up to the time of bringing the suit. . . . That it is of a permanent character, or that it has been continued for any length of time less than what is necessary to acquire a prescriptive right, does not make it lawful, nor deprive the adjacent landowner of his right to recover damages. Nor can the adjacent landowner, in such a case, who sues for damage to his property, compel the defendant to pay damages for the future. The defendant may prefer to change his use of his property so far as to make his conduct lawful. In the present case we cannot say that the defendant may not repair or reconstruct its dam and reservoir in such a way as to prevent percolation with much less expenditure than would be required to pay damages for a permanent injury to the plaintiff's land."

In the case at bar the defendant did not erect the house upon plaintiff's land, but upon its own land. It does not appear that such change might not be made in the roof, or in the manner of discharging the water from the roof, as to avoid the injury complained of. The first count of the declaration, by its express terms, limits the recovery for damages arising from the negligent and improper construction of defendant's building to such injuries as were inflicted "before the commencement of the suit." The second count was framed in such a way as to authorize a recovery of damages for the flow of water upon plaintiff's premises from some other cause than the wrongful construction of the defendant's building; and accordingly plaintiff's evidence tends to show that the eave trough, designed to carry off the water from the roof, was so placed as to fail of the purpose for which it was intended. It cannot be said that the eave trough was a structure of such a permanent character that it might not be changed, nor can it be said that the defendant would not remove the cause of the injury rather than submit to a recovery of entire damages for a permanent injury, or suffer repeated recoveries during the continuance of the injury. The facts in the record tend to show a continuing nuisance, as the same is defined in Aldworth v. Lynn, supra. There is a legal obligation to remove a nuisance; and "the law will not presume the continuance of the wrong, nor allow a licensee to continue a wrong, or a trespass of title, to result from the recovery of damages for prospective misconduct." 1 Suth. Damages, 199, and notes. The question now under consideration has been before this court in Cooper v. Randall, supra. The action was for damages to plaintiff's premises, caused by constructing and operating a flouring mill on a lot near said premises, whereby chaff, dust, dirt, etc., were thrown from the mill into plaintiff's house. It was there held that the trial court committed no error in refusing to permit the plaintiff to prove that the chaff thrown upon his premises by the mill after the suit was commenced had seriously impaired the value of the property, and prevented the renting of the house; and we there said:

"When subsequent damages are produced by subsequent acts, then the damages should be strictly confined to those sustained before suit brought." It is true that the operation of the mill, causing the dust to fly, was the act of the defendant; but it cannot be said that it was not the continuing act of the present appellant to allow the roof or the eave trough to remain in such a condition as to send the water against appellee's house upon the occurrence of a rain storm. Nor is appellant's house or eave trough any more permanent than was the mill in the Cooper Case. In Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Hoag, supra, a railroad company had turned its waste water from a tank upon the premises of the plaintiff, where it spread and froze, and a recovery was allowed for damages suffered after the commencement of the suit; but it there appeared that the ice, which caused the damage, was upon plaintiff's premises before the beginning of the suit, and the damage caused resulted from the melting of the ice after the suit was brought. It was there said: "The injury sustained by appellee between the commencement of the suit and the trial was not from any wrongful act done by appellant during that time, but followed from acts done before the suit was commenced." Here, the water, which caused the injury, was not upon plaintiff's premises, either in a congealed or liquid state, before the beginning of the suit, but flowed thereon as the result of rain storms which occurred after the suit was commenced. We think the correct rule upon this subject is stated as follows: "If a private structure or other work on land is the cause of a nuisance or other tort to the plaintiff, the law cannot regard it as permanent, no matter with what intention it was built; and damages can therefore be recovered only to the date of the action." 1 Sedgw. Damages, 8th ed. § 98. It follows from the foregoing observations that it was error to allow the plaintiff to introduce proof of damage to her property caused by rain storms occurring after the commencement of her suit, and that the instruction asked by the defendant upon that subject, as the same is above set forth, should have been given.

The judgments of the Appellate and Circuit Courts are reversed, and the cause is remanded to the Circuit Court.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

ATLANTIC EXPRESS CO., Appt.,
v.
WILMINGTON & WELDON R. CO.
et al.

(.....N. C.)

1. Investing a railroad commission with authority to make just and reasonable rules and regulations to prevent excessive charges and unjust discriminations and preferences by carriers, the reasonableness and legality of which is reviewable by the courts, is not unconstitutional as a delegation of legislative power.

2. Authority is given to the railroad commission to hear and determine complaints of unjust discriminations and pref-

NOTE.—The conflict of decisions on the question of a railroad company's obligation to give equal facilities for transportation to express companies makes any new decision on that question important. The North Carolina court adopts the decision 18 L. R. A.

ion of the Supreme Court of the United States in Memphis & L. R. Co. v. Southern Exp. Co. 117 U. S. 1, 29 L. ed. 791.

But the great weight of that decision is lessened by the fact that it was made against the dissent of erences under the North Carolina Railroad Commission Act which expressly provides that if a railroad company is guilty of a violation of the rules of the commission and after due notice of such violation does not make full recompense for the wrong or injury done, it shall incur a penalty, and also constitutes such commission a court of record.

3. The details of practice and pleading may be supplied by a railroad commission which is constituted a court of record under the inherent power of every court of record to make such rules not inconsistent with the law as are necessary to the exercise of the powers conferred upon it.
4. A statute making it unlawful for any common carrier to give undue or unreasonable preference to any person, company, firm, corporation or locality does not require equal facilities to be given to express companies for carrying on business over a railroad unless it holds itself out as a common carrier of such companies.
5. A railroad company is not under obligation to furnish an express company with facilities for doing an express business upon its road such as it provides for itself or some other express company, unless it holds itself out as a common carrier of express companies.

Shepherd, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Although we are of the opinion, for the reasons hereinafter stated, that the particular relief asked for in this proceeding is not authorized by the provisions of what is known as the "Railroad Commission Act," still we do not feel at liberty to ignore the important question of jurisdiction suggested in the answers of the defendants and the arguments of counsel. The question is a serious one, and involves in a great measure the efficiency of the legislation designed for the "supervision" of railroad companies and other common carriers in respect to the fixing of reasonable freight and passenger tariffs, the prevention of unjust discriminations and preferences, and the regulation of other matters pertaining to transportation within the state, in which the public is deeply interested. That the Legislature has the authority to provide reasonable rules and regulations for the effectuating of such purposes is too well settled to admit of discussion (Durham & N. R. Co. v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 104 N. C. 678; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Iowa, 94 U. S. 155, 24 L. ed. 94; Dubuque & R. C. R. Co. v. Richmond, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 584, 23 L. ed. 178;) and it is equally well settled that, in delegating such authority to a commission, it does not transcend its constitutional powers. Stone v. Farmers Loan & Trust Co. 116 U. S. 307, 29 L. ed. 636; 19 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 686, and the numerous authorities cited in the notes.

"The difference between the power to pass a law and the power to adopt rules and regulations to carry into effect a law already 18 L. R. A.

passed is apparent and great; and this we understand to be the distinction recognized strikingly by all the courts as the true rule in determining whether or not, in such cases, a legislative power is granted. The former would be unconstitutional, whilst the latter would not." Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Smith, 70 Ga. 694, 9 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 385. A careful scrutiny of the Act of Assembly constituting a "railroad commission" (Acts 1891, chap. 320) fails to disclose a purpose to confer upon that body anything in the nature of legislative power. The Act, among other things, denounces excessive charges, unjust discriminations and preferences, as unlawful, and invests the commission with authority to "make such just and reasonable rules and regulations as may be necessary for preventing" the same; the reasonableness and legality of such rules and regulations being reviewable by the courts. This power, as we have just seen, may be delegated to a commission, and any objection on that ground is therefore untenable.

It is insisted, however, that the commission has no jurisdiction to entertain and pass upon complaints made in respect to the violation of the provisions of section 4, and perhaps other sections, of the said Act. That section declares that all unjust discriminations and preferences shall be unlawful, and it is urged that the only remedy provided against its infraction is by indictment, to be prosecuted in a court of competent jurisdiction. It is very plain to us that the contention is without foundation, as in section 5 the authority of the commission to make rules and regulations for the prevention of these very acts is expressly conferred. The subjects embraced in section 4 are perhaps the most important that are confided to the regulation of the commission; and, without reference to the plain language of the Act, it is hardly to be supposed that the Legislature intended to insert therein a merely penal provision, entirely independent of and unconnected with the duties imposed upon that body. Neither is there any force in the argument that the Legislature cannot confer judicial powers upon the commission, as the Constitution (art. 4, § 2) expressly authorizes the establishment of such courts inferior to the supreme court as the Legislature may deem proper; and it is to be observed that the commission has been "created and constituted a court of record," with all the "powers and jurisdiction of a court of general jurisdiction as to all subjects embraced in the Act creating" the same. Acts 1891, chap. 498. Whether a court having no power to enforce its judgments fulfills the definition of a court of record and of general jurisdiction is unnecessary to be considered. It is sufficient to say that the Legislature has the authority to establish courts inferior to the supreme court, and to "allot and distribute" its jurisdiction "as it may deem proper." Const. art. 4, § 12. The question, then, is simply whether the power to hear and determine complaints of this character has been conferred, and this is easily solved by a perusal of section 10 of the said Act, which is as follows: "That if any railroad company doing business in this state, by its agent or employes, shall be guilty of a violation of the rules and regulations provided and prescribed by said commissioners, and if, after due notice of such violation, given to the principal officer thereof, . . . ample and full recompense for the wrong or injury done thereby to any person or corporation, as may be directed by said commissioners, shall not be made within thirty days from the time of such notice, such company shall incur a penalty for each offense of not less than fifty dollars nor more than five thousand dollars, to be fixed by the judge of the court in which such action shall be tried. An action for the recovery of such penalties shall lie in any county of the state where such violation has occurred or wrong has been perpetrated, and shall be in the name of the state of North Carolina. The commissioners shall institute such action through the attorney-general or solicitor of the judicial district in which the violation has occurred," etc.

It must be noted that the present proceeding is not an action instituted by the commissioners for the enforcement of penalties; nor is it, as suggested, an ordinary civil action for the recovery of damages, as is provided in section 11 of the Act. It is brought for the purpose of seeking "ample and full recompense" for the alleged "wrong and injury" done the complainant. The Act looks beyond the mere infliction of a penalty for the violation of a rule or regulation, and evidently provides for specific redress in the premises. This redress is to be "directed by said commissioners" upon due notice to the party complained of; and it is difficult to understand how the proper measure of relief can be ascertained except by the examination of testimony. The necessary conclusion, therefore, must be that the commission has the authority to hear and determine all matters that are embraced within that part of the said section to which we have referred.

No summons was issued in the present proceeding, as in civil actions, but, upon a complaint being filed, the defendants were notified to "satisfy the complaint or answer the same" within thirty days. After hearing the testimony, the commission declared, in effect, that the rule and regulation made pursuant to the law had been violated, and that "ample and full recompense" should be made by providing the complainant with the facilities mentioned in the order. It is insisted that, as no procedure is provided, the commission has no authority to make an order of this character. It is true that no particular rules of practice are prescribed; but the power to hear and determine, upon notice, is, as we have seen, expressly given, and all necessary means are provided for the conducting of any inquiry which it is the duty of the commission to make. Provision is made for the service of notices the attendance of witnesses, and the punishment of contempts; and the rules of evidence are declared to be the same as in civil actions. It is also provided that there may be an appeal, "as in other cases of appeal," from "all decisions or determinations arising under the operation or enforcement" of the Act. We cannot hold that, with all of these facilities provided by law, a power expressly granted to hear and determine is to be denied because the particular form of the complaint, or the manner in which the proceeding is to be entitled, or some other immaterial matter of detail, is not particularly prescribed. Besides, such details may well be supplied by the commission under the inherent power of every court of record to make such rules, not inconsistent with the law, as are necessary to the exercise of the powers conferred upon them. 4 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 450, and the cases cited. It must be admitted, however, that in many respects the act is singularly obscure and confused. It bears the impress of hasty legislation, and seems to be composed of parts of other Acts of a similar character, united with but little regard to order or perspicuity. Its amendment, in many particulars, may well be considered by the lawmakers. Among its defects we find the strange omission of any provision in section 10 as to the effect to be given to the determination of the commissioners in an action brought in the superior court for the enforcement of the penalties prescribed. Whether, in the absence of an appeal, such a determination is conclusive, or whether it simply amounts to a prima facie case, are questions left in very great doubt. This, however, cannot affect the right to hear and determine what recompense shall be made to an injured party. The power is expressly conferred, and it is the duty of the commission, in all proper cases, to exercise it. The effect of such a determination, when brought before the courts, is quite another thing. We are therefore of the opinion that the commission has ample authority to entertain and pass upon complaints for a violation of any rule or regulation respecting the matters embraced within section 4 of the said Act.

Having disposed of the question of jurisdiction, we will now inquire whether the present complainant is entitled to the particular relief which it seeks in this proceeding. It must be borne in mind, in considering this case, that there is no complaint that the demands of the public—that is, the demands of persons who desire to ship express freight—are not fully met and supplied. The controversy is solely between the respective corporations, and the real question is not whether the defendant railroad companies are authorized to do an express business for themselves, nor whether they must carry express matter for the public on their passenger trains, in the immediate charge of some person specially appointed for that purpose, nor whether they shall carry express freight for the complainant company as they carry like freight for the general public, but whether it is their duty to furnish the complainant with facilities for doing an express business upon their roads, the same in all respects as those they provide for themselves or afford to any other express company. That this is a proper statement of the question is apparent from the application of the complainant and the findings of the commission. It distinctly appears that the complainant made no actual tender of any article of freight to be transported by the defendants, but that it demanded "rates and facilities for conducting an express business over their roads in this state," and that each of the defendants "should furnish it with a car or carriage over its respective lines, and rates of transportation, as well within as without the limits of the state, for shipment of goods within the scope of its organization." It is not insisted that the defendants have ever held themselves out as common carriers of express companies, "that is to say, as common carriers of common carriers" (Express Cases, 117 U. S. 1, 29 L. ed. 791); and the chief point to be determined is whether, in the absence of such a usage, the law imposes a duty of that character upon them. It is contended that such a duty is imposed by the following provision of section 4 of the Act constituting the commission: "That it shall be lawful for any common carrier, subject to the provisions of this Act, to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, or to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage, in any respect whatsoever." We are of the opinion that the foregoing provision does not change or enlarge the common-law duty which the defendants owe the complainant. That constitutional provisions in almost the same language have been construed as but declaratory of the common law is shown by various authorities. The Constitution of Colorado declares "that all individuals, associations, etc., shall have equal rights to have persons and property transported over any railroad in this state, and no undue or unreasonable discrimination shall be made in charges or facilities for transportation of freight or passengers within the state." The Constitution of Kansas provides "that no discrimination in charges or facilities in transportation shall be made between transportation companies and individuals, and no railroad company shall make any discrimination or preference in furnishing cars or motive power." The Constitution of Arkansas provides "that all individuals and corporations shall have equal rights to have persons and property transported over railroads, . . . and no undue or unreasonable discrimination shall be made in charges or facilities in transportation." The Constitution of Missouri provides "that no discrimination in charges or facilities in transportation shall be made between transportation companies and individuals, or in favor of either, by abatement, drawback, or otherwise, and no railroad company . . . shall make any preference in furnishing cars or motive power." In speaking of these constitutional provisions, Waite, Ch. J., says: "These provisions impose no greater obligations than the common law would have imposed without them." Atchison, T.

& S. F. R. Co. v. Denver & N. O. R. Co. 110 U. S. 687, 28 L. ed. 291. This high authority settles the question that our Railroad Commission Act does not extend the common-law duty; and it therefore becomes material to inquire whether, at common law, the defendants owed the complainant the duty sought to be imposed in this proceeding. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the Express Cases, supra, has answered the question. It declares that "in the absence of some special statute, there is no law which requires railroads to furnish express facilities to all express companies which may demand them." It must be noted that these cases came from the states of Colorado, Kansas, Arkansas, and Missouri; and it is in the light of the constitutional provisions above quoted that this and the following language of the chief justice is used: "The railroad company performs its whole duty to the public at large, and to each individual, when it affords the public all reasonable express accommodations. If this is done, the railroad company owes no duty to the public, as to the particular agencies it shall select for that purpose. The public require the carriage, but the company may choose its own appropriate means of carriage, always provided they are such as to insure reasonable promptness and security. . . . The constitutions and the laws of the states in which the roads are situated place the companies that own and operate them on the footing of common carriers, but there is nothing which, in positive terms, requires a railroad company to carry all the express companies in the way that, under some circumstances, they may be able, without inconvenience, to carry one company. . . . In some of the states, statutes have been passed which, either in express terms or by judicial interpretation, require railroad companies to furnish equal facilities to all express companies, (as in Maine and New Hampshire,) . . . but these are of comparative recent origin, and thus far seem not to have been generally adopted."

In view of the foregoing authorities, we are of the opinion that so much of the order of the commission as determines that "the refusal of the defendants to grant to the plaintiff facilities for conducting an express business was a violation of the terms of said Act" is not warranted by the statute under consideration.

The judgment of the commission, however, also declares that the defendants have violated rule 8 of the "Regulations Concerning Freight Rates." The rule is as follows: "No railroad company shall, by reason of any contract with any express or other company, decline or refuse to act as a common carrier to transport any articles proper for transportation by the train for which it is offered." We are unable to see that, in view of the facts found, there has been any violation of this rule. No duty is imposed by the rule upon any railroad company, but it merely prohibits the refusal to perform a duty by reason of any contract with an express or other company. We have seen that the defendants did not owe any duty to act as a "common carrier of express companies." Had they owed such a duty, we are very sure that they could not have avoided its performance because of their having made an exclusive contract with the Southern Express Company. We do not think, however, that the rule applies to this case. The defendants have not refused to act as a common carrier, or to transport any article tendered by the complainant. They have refused to afford it facilities for carrying on an express business upon their roads, and this we have seen they had a right to do. In this refusal, they were not guilty of making any discrimination or preference, within the Act of the Legislature. As we have seen, the Supreme Court of the United States has said that they are under no obligation to carry another company; and the mere fact that they are carrying another company does not amount to an unjust or unreasonable preference. It is the duty of the defendants to carry express matter, but they may carry it themselves, or employ competent agencies for that purpose. Express Cases, 117 U. S. 8, 29 L. ed. 791, 28 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 545, and the authorities cited in the notes. The Supreme Court of the United States, in deciding the cases just referred to, stated that "railroad companies are by law carriers of both persons and property. Passenger trains have from the beginning been provided for the transportation primarily of passengers and their baggage. This must be done with reasonable promptness, dispatch, and comfort to the passengers. The express business on passenger trains is in a degree subordinate to the passenger business; and it is consequently the duty of a railroad company, in arranging for the express, to see that there is as little interference as possible with the wants of the passengers. This implies a special understanding and agreement as to the amount of car space that will be afforded, and the condition on which it will be occupied. The space that can be given to the express business on a passenger train is to a certain extent limited. . . . If the general public were complaining that the railroad companies refused to carry express matter themselves on their passenger trains, or to allow it to be carried by others, different questions would be presented." The same remark is applicable if the agencies adopted by the railroads (in this case the Southern Express Company) are not affording the public sufficient facilities. It is further to be observed that the power to fix rates and tariffs for such agencies is conferred upon the commission by section 13 of the Act. We will also observe that, if the defendants had held themselves out as common carriers of express companies, they would have been guilty in this case of discrimination or the giving of a preference, and therefore subject to the regulation of the commission, had that body declared such discrimination or preference, under the circumstances, to have been "unjust" or "unreasonable."

In view of the facts found by the commission, and of the high authority we have cited, we are of the opinion that the defendants have violated no duty imposed by the law. If other duties are to be imposed, it must be by further legislation, and not by the courts. "To what extent it must come, if it comes at all from Congress, and to what extent it may come from the states, are questions we do not now undertake to decide; but that it must come, when it does come, from some source of legislative power, we do not doubt. The Legislature may impose a duty, and, when imposed, it will, if necessary, be enforced by the courts; but unless a duty has been created, either by usage or by contract or by statute, the court cannot be called upon to give it effect." Waite, Ch. J., Express Cases, supra.

The judgment below is affirmed.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

INSTITUTION FOR EDUCATION OF THE MUTE AND BLIND, Plff. in Err.,

John M. HENDERSON, State Auditor.

A statute providing for the payment of bounties by a county treasurer for the destruction of certain wild animals or poisonous weeds, and for planting trees, the amount to be credited in his settlement with the state treasurer, violates a constitutional provision that "no money shall be paid out of the treasury except upon appropriations made by law and on warrant drawn by the proper officer." The fact that the money has not actually reached the treasury does not prevent the application of this provision to money belonging to the state.

Plaintiff in error, the Institute for the Education of the Mute and Blind, as plaintiff below, brought this action for the purpose of compelling the auditor of state to draw his warrant for the amount of an appropriation made by the last General Assembly for the maintenance of the plaintiff institution. The auditor, as a defense to the action, claims that there were no funds in the state treasury wherewith to pay the appropriation. Upon final hearing in the court below this defense was established to the satisfaction of the court and the writ of mandamus denied. The case comes here by writ of error. The following stipulation of counsel may fairly be said to embody the material facts established by the evidence introduced upon the trial: "It is hereby stipulated by and between the above-named parties, by their respective counsel, that the record and bill of exceptions in the above-entitled case disclose that if a certain Act of the Legislature entitled 'Bounties,' approved April 18, 1889, commonly known as the 'Bounty Law,' a certain other Act, entitled 'Trees,' approved February 12, 1881, and a certain other Act, entitled 'Loco or Poison Weed,' approved March 14, 1881, are unconstitutional, that the funds remaining in the hands of the treasurer will be sufficient to pay the appropriation of plaintiff in error mentioned in the petition; but if said laws be constitutional, and the funds of the state shall be diverted for the payment of bounties under said law, then there will be no funds out of which to pay said appropriation."

Hayt, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this proceeding the constitutionality of the Bounty Law of 1889, the Loco Weed Law of 1881, and the Act in Relation to Forest Trees of 1881, is contested. The first of these Acts, in the order in which they occur in the stipulation of counsel, is entitled "An Act to Provide for the Destruction of Wolves, Coyotes, Bears and Mountain Lions, and Providing for a Premium therefor." By this Act it is provided that any person who shall kill any of the animals mentioned shall be entitled to a certain fixed premium therefor. This premium varies in amount for the different animals named. Sess. Laws 1889, p. 85. The second Act covered by the stipulation is entitled "An Act to Encourage the Planting of Trees upon the Roadsides and along the Line of Irrigating Canals, and upon Lands under Irrigation." This Act provides that the planting of trees as specified therein shall not increase the value of the lands for the purpose of assessment and taxation. Furthermore, a premium of $2 for every 100 trees so planted and growing after three years shall be paid each year for seven years after the first three years have elapsed. Sess. Laws 1881, p. 250. The third Act provides that any person who shall dig up any loco or poison weed in accordance with the provisions of the Act "shall receive a premium of 1½ cents per pound for each pound of such weed dug up." Sess. Laws 1881, p. 177. The premiums provided by each of these several Acts are to be paid in the first instance by the county treasurer of the proper county, the amount to be credited to such officer in his settlement for state taxes with the state treasurer.

It must be admitted that the state funds, and not the funds of the county, are drawn upon 18 L. R. A.

for the payment of the bounties provided for by these several Acts. That the Legislature has the power to provide for the payment of bounties is not contested. It is contended, however, that these Acts are in conflict with article 5, § 33, of the state Constitution, which says: "No money shall be paid out of the treasury except upon appropriations made by law, and on warrant drawn by the proper officer in pursuance thereof." Under this provision, when money has been actually paid into the state treasury, a statute providing for its payment other than by appropriation and warrant is void. No argument is needed to demonstrate this. The language employed admits of no other construction. The question presented is therefore narrowed to this: Does this constitutional inhibition apply merely to such money as actually reaches the treasury, or does it apply to funds belonging to the state which have not yet reached the hands of the treasurer?

Counsel, in argument, inveigh against the policy of this legislation. However strongly the practice of paying out money in the manner authorized in these Acts is to be condemned as dangerous and improvident, this is an argument properly addressed to the legislative branch of the government, and not to the courts. The argument here can only be given weight in proportion as it affects the power of the Legislature in the premises.

The provision of the Constitution relied upon to overthrow these Acts varies from that of most of the other states, in that it requires, not only an appropriation, but also a warrant to be drawn, before money can be lawfully paid. Provisions upon the subject are, however, to be found in the national Constitution, and in nearly all of the state Constitutions, which show that the framers of such instruments have with great unanimity considered that a danger existed which should be guarded against. The provision in the national Constitution is as follows: "No money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law, and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public moneys shall be published from time to time." Art. 1, § 9, par. 6. In speaking of the purposes of this section of the Constitution, a learned commentator says: "The object is apparent upon the slightest examination. It is to secure regularity, punctuality, and fidelity in the disbursements of the public money. As all the taxes raised from the people, as well as the revenues arising from other sources, are to be applied to the discharge of the expenses and debts and other engagements of the government, it is highly proper that Congress should possess the power to decide how and when any money should be applied for these purposes. If it were otherwise, the executive would possess an unbounded power over the public purse of the nation, and might apply all its moneyed resources at his pleasure. The power to control and direct the appropriations constitutes a most useful and salutary check upon profusion and extravagance, as well as upon corrupt influence and public peculation. In arbitrary governments the prince levies what money he pleases from his subjects, disposes of it as he thinks proper, and is beyond responsibility or reproach. It is wise to interpose, in a republic, every restraint by which the public treasures, the common fund of all, should be applied with unshrinking honesty to such objects as legitimately belong to the common defense and the general welfare. Congress is made the guardian of this treasure; and, to make their responsibility complete and perfect, a regular account of the receipts and expenditures is required to be published, that the people may know what money is expended, for what purposes, and by what authority." 2 Story, Const. 5th ed. § 1848. The case of Ristine v. State, reported in 20 Ind. 387, will be found an exhaustive and a valuable review of this provision. In the course of the opinion, the court says: "A promise by the government to pay money is not an appropriation. A duty on the part of the Legislature to make an appropriation is not such. A promise to make an appropriation is not an appropriation. The pledge of the faith of the state is not an appropriation of money with which to redeem the pledge. Usage of paying money, in the absence of an appropriation, cannot make an appropriation for future payment. The question is to be settled upon the meaning of the Constitution. Usage may be evidence of the meaning the administrative officers have put upon that instrument, and, as such, entitled to respectful consideration, but it is no binding interpretation; and the late usage was, in fact, probably commenced without much consideration." See also People v. Spruance, 8 Colo. 520. The necessity for an appropriation in each instance is dwelt upon in the opinion, and it is shown that an appropriation is not to be inferred from doubtful or ambiguous language. Notwithstanding the previous strict construction given by the courts to the provision with reference to appropriations, with which construction the framers of our Constitution must be presumed to have been familiar, they were not content with the usual provision upon the subject, and consequently inserted an additional clause, not generally found elsewhere. Under it no money can be paid out unless upon a warrant drawn by the proper officer. It is doubtful if these bounty statutes should be held to comply with the clause requiring an appropriation; but it is not necessary for us to determine this question, in view of the provision for payment without a warrant to be found in each of these acts. People v. Spruance, supra. From the authorities cited, and numerous others which might be added, it is clear that the object of these provisions of the Constitution is to prevent the extravagant and improvident payment of the moneys belonging to the state, and also to furnish a ready check upon the state treasurer. Under it the sanction of two officers must be had before money can be lawfully disbursed.

The attorney-general contends for a construction whereby the provision shall be held to apply only to moneys after the same shall have reached the hands of the state treasurer. This construction is too narrow, and, if adopted, the provision would be unavailing to effectuate the object intended. A cogent element in the construction of the general terms of a Constitution is the consideration of the object to be accomplished and the mischiefs to be avoided, and, like a statute, the instrument is to receive such a construction as will prevent an evasion of its legitimate operation. Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, §§ 518, 521.

As illustrative of the decisions of the courts in cases where the intent has been allowed to control the general language of statutory and constitutional provisions, we cite Wheeler v. McCormick, 8 Blatchf. 267, where a statute was under consideration containing the following: "The original jurisdiction of the circuit court of the southern district of New York shall be confined to causes arising within said district, and shall not be construed to extend to causes arising within the northern district,"—and it was held not to exclude the jurisdiction of the circuit court for the southern district of New York of causes of action arising out of the state. In State v. King, 44 Mo. 283, under an Act requiring insurance companies, before commencing business, to have a certain amount secured by mortgage "on unincumbered real estate," it was held that such real estate must be within the state. In Wayne County v. Detroit, 17 Mich. 390, under a constitutional provision requiring that the "Legislature shall provide for the establishment of a library in each township, and all the fines collected in the several counties and townships for any breach of the penal laws shall be exclusively applied to the support of such libraries," it was held (Judge Cooley delivering the opinion of the court) that the term "counties and townships," as therein used, was meant to include all the municipal subdivisions of the state. In the case of People v. Ray, 8 Lans. 398, it was held that the following constitutional provision: "All contracts for work or materials on any canal shall be made with the person who shall offer to do or provide the same at the lowest price, with adequate security for their performance,"—reposed in certain officers a discretion to determine who is the lowest bidder and what is adequate security, and that the constitutional provision must be applied in its spirit, and not according to the letter of the instrument. In Murray v. Baker, 16 U. S. 8 Wheat. 541, 4 L. ed. 454, the Supreme Court of the United States decided that the term "beyond seas," in the Statute of Limitations of the state of Georgia, meant without the limits of the state where the statute was enacted. In Henry v. Tilson, 17 Vt. 479, in one section the Act under consideration by the court provided a penalty in case any attorney should knowingly receive as fees a greater sum than that allowed by law, and in the following section it was declared that, if any officer or other person should receive any greater fees than provided by law, such person should pay a penalty, etc., and it was held that the latter section should be construed as though the word "knowingly" was also incorporated therein.

Under the construction contended for by the attorney-general, the Legislature may in all cases provide for the disbursement of public moneys before such moneys actually reach the hands of the state treasurer, and thereby entirely defeat the operation of the clause under consideration. This cannot be permitted. The conclusion that payment is only to be made upon a warrant regularly drawn is the only one suggested under which the intent can be effectuated, and, as it is in harmony with the general spirit of the provision, we feel constrained to adopt it. An additional argument in support of the conclusion reached may be drawn from other sections of the Constitution, as heretofore construed by this court. For instance, in fixing the total amount of appropriations for any fiscal year, the Legislature, except in certain specified instances, is limited to the revenue that may properly be applied in the payment of the same. The amount of such revenue is almost entirely a matter of calculation. Re Appropriations, 13 Colo. 816.

To permit the disbursement of an indefinite amount of money, as these bounty Acts contemplate, is to introduce an element of uncertainty into these calculations that will seriously embarrass both the Legislature and the departments in giving effect to section 16, art. 10, of our state Constitution, with relation to the levying of taxes to meet appropriations. In our opinion the several Acts under consideration are plainly in violation of the constitutional provision invoked. If the Legislature desires to pay bounties, it may do so, for all proper purposes, by making the necessary appropriations therefor, to be paid out upon warrant drawn by the auditor upon the state treasurer. Thus the public funds of the state will be protected, and the safeguards provided by the vigilance of the framers of our fundamental law will be given a construction best calculated to prevent the evil aimed at. If warrants have been issued under statutes otherwise free from constitutional objection, and such warrants have not yet been paid, the Legislature still has it within its power to make the necessary appropriation for the payment of the same. In conclusion we call attention to the fact that in the state of Missouri a statute similar to our Act providing for the payment of bounties for the growing of trees has been declared obnoxious to two other constitutional inhibitions. Deal v. Mississippi County, 107 Mo. 464.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Florida, ex rel. George P. FOWLER,

v.

Jesse J. FINLEY.

(.....Fla.....)

*1. Charges preferred against an attorney for the purpose of disbarring him should be clear, specific, and circumstantial, and should be stated with great particularity, that the attorney may know how to defend.

2. In the trial of a proceeding for disbarment of an attorney, the judge, being the arbiter of both the law and the facts, should not delegate the taking of evidence therein to a master, commissioner, or any one else, but should personally hear the evidence of the witnesses for and against the accused, so that in lending or withholding credence to it he may be governed by the same rules and reasons that influence juries when sitting as triers of facts, from

NOTE.—Necessity of bad or fraudulent motive to justify disbarment of an attorney.

The decision in the above case and in State v. Young, 80 Fla.—, that a bad or fraudulent motive must be shown in order to require the disbarment of an attorney should be construed with reference to the charges made in those cases, as there are cases in which disbarment has been ordered without particular reference to the motive which inspired the reprehensible conduct complained of. This is particularly true where attorneys have been disbarred for contempt of court.

Thus charging a judicial officer with corruption in an affidavit filed before him and also in open court is ground for disbarment. Re Murray, 83 N. Y. S. R. 881.

So in Re Woolley, 11 Bush, 95, it is said that an open, notorious, and public insult to the highest tribunal of the state for which an attorney contumaciously refuses in any way to atone may justify the refusal of that tribunal to recognize him in the future as one of its officers. The court further said the attorney might be honest and capable and yet might so conduct himself as continually to interrupt the business of the courts. In that case, however, it appears that the severe penalty of disbarment was not imposed.

In these and in many other cases of disbarment for contempt it would seem to be no defense that the attorney honestly believed himself justified in his conduct.

But where an act is essentially dishonorable it would seem that this in itself was sufficient proof of a bad motive, as in case of taking undue advantage of a client in a property transaction. People v. Murphy, 119 Ill. 159.

Or in offering his services to the adverse party against his former client in a controversy and imparting information acquired in the former employment. United States v. Costen, 88 Fed. Rep. 24.

Or in instigating a second contest as to the validity of a homestead claim against a former client and acting as attorney against him where the subject-matter is the same and the contest is largely based on the same facts. Re O—, 73 Wis. 602.

So it is said in Re Stephens, 77 Cal. 387, that it has always been held ground of disbarment to urge and aid in a prosecution against a person charged with crime and then appear to defend him.

That case decides that such a charge at least calls for an answer and is not demurrable whatever may be the effect of proving the good faith of the attorney.

But such conduct was held to be so far excused as to lessen the penalty to suspension where the attorney was induced to aid the defense by gratitude to the defendant. Re Stephens, 84 Cal. 77.

And advertising to procure divorces for other than legal grounds and without publicity is ground for disbarment. People v. Goodrich, 79 Ill. 148.

But mere ignorance of the law is no ground for the removal of an attorney, at least where the statute requires no knowledge of law as a requisite of admission. Bryant's Case, 24 N. H. 149.

An affidavit morally false, although believed to be literally and technically true, was held not to require disbarment where the court were inclined an observance of the manner and deportment of the witnesses.

3. Where the acts charged against an attorney in a proceeding for disbarment are proved to have been committed, but the proof fails entirely to disclose any bad or fraudulent motive for the commission thereof, either from the act itself or from other circumstances, disbarment is not authorized.

4. While the interlineation into a decree, after it has received the judicial signature, of immaterial words patently omitted therefrom through clerical oversight, may not, in the absence of proof of a bad motive or fraudulent design in the attorney who perpetrates it, be cause for disbarment, still any manner of tampering with the decree of a court after it receives the sanction of the judge's signature, no matter in how small a particular, and no matter how innocent or immaterial the alteration may be, is highly reprehensible and deserves severe punishment. In recognition of the sanctity of judicial decrees, Chancery Court Rule 87 has been provided, requiring an order of the court for the correction of clerical mistakes therein, arising from any accidental slip or omission; and an attorney who attempts to accomplish correction otherwise should be dealt with summarily and severely.

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendant as Circuit Judge of the Fifth Circuit to restore relator to the right to practice at the bar of the court. Writ awarded.

When passing upon the sufficiency of the original return in this case Judge Mabry made the following statement:

This is an original proceeding by mandamus, instituted by the relator, George P. Fowler, asking for a peremptory writ to require the Honorable Jesse J. Finley, judge of the circuit court for the fifth judicial circuit of the state to vacate and set aside an order made by him as such judge on the 24th day of February, A. D. 1892, disbarring said relator from the office and privileges of an attorney at law, and to allow him to exercise all the duties and privileges as an attorney at law and solicitor in chancery. The alternative writ alleges that "on the 7th day of November, A. D. 1872, the said George P. Fowler was duly admitted as a practicing lawyer, attorney, and counsellor in the circuit court of the state of Florida; that thereafter he was admitted also to practice in the supreme court of the state of Florida and in the United States circuit and district courts for the northern district of Florida; that since his said admission to the said courts he has been in the actual practice of his profession as an attorney and counsellor in all of the said courts, and has always demeaned himself honestly and properly in his practice and proceedings before each and every of the said courts; that he continued so to practice until the 2d day of March, 1892, when an order disbarring him was filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court of Putnam county, Fla., which order is in the following words and figures, to wit:

"In Re George P. Fowler. Rule to show cause,' etc. 'Having examined and considered the evidence filed herein, the court finds the respondent, George P. Fowler, guilty of abstracting the subpoena in chancery in the case of Andrew I. Wood v. Benjamin Roberts and wife, then pending in the circuit court of Putnam county. While the court is of the opinion that the omission of the words "of Putnam" might not have vitiated the decree of the court in the case of Andrew I. Wood v. Hennis Peterman et al., then pending in the circuit court of Putnam county, the court finds from the evi-to attribute the fault to youth, inexperience, and ignorance. Re Knott, 71 Cal. 584.

So an attorney who in an argument before a committing magistrate at a time of great public excitement with intent to stir up a riot and disorder, proclaims that to be law which he knows not to be the law with the result of encouraging lawless persons and embarrassing and hindering the officers engaged in preserving the peace, is guilty of professional misconduct justifying his disbarment. Re Jones's Case, 13 Pa. Co. Ct. Rep. 229.

But it is otherwise if his misstatements of the law are made in good faith.

The distinction between improper acts done with and those done without bad motive is clearly shown in cases similar to the main case in that they involve a tampering with records or documents. Thus for obliterating a record and antedating a writ to avoid the effect of the Statute of Limitations an attorney cannot be excused on the ground that he acted in ignorance of the moral character of the act. Ex parte Brown, 1 How. (Miss.) 808.

In such a case as in some of those following the motive is clearly shown by the act.

So a material alteration of a letter from one judge to another in relation to the disposal of an application for bail is ground for disbarment. Baker v. Com. 10 Bush, 592.

And mutilating a receiver's report in a copy of a decree filed in a suit so as to change it from a qualified to an unconditional one, with intent to mislead the chancellor is ground for disbarment. Re Henderson, 88 Tenn. 4531.

And altering a receipt for use in evidence on a trial is cause for disbarment. Re Serfass, 116 Pa. 455.

Even if there is a doubt as to an attorney's criminal intent in abstracting from the files in a prothonotary's office a receipt attached to a verdict facias, the act will justify his suspension for a limited time. Re Gates, 17 W. N. C. 142; Re Blank, (Pa.) Jan. 18, 1898.

But a rule against an attorney was dismissed on the ground of his youth and inexperience where the charge against him was that he printed in his paper book the docket entry "bill dismissed" with an addition of the words "in order that the supreme court might decide the case" although it was held that such unauthorized change of the docket entry would justify disbarment if it had been done for the purpose of deceiving the court. Re Van Horn, 26 W. N. C. 40.

Cutting leaves from the memorandum book of an insolvent client without any fraudulent purpose and only to protect his interest was held not a ground of disbarment, the book not being a part of his assets. Re Luca, 83 Cal. 808.

Other instances might undoubtedly be found which would in some degree illustrate this question, but the decisions above referred to seem to show clearly the distinction between acts done with, and those done without, a bad motive, and that as to the latter the mere illegality of the act will not justify disbarment if the act is not immoral, insulting to the court, or otherwise tends to subvert justice.

dence that the respondent, the said George P. Fowler, did interline in said decree the words "of Putnam," after the decree was signed by the chancellor, and after the said decree had been partially recorded in the chancery order book of the Putnam county circuit court; and upon the said findings it is considered and adjudged that the said George P. Fowler be, and he is hereby, disbarred, and is hereby forbidden to exercise the functions and privileges of an attorney and counsellor at law and solicitor in chancery, in any of the courts in this state. At chambers, February 24, 1892. J. J. Finley, Judge.

"That said order was based upon charges made against your petitioner by one D. M. Kirby, who made also other charges against your petitioner, which are of no importance, as the court did not sustain them; that, of the two charges sustained by the court, no formal or legal charge was ever made against him, sufficient to put him upon answer, but that nevertheless this petitioner did fully answer, denying the truth of both of the said charges, absolutely and unequivocally; that the charge of abstracting the subpoena in chancery in the case of Wood v. Roberts had been brought against him in a criminal proceeding before the Honorable J. E. Baldwin, county judge of Putnam county, Fla., on the 24th day of April, 1890, who heard all the evidence of each of the witnesses who testified in this proceeding, and in addition heard the testimony of B. F. Roberts, who is since dead; and the said county judge thereupon discharged him, and the complaining witnesses asked the dismissal of the complaint against him, which was thereupon had, and he was acquitted of the said charges, and no further proceedings were ever taken or had upon the said charge until the 26th day of March, 1891, when D. M. Kirby's complaint was filed by the Honorable J. J. Finley.

"That the other charge upon which the court in its order bases his disbarrel is the insertion of the words 'of Putnam,' in a final decree of the court in the case of Wood v. Peterman.

"That your petitioner in his answer to said rule denied, and still denies, having made such alteration or interlineation in said decree after it was signed by the judge, and says that there was no evidence before the court to sustain the charge.

"Your petitioner humbly submits to the court that if both of said charges sustained by the judge are admitted to be true, he has been acquitted of the charge of abstracting the record, upon a full hearing, and that he ought not to be disbarred upon such a charge until after conviction on a criminal prosecution, and opportunity for defense. As to the charge of the interlineation of the two words 'of Putnam,' in the description of land in a final decree, your petitioner submits that, if such an alteration was made, it was an immaterial insertion of words, which were meant by the judge to be in the decree, which did not affect the decree, and furnish in law no valid or sufficient reason for this disbarrel.

"Your petitioner alleges that the record and evidence and proceedings in disbarring your petitioner from practicing as an attorney and counsellor were wholly and entirely insufficient to authorize the said judge of the circuit court of the fifth judicial circuit, Hon. J. J. Finley, to authorize his disbarrel; and says that such order is totally null and void, and that he should be restored to his office as an attorney; that he has made application to the said judge to restore him to his right to practice law, and to his office as attorney and counselor at law, which the said judge hath refused, and doth still refuse, to do; by means whereof the said petitioner, George P. Fowler, is prevented from entering upon and exercising the duties of his said office of attorney and counselor at law, and is kept out of the said office and right to practice, to which he is justly and lawfully entitled, and of which he has been deprived illegally, and without due process of law."

To the foregoing writ the respondent made a return which was demurred to and the demurrer sustained with leave to amend. The amendment was made and the case then came before the court upon motion for a peremptory writ.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Miller & Spencer, for relator:

What relator added to the decree is not stated, or that what he did was done with any other than an innocent intent is not averred, and in the absence of such allegations this charge should have gone no further.

Weeks, Attorneys, p. 176; People v. Allison, 68 Ill. 151; State v. Kirke, 12 Fla. 278.

The second charge is equally as faulty as the first, in that it does not charge that Fowler at the time of the abstraction of the subpoena was an attorney or solicitor in the cause or in any way interested in the cause, or corruptly, or with any bad motive removed the subpoena from the files.

See State v. Finley (Fla.) July 18, 1892.

The charges were insufficient to order the relator to show cause, and clearly insufficient to order his disbarrel.

There was no authority in the court to refer this matter to a master in chancery to take the evidence.

Nor for gambling with a former client.

Ex parte Stratford, 7 Jur. 412, 19 L. J. Q. B. 281, 1 Jacob, Fisher's Dig. 644.

Taylor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause was instituted in this court at the present term, and at the former hearing (30 Fla. —) the main facts of the case are fully stated. Our conclusion upon the former hearing was that the relator's alternative writ was defective because it failed to show a clear prima facie case of right in the relator in that it contended that the charges preferred against him upon which he was disbarred were insufficient and invalid without setting up or presenting to us the contents or language of the charges referred to; and because it contended further that the evidence before the respondent upon which he based the disbarment did not sustain the charges preferred, but failed to exhibit to us the evidence questioned; and the relator was allowed to amend his petition and alternative writ. The amendment has been made, and the case is now before us for the second time, upon the alternative writ as amended and an amended return thereto by the respondent. The relator now moves for a peremptory writ upon the following grounds: 1. "That the return of the respondent is wholly and entirely insufficient in law, and, in view of the allegations of the alternative writ, shows no clear right in the respondent to refuse obedience thereto." 2. "That the said return does not set up or show upon what evidence, if any, the defendant acted, or show any valid or legal reason, or sufficient legal proceedings, or evidence, to justify the respondent in refusing obedience to said writ." 3. "Because the said return does not set up a denial of the facts stated in the alternative writ, or state or show other facts sufficient to defeat relator's right to restoration." 4. "Because the said return is otherwise informal, and insufficient to defeat relator's rights."

The amended alternative writ alleges the following to be the charges upon which the relator was disbarred:

"The amended alternative writ alleges the following to be the charges upon which the relator was disbarred:

"5th Judicial Circuit of Florida,
In and for Putnam County.
"To the Hon'ble J. J. Finley, Judge in and for said Circuit:

"D. M. Kirby, deputy clerk Circuit Court for said county, complains of George P. Fowler as follows: 1st. That in a certain chancery cause, wherein A. J. Wood was complainant, and Hennis Peterman et al. were defendants, he, the said George P. Fowler, acting as solicitor for complainant, interlined and added to the final decree rendered in said cause, after the signature of the chancellor had been affixed.

"2d. That in a certain cause in chancery, wherein A. J. Wood was complainant, and Julia E. Roberts and B. F. Roberts were defendants, the case was carried to final decree and sale, without having had proper and legal service upon the owner of the property, Mrs. Julia E. Roberts; that George P. Fowler assured the judge in open court that service had been had upon Mrs. Roberts; that said subpoena was afterwards abstracted from the clerk's office, and that no one but said George P. Fowler had the record and files in said chancery cause at the time said subpoena was taken, and this complainant believes said George P. Fowler did take or make way with said subpoena, he being the party most interested in its disappearance.

"3d. That in a chancery cause wherein W. W. Rast was complainant, and Minnie A. Estee, W. W. Toller et al. were defendants, said George P. Fowler asked this complainant, D. M. Kirby, to make affidavit to the effect that notice of publication had been sent to W. W. Toller, at Glenwood, Virginia, when said Fowler knew it had not been done, and that he had told this complainant that there was no necessity of it, as the said W. W. Toller was in London, England, beyond the seas.

The alternative writ further alleges that upon the filing of said paper with the respondent, he made an order on the 26th of March, 1891, requiring the relator to show cause before him in open court at Palatka, on the 8th of April, 1891, why he should not be disbarred for the reasons stated in said paper or complaint.

We may as well remark, just here, that we are clearly of the opinion that the form and substance of the charges preferred against the relator were entirely too loose, general, vague, indefinite and uncertain to have warranted this order requiring the relator to respond thereto, or to show cause why he should not be disbarred by reason thereof. All the authorities agree, and the doctrine is reaffirmed in the former decision of this case, that a charge so grave in its nature must be clear, specific, and circumstantial, and must be stated with great particularity, that the attorney may know how to defend. The first of the charges here that this relator was peremptorily called upon to refute, was that in a certain chancery cause, wherein one A. J. Wood was complainant, and Hennis Peterman et al. were defendants, the relator interlined and added to the decree rendered therein, after it was signed by the chancellor. It fails to state what it was that was interlined or added to the decree; fails to give the date of the decree, or the court in which the cause was pending, or any date at or about which the alleged interlineation or addition was perpetrated; not even stating whether the paper tampered with belonged to any of the courts of the state of Florida or not, or where the alleged wrongful addition thereto was perpetrated; nor whether the same was done with any bad motive or malicious intent.

The second charge was the abstraction of a subpoena from the clerk's office, in a certain cause, wherein A. J. Wood was complainant and Julia E. Roberts and B. F. Roberts were defendants. This charge does not allege that the relator abstracted the subpoena, but alleges "that said subpoena was afterwards abstracted from the clerk's office, and that no one but said George P. Fowler had the record and files in said chancery cause at the time said subpoena was taken, and this complainant (D. M. Kirby) believes said George P. Fowler did take or make way with said subpoena, he being the party most interested in its disappearance." This charge also fails to allege the court in which the cause to which the subpoena belonged was pending, or any dates, or that there ever was in fact any subpoena therein that could have been abstracted, or in what county or state the supposed abstraction occurred, and does not show how or in what manner the relator was interested in its abstraction or disappearance; nor does it allege any bad motive or intent in the abstraction thereof. We have no hesitancy in saying that these charges so framed were entirely too vague, indefinite, and uncertain, and too wanting in directness, clearness, particularity, and detail to have warranted the respondent in demanding of the relator an exhibition of any cause why disbarment should not follow as a result thereof. The relator, however, failed to move to quash the charges in the form presented, or otherwise to question their legal sufficiency, but saw proper to answer, denying in detail the charges as made; and, to the first charge, as to the interlineation of the decree, specifies in his answer one interlineation, that of the words "of Putnam," in the decree asserting that it was made by him, but before the decree was signed. Upon the coming in of this answer the respondent made an order referring the matter to Calvin Gillis, Esq., as a special master to take such testimony therein as might be offered "on either side, bearing on the truth or falsity of the complaint made, and to report the same to the court at the earliest practicable time." In proceedings for the disbarment of an attorney, we do not think that this was the proper practice. The power to disbar an attorney for any of the causes justifying such a procedure is inherent in the court itself. The judge sits as the arbiter of both the law and facts in the case. He is the trier; and, so far as the facts are concerned, should occupy the same position of personal presence at the examination of witnesses that a jury does at the trial of any one charged with crime, so that he may observe the manner of the witnesses, and may give to their evidence credence or disbelief, as a jury does, accordingly as their manner of testifying may indicate prejudice, malice, or other sinister motive to subserve. By delegating the examination of witnesses in the cause to another, the judge hears the evidence only by proxy, but still retains the position and powers of trier of the facts, and deprives the accused of the right to be confronted with his accusers before the tribunal who pronounces upon the facts. In a case reported in 88 N. Y. 164, for the disbarment of an attorney, it was held that such proceedings are of a public nature and are quasi criminal, and that evidence of an absent witness taken under a commission upon written interrogatories was not admissible, and that the attorney could be convicted only upon evidence good at common law, delivered if he chooses in his presence, by witnesses subject to cross-examination. Re Kelly, 59 N. Y. 595. The proper practice in such cases is for the judge to personally hear the evidence of the witnesses for and against the accused, so that in lending or withholding credence to it he may be governed by the same rules and reasons that influence juries when sitting as triers of facts. This manner of trying or getting the evidence in the case was not objected to at the time, however, by the relator, but he seems, from the exhibits made in the amended alternative writ to have gone into the taking of testimony before the special master without complaint or demurrer thereto.

The amended alternative writ sets out the following, in substance, as being the evidence taken before the master, upon which the judgment of disbarment was based: The master, Calvin Gillis, Esq., filed a statement in substance as follows: That he had devoted about a week to the service of taking testimony in the cause, without compensation to himself or the witnesses; that a great deal of immaterial testimony was taken; that the papers and depositions in the cause are in the custody of the clerk of the circuit court for Putnam county. That the parties interested, or some one or more of them, made known to him that there still remained many witnesses to depose in this matter. That he was willing to serve without compensation to purge the bar if necessary, or to vindicate the bar if unjustly accused; but in the present case he begs to be relieved by your honor, when his labors are more than required elsewhere.

In what appears to be an ex parte affidavit made before a notary public, and admitted and filed with the master as evidence, as is stated, by consent of the relator subject to his right to cross examine the affiant, Frank Wright, clerk of the circuit court for Putnam county, testified as follows: That on or about the 18th of April, 1890, George P. Fowler brought to his office a final decree in the case of Wood v. Peterman that had been signed by presiding Judge Finley on the 17th of April, at chambers at Ocala, and asked me to record it as soon as convenient. Mr. Kirby, deputy clerk, took the decree and filed it, soon thereafter started to record it; while he was at his desk recording the decree, Mr. Kirby called to me and said, Mr. Fowler has made a mistake in the decree, having described the land as in the "county and state of Florida," and he asked me if I thought that affected the decree. I left my table and went to Mr. Kirby's desk and looked at the decree, and saw that it read as above, and told Kirby to go on with the record, as I thought the rest of the description was sufficient to locate the property. Kirby continued the record, but before completing it was called off by some other business and did not take it up again. Some time afterwards Mr. Fowler came to the office and asked for the papers in the case, and took them away with him. When he returned them Kirby opened the package and looked it over and discovered that the words "of Putnam" had been interlined. I looked at the paper again and found such to be the case, and told Kirby not to continue the record until the judge had seen it and had allowed the interlineation. On the 17th of May I wrote to Judge Finley asking instructions as to completing the record, and saying that I awaited his instructions in the premises. Under date of May 22d, Judge Finley wrote acknowledging receipt of my letter, and of the affidavit accompanying it, but that he could not instruct me until the matter had been brought before him in a shape that would authorize him to act. Thus the matter has stood up to the present time. I have not felt justified in completing the record, and the judge has given me no instructions on the subject. With reference to the loss of the subpoena in the case of Wood v. Roberts, I cannot state fully of my own knowledge, as my deputy, Kirby, has charge of law papers in the office, and they seldom come to my notice, but I remember one morning about the middle of April, 1890, about 8 o'clock, when I reached the office I saw Mr. Fowler sitting near the safe containing law papers, looking over some papers. He left soon after, taking some cases with him; about ten o'clock Mr. Haskell came in and asked to see the Wood v. Roberts papers, and sat down on the corner of Mr. Kirby's desk to look them over; soon I heard him ask Mr. Kirby where the subpoena was, and he and Mr. Kirby looked through the papers and said they could not find it. After asking if they had looked carefully, I went across the room and looked for myself, but did not find the subpoena, and have not since seen it, although I have made diligent search for it through the office. On cross-examination by the relator, he answered that he had never, to his recollection, called Mr. Fowler's attention to the interlineation in the decree, after the same was brought to his attention.

D. M. Kirby, the deputy clerk, testified that on or about the 15th of April, 1890, late in the afternoon of that day, one B. E. Dyson, the deputy sheriff of Putnam county, James S. La Roche and himself were looking over papers in chancery suit of A. J. Wood against B. F. and J. E. Roberts, and more particularly the subpoena with the service returned thereon by the sheriff. "I took the subpoena and read the service. The subpoena was placed back among the papers in the safe, and locked in for the night. The next morning Major Fowler entered the office about or shortly after seven or eight o'clock, while La Roche and myself were comparing instruments that had been recorded. Maj. Fowler asked to see the papers in this case; the safe was then opened for the first time that day, and the papers handed to Maj. Fowler, who took them to another table to examine; a few minutes later he handed me the package and I placed it in the safe. I had not opened the package myself since the night before. At about 10 o'clock A. M. of the 16th of April, I think, 1890, E. E. Haskell entered the office as attorney for A. J. Wood, and asked for the same papers; I took them from the safe to my desk, and Mr. Haskell opened the papers in my presence, at the same time conversing with him relative to the service. He examined the papers and the subpoena could not be found; we both examined each individual paper, the safe, the tables, and it could not be found. I had charge of these records and files, and to my knowledge no other parties handled these papers, Maj. Fowler being the only person who opened this package between the evening of the 15th of April, 1890, to ten o'clock A. M. next day. This happened in the court-house, in the city of Palatka, Putnam county, Florida. I have never seen the subpoena since, although having made diligent search for it."

J. S. La Roche, a recorder in the clerk's office of Putnam county, testified to the same facts in substance as to the disappearance of the subpoena as did D. M. Kirby, and testified also that some time in April, 1890, his attention was called by the clerk, Mr. Wright, and his deputy, Mr. Kirby, to the omission of the words "of Putnam" in the decree in the case of Wood v. Peterman that Kirby was then recording in the chancery order-book, and that some time afterwards, on looking at the decree again, he saw that the above two omitted words had been interlined after the decree had been signed.

Benjamin E. Dyson, in an ex parte affidavit copied into the alternative writ as part of the papers in the case, sworn to before a notary public, and that has nothing about it to indicate that it was ever filed with the master, or used before the judge, testifies that on the morning of the 15th of April, 1890, he entered the clerk's office and asked to see, and was shown by the deputy clerk, the subpoena in the chancery case of Wood v. Roberts and wife, and that after the sheriff's return of service thereon was read by him and the deputy clerk, the latter placed said subpoena among the other papers in the case and put them in the safe, and then closed the safe and followed him out of the office; and, contradicting his first statement above that it was in the morning, he here says that it was about five o'clock P. M., the time of closing the clerk's office.

E. E. Haskell testified in an ex parte affidavit made before a notary public, and that has no file marks of the master or judge, that on the morning of April 18, 1890, about ten o'clock, as attorney for A. J. Wood, he called at the clerk's office for the subpoena in the case of said Wood v. Roberts and wife, but that after diligent search for same, made by him and the deputy clerk, Kirby, the same could not be found; that he had never seen or handled the papers in the case before that time.

D. M. Kirby, the deputy clerk, upon a second examination, testified to the same facts, substantially, in reference to the interlineation of the words "of Putnam" in the decree, as did the clerk, Mr. Wright.

John E. Marshall, in an ex parte affidavit made before a notary public, testified for the relator that he had done a great deal of business with Mr. Fowler, acting as special master in chancery in many cases in which Fowler was solicitor for the complainants, among which was the chancery cause of A. J. Wood v. Hennis Peterman et al.; that as such special master he did his writing, and business connected therewith, in Fowler's office, and had spent a great deal of time there, and was well acquainted with his methods of doing business; that he was a very careful, industrious, painstaking, and conscientious man in the discharge of his duty to his clients; that it was always the practice of Fowler to carefully compare all decrees, bills, and other papers prepared by him, before filing the same in the clerk's office; that he had assisted him in many cases and many times in such work, and that he well remembered assisting him in comparing the supplemental decree in the case of Wood v. Peterman, the same being signed by the chancellor April 17, 1890; that he was in Palatka on the 7th of April, 1890, and in Fowler's office, and remembered well, and was sure by reference to dates and memoranda in his possession, that he compared the said supplemental decree with Fowler on that day, shortly after he had finished drawing the same; that he called Fowler's attention to the omission of the words "of Putnam" in said decree, and that said Fowler did then and there interline said words in said decree in his presence. Of this fact he was sure and positive, and that he knew that said interlineation was so made by him as stated, and before said decree was signed by the judge or filed in court.

The amended alternative writ avers that the above is all the evidence that was before the respondent in reference to said charges, and that none of said testimony except that of Frank Wright was ever legally or properly before the respondent, the same never having been filed by the master as a part of his report.

The respondent for answer to this amended alternative writ refers the court to his answer 18 L. R. A.

to the original writ herein, and asks that the same may be taken and considered as his return to the writ as amended. Neither in the return to the original writ nor to the amended writ is it denied that the foregoing is all the testimony upon which the respondent acted in disbarring the relator. We must take it as true, then, that what we have given above is, in substance, all the evidence before the respondent bearing upon the two charges upon which the disbarment was predicated. The question, then, to be considered is, Was this evidence sufficient under the law to warrant the court below in visiting upon the relator the severe penalty of disbarment, that is always deeply humiliating to an attorney, and often most disastrous, not only to himself, but to his unfettered family dependent upon his professional efforts for their very existence.

In the judgment or order of disbarment the relator is judged to be guilty of "abstracting the subpoena in chancery in the case of Andrew J. Wood v. Benjamin F. Roberts and wife, pending in the circuit court of Putnam County; and also of interlining the words "of Putnam" in the decree in chancery in the case pending in Putnam county circuit court of Andrew J. Wood v. Hennis Peterman et al., after said decree had been signed by the judge. In the case of State v. Young, decided at the present term (80 Fla. —,) it is held that "no court should, in the exercise of original jurisdiction, disbar an attorney upon a charge of this character, establishing, if proved, his unfitness morally to be intrusted with the responsibilities of the office, unless the testimony sustains it clearly, both as to the act and the bad motive." Testing the evidence before the respondent by this rule, we fail to find in it anything that even suggests a bad or fraudulent motive or purpose in the relator for the commission of the acts adjudged against him. In the matter of the abstraction of the subpoena in chancery in the case of Wood v. Roberts and wife, the evidence does not even suggest any purpose, reason, or motive that the relator could have had for its abstraction or disappearance. What benefit or advantage to himself or any one else could have been reaped out of its disappearance, or what loss or injury could have flown therefrom to any one is not even hinted at in the evidence. He is not shown by the evidence to have been interested in the cause to which the lost paper belonged in any way, either as party thereto, or attorney therein for any of the parties, or otherwise. So far as his motive was concerned for the abstraction of this paper, the evidence is entirely insufficient. If there had been any evidence before us to show that the relator, before the decree was rendered in the case to which this missing subpoena belonged, asserted to the judge, as an inducement to the signing of such decree, that service of subpoena had been made upon Mrs. Roberts, one of the defendants therein, as was charged, or if there had been any proof to show that Mr. Fowler was in any way, either personally or representatively, interested in upholding the decree predicated upon the proper service of such missing subpoena, or as purchaser of the property thereunder, or if there was any proof showing that he had any interest or design whatsoever in the disappearance of said subpoena, we should have been bound under the proofs before us to sustain the respondent in the order of disbarment. But, so far as the proof goes, we are shown no interested or bad motive or reason for his taking it, or having it to disappear at all. It seems from the evidence that the clerk of the court of Putnam county was in the habit of permitting Mr. Fowler to take out of his office the original papers on file there. In the absence of any proof that he took this subpoena with an interested or bad motive, we think that to this extent the order of disbarment was unwarranted.

As to the second charge, of interlining the words "of Putnam" in the decree in chancery in the case of Wood v. Peterman et al., after it had been signed by the chancellor, although it is denied by the relator that such interlineation was done subsequent to the signing of the decree, still we think that the proof, if not prejudiced, is quite sufficient to establish the fact that it was done subsequently to the signing of the decree. This fact being established, the next question to be considered is, Does the evidence show that it was done with that fraudulent, corrupt, and bad motive that is necessary to have been shown before disbarment could follow. The evidence shows that the interlineation occurred in that part of the decree that undertook to locate or describe the land involved in the decree; and the interlineation caused the sentence in the decree as signed, "county and state of Florida," to read "county of Putnam and state of Florida." It is apparent from the evidence, and from the fact that the decree was in a cause pending in Putnam county, that the land involved therein, to whose description the interlineation referred, did in fact lay in the county "of Putnam;" and it is apparent also from the evidence of the clerk, Frank Wright, that the land was otherwise sufficiently located or described without the words interlined; and from all this it is evident that the omission of the interlined words, "of Putnam," was a lapsus penae on the part of the draughtsman who prepared the decree, and that of right it was proper that they should have been put into the decree at the point in which they were interlined, prior to its presentation to the judge for his signature thereto. In the order of disbarment the respondent also expresses the opinion that the omission of the interlined words might not have vitiated the decree. If the decree then, (and it is not before us in the record,) was just as perfect without the interlined words as it would have been had they been originally included therein, then it follows as a necessary sequence that the interlineation was an immaterial one. It added nothing to the effect of the decree, nor detracted anything from it. It did not vary the rights or interests, duties, or obligations of any of the parties to it, or of any one else; nor did it give rise to any opportunity for wrong to any one, or deprive any one of any right under it. This being true, and we think it is, how could the relator have been actuated by any bad, fraudulent, or vicious motive in doing an act that accomplished nothing, and that would have been followed by the same results whether done or left undone. Mr. Fowler, when he made this interlineation in the decree, could not have been actuated by any bad or fraudulent motive of unfair gain to himself or his client, or harm to any one else, because the act done being wholly immaterial, was powerless to effect any result whatever. In the case of Hunt v. Adams, 6 Mass. 519, that was a suit upon a note, the defense to which set up an alteration of the note after it was made and delivered, by the unauthorized interlineation of the word "year" therein, Chief Justice Parsons, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "Such addition has no effect in form or substance. In my opinion it would be unworthy of the wisdom of the law to decide, that the incautious interlineation of a word, which the same law would necessarily imply, should defeat the contract. In deed, the assent of the party signing such contract, that the omission of a word by a clerical mistake, which the law will supply, might be cured by inserting such word, ought to be presumed, to protect him from the imputation of intentional fraud." There was no proof that Mr. Fowler made this interlineation under the impression or belief that it added to or detracted from the substance or form of the decree, or was necessary to give it effect. The omission of the words interlined was so manifestly a clerical oversight and mistake, and in the opinion of both the judge and the clerk of the court did not affect the description of the land or the decree either in form or substance, and the words interlined being such as the law would have supplied from the other contents of the decree, under the equitable view taken by Chief Justice Parsons in the case quoted above, in considering the motive by which Mr. Fowler was actuated in making this interlineation, we might fairly presume that he did it under the impression that the judge would certainly consent to the correction of so palpable a clerical mistake that when made affected nothing either in form or substance, rather than from any evil design.

We do not wish it to be understood that we are inclined to condone, palliate, countenance, or excuse any manner of tampering with the decree of a court after it obtains the sanction of the judge's signature, even to the crossing of a t or the dotting of an i therein; on the contrary, we think that such a practice is highly reprehensible, and deserves severe punishment, no matter how innocent or immaterial the alteration or change may be. A proper respect for the sanctity of the official judgments and decrees of our courts demands that this shall be so; and in recognition of the sanctity of judicial decrees, our Chancery Court Rule 87 has been provided requiring an order of the court for the correction of clerical mistakes in decrees arising from any accidental slip or omission. But when such an interference with a judicial decree is made unauthorizedly and incautiously, but without any bad motive or fraudulent design, it partakes more of the character of a contempt of the court than of that moral turpitude that stamps the perpetrator as being an unfit person to exercise the office of an attorney. In the absence, therefore, of any evidence showing that the relator was actuated, in making the interlineation charged, by any bad motive or fraudulent design, we do not think that under the circumstances it either merited or warranted the infliction upon him of that severest and most humiliating of all punishments to an attorney—disbarment. Mr. Weeks, in his admirable work on Attorneys, p. 159, in discussing the subject of disbarment, says: "The end to be attained is protection, not punishment. As punishment, removal from office is unreasonably severe, for those cases in which the end is reclamation, not destruction, and for which reprimand, suspension, fine, or imprisonment seems to be the more adequate instrument of correction; for expulsion from the bar blasts all prospects of prosperity to come, and mars the fruit expected from the training of a lifetime."

In the absence of any proof of moral turpitude on the relator's part in making the interlineation charged, we think that the sentence for his entirely unauthorized and highly reprehensible act should have been aimed at correction and reasonable punishment, as there were no elements in it that marked him as a corrupt practitioner against whom the public should be protected by destroying his official life as an attorney.

The peremptory writ is awarded and ordered.

NOTE.—License tax on lawyers.

A license tax on lawyers is not unconstitutional on the ground that it interferes with the judicial department of the government. Goldthwaite v. Montgomery, 50 Ala. 456; Cousins v. State, 50 Ala. 118, 20 Am. Rep. 290; State v. Waples, 12 La. Ann. 843; State v. King, 21 La. Ann. 201; Young v. Thomas, 17 Fla. 169; Stewart v. Potts, 49 Miss. 749; State v. Gazley, 5 Ohio, 14.

Neither does such a tax impair a contract or vested right of an attorney under his license to practice law. Ould v. Richmond, 23 Gratt. 464, 14 Am. Rep. 139; Languille v. State, 4 Tex. App. 312; Simmons v. State, 12 Mo. 208, 49 Am. Dec. 181; State v. Gazley, Young v. Thomas, State v. King, State v. Waples, and Cousins v. State, supra.

In Lawyers Tax Cases, 8 Heisk. 565, decided by the Supreme Court of Tennessee in 1875, which case was also reported as Cardwell v. State, in 17 S. W. Rep. 109, in advance sheets only and left out of the permanent bound volume, a statute making it unlawful to practice law without payment of a license tax was held unconstitutional; two judges holding that the right to practice law could not be taxed, and two others holding that the practice of law by a duly admitted attorney without payment of the tax could not be made unlawful, while two judges held that the statute was constitutional.

The serious division of opinion among the judges of the court much impairs the effect of the decision as an authority, and it is at any rate in conflict with all other cases on the subject.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Putnam County in favor of relators in an action brought to compel the issuance of an attorney's license. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. William B. Lamar, Atty. Gen., for appellants.

Messrs. R. W. David, W. M. David and Gillis & Gillis for appellee.

Raney, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question involved in this case is whether under the General Revenue Act of June 10, 1891, Rev. Stat., pp. 929 et seq., two lawyers associated as partners are entitled to a license as a firm or partnership upon paying the license tax prescribed for one lawyer and the license fee; or must each of them take out a separate license for himself on paying for himself the prescribed tax and fee. The former proposition, in our judgment, is erroneous, and consequently the judgment of the circuit judge awarding a peremptory writ of mandamus must be reversed.

The ninth section of the Act provides that "no person shall engage in or manage the business, profession, or occupation mentioned in this section unless a state license shall have been procured from the tax collector, which license shall be issued to each person on the receipt of the amount hereinafter provided, together with the county judge's fee of twenty-five cents for each license." It then authorizes counties, incorporated cities, and towns to im-practice law may be delegated to a municipal corporation. Ould v. Richmond and Goldthwaite v. Montgomery, supra.

The classification, for taxation, of the lawyers in a city into six classes, according to their reputation and standing, and supposed capacity to make profits, was upheld in Ould v. Richmond, supra, and the delegation of this classification to a committee was held valid.

In Simmons v. State, and in Languille v. State, supra, it is said that a license to practice law is a mere naked grant of a privilege without consideration, and that the state may revoke it or impose such conditions upon its exercise as are deemed proper or demanded by the public interest.

Under Tex. Rev. Stat., arts. 4666, 4668, an attorney may take a license for three months at a time. Hart v. State, 21 Tex. App. 318.

Under Ala. Revenue Act of December 31, 1898, it was held that each lawyer composing a firm must pay the price required for a license although the terms of the statute were that "any person, firm, company, or corporation, who desires to engage in or carry on any business or profession hereinafter named" shall pay the sum required. The court held that the statute was to be construed according to the nature of the business, and that the exercise of the profession of law was such a personal right as to require a separate license for each individual.

Even a license for the business of selling intoxicating liquors, if issued to one partner individually, confers no right on the other partners. Long v. State, 27 Ala. 32.

B. A. R.

pose further taxes of the same kind on the same subjects, with certain limitations not necessary to be mentioned. After prescribing the amount of the state tax to be paid for pursuing many other avocations, the same section enacts, in its fourteenth subdivision, that "all dentists and lawyers practicing their profession in the state of Florida, shall pay to the tax collector in the counties where their office is located a license tax of ten dollars." It then in another paragraph regulates the issue of the license.

There is in these provisions nothing that affords any basis for the contentions urged in maintenance of the judgment appealed from; nor is any authority cited in their support. The plain declarations of the statute are, that no person shall practice the profession of a lawyer without having paid the license tax prescribed for all lawyers, and obtained the license in the manner provided. As all lawyers are required to pay the state tax of ten dollars, and any authorized county and municipal levies on the same avocation, each and every lawyer must do so, and no lawyer can lawfully practice his profession without having done so. Thus far there is no room for construction; the sole function of the courts is the interpretation of the Act according to the plain meaning of its words; and as to their meaning there is no room for question or doubt. The assertion that a firm or copartnership is in law one person is mistaken; it, on the contrary, is an association of several persons, and their firm name is but a short way of designating the several persons for the purposes of their association. Their separate personality is not lost, and they can neither sue nor be sued at law or in equity solely by such business appellation, nor without using their individual names. It is true that, as argued by counsel for relators, "a firm of lawyers can only take one fee and conduct one side of a case," but it does not follow from this essential principle of professional ethics and sound morals that the several individuals or lawyers composing the firm become either one person or one lawyer; or that they will receive severally a smaller income than they would if they had not associated their industry, talents, and learning for the purpose of gain; still should the result last stated ensue, it is not a consideration or rule that enters into either the construction or interpretation of statutes.

Assuming that each member of a firm of "merchants" or "barkeepers" is, as is suggested by counsel for appellees, not required to pay the full amount of the tax prescribed for merchants and dealers in spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors, it is because in their cases, as in others, the tax is for each place of business, i. e., each store, or barroom, which is not true of lawyers and dentists and others. Again, it is altogether clear from the very terms of the Act in the cases of circuses, theatrical shows, and minstrel troupes, managers of theaters employing traveling troupes, variety shows, banks, banking firms, express companies, electric light, water works, gas light and telephone companies, that each member of, or individual composing, such companies or association, banks or banking firms, is not chargeable with a separate tax, or required to have a separate license, but the tax is upon the association, 18 L. R. A.

company, bank, or firm as such. These distinctions, thus clearly made by the Act, account in part, if not altogether, for the use of the terms "person or persons, firm or association," in the general penal provision, to be found in the tenth section, for punishing the doing without a license any business for which one is required. Such distinctions are the subject of legislative discretion, and the court cannot extend to lawyers the more favorable consideration extended by the law-makers to other avocations, nor hold that such patent discrimination was either unintentional or ineffectual.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

STATE of Florida, ex rel. ATTORNEY-GENERAL,

James E. JOHNSON.

- *1. The governor has power under section 15 of the executive article of the Constitution, when acting within the authority there conferred, to hear and decide as to the existence of any alleged neglect of duty in office as a ground for suspending an officer. This authority, whether judicial or administrative in its nature, is vested by the Constitution in the governor as a member of the executive department, and does not appertain to, and cannot be exercised by the courts.
2. The governor may, under section 15 of the executive article of the Constitution, suspend an officer for neglect of duty in office, without giving previous notice to the officer of the charge made against him; but it is the governor's duty to notify any officer he may suspend of the cause of such suspension and give him a hearing on such charges and reinstate him if the evidence does not sustain the charges. The officer has a constitutional right to such hearing.
3. So long as the governor's action in suspending an officer is within the limits of his constitutional power the courts cannot interfere to arrest his action. He is the exclusive judge, in so far as the courts are concerned, of the sufficiency of the proof of the charge, not merely because the courts have been given no power of review, but for the further reason that the Senate, a branch of the legislative department, has been granted such power.
4. Under Fla. Rev. Stat. § 154, electors had the right to pay toll taxes on Saturday, September 3d, 1892, to qualify them to vote at the election of October 4 of the same year; but whether or not a tax collector was guilty of neglect of duty in not receiving the taxes on the former day, is a question for the governor's decision, viewed as a ground for the suspension of the collector from office.

*Headnotes by RANNEY, CH. J.

NOTE.—For summary removal of officers, see, in connection with the above case, Trainer v. Wayne County Auditors, 15 L. R. A. 95, and note, 89 Mich. 162.

5. When an officer has been regularly suspended by the governor under section 15 of the executive article of the Constitution, for any cause recognized by that section, and the successor of the suspended officer has been regularly commissioned, the latter officer is entitled to the official property of the office, and mandamus is the proper remedy to compel the suspended officer to deliver it; and the new appointee is not a necessary party to the proceedings, but the attorney-general is a proper and sufficient relator.

MOTION to quash an application for a writ of mandamus to compel respondent to deliver over the property belonging to the office of tax collector for Duval County to one whom the governor had appointed as his successor in office. Overruled.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. J. M. Barrs and A. W. Cockrell & Son, in support of the motion:

The right to exercise an office is as much a species of property within the protection of the law, as any other thing capable of possession; and to wrongfully deprive one of it, or unjustly withhold it, is an injury which the law can redress in as ample a manner as any other wrong.

2 Bl. Com. 36, 263; 4 Bacon, Abr. Office, G, 297.

And this right is now within the protection of the 14th Amendment of the United States Constitution.

Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565; Buntun v. Lyford, 37 N. H. 512, 75 Am. Dec. 144, and Freeman's note; Belcher v. Chambers, 53 Cal. 635; Foster v. Kansas, 112 U. S. 201, 28 L. ed. 629; Kennard v. Louisiana, 92 U. S. 480, 23 L. ed. 478; Mechem, Pub. Off. § 454, and note.

The power to remove an officer for cause can be exercised only for just cause, and after the officer has had an opportunity for defense.

State v. Love, 39 N. J. L. 14.

The power of removal of officers for cause is a special authority, and must be strictly pursued.

Com. v. Slifer, 25 Pac. 23.

The function by which one is deprived of the emoluments of his office, even for a limited time, is obviously judicial in its character, and this leads to the inquiry whether such a function belongs to the governor of this state.

It certainly did not belong to the British crown.

If the governor has the power therefore it must be derived from the Constitution of the state.

State v. Pritchard, 36 N. J. L. 112.

The ascertainment of the malfeasance, or other cause, must precede the removal, and this ascertainment must proceed upon charges consisting of distinctly stated facts, "so that it can be determined, as matter of law, whether what the removing power treats as wrong is within the legal quality of wrong." The officer must be by the judgment of the courts, or some tribunal possessed of judicial power, convicted of misbehavior in office.

That the statute and the Constitution, in giving the governor power to remove, prescribe no methods of examination, can in no way relieve him from the necessity—even if he is to pass personally on the facts—of having specific charges of misconduct communicated to the officer, and established by proof, with a full opportunity to the respondent to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and be heard on the facts and the law.

Dullam v. Willson, 53 Mich. 392, 51 Am. Rep. 128.

The Constitution did not in terms confer upon the governor the power, obviously a judicial power, to examine into public acts of the officers he was empowered by the Constitution to "suspend" for misconduct. Such judicial power did not result, by implication, from the grant of power to absolutely remove for misconduct.

Mechem, Pub. Off. § 454, and note; Com. v. Slifer, supra.

Under our Constitution, if this writ be sustained, the governor is invested with arbitrary power to suspend, discharged of the supervisory control of the Senate, in every case, where the incumbent is elected at the general election, and enters upon his office in January, and holds for two years. All the governor needs to do is to wait until the Legislature meets. He can then "suspend." And the result is, the suspension is extended beyond the duration of the term of the suspended officer unless the governor recalls the Legislature to an extra session. And this is true of every officer the Constitution makes elective (art. 8, § 6; art. 18, § 10), as to that part of the tenure, intervening between the assembling of the last Legislature which sits during his term, and the expiration of his term. The entire elective system is practically annulled.

Dullam v. Willson, supra.

An out-going governor has sought to fill in part an office that did not become vacant during the term of his official life (State v. Meahan, 45 N. J. L. 189), an office which did not even "fall in" during his incumbency; the term of which does not even begin until the close of his official life.

The commission to Gillen is absolutely void.

Hench v. State, 79 Ind. 297.

The convention that framed the Constitution of 1885, differentiated suspension and removal from office.

As the duration of the displacement of Johnson is extended by its terms beyond the term for which Johnson was elected, it is in substance and in fact a "removal" from office instead of a "suspension" from office, in the sense of the constitutional differentiation, which the governor has attempted to accomplish in this case.

The greater power to remove might include the lesser, to suspend; but the contrary is not true.

Metsker v. Neally, 41 Kan. 122.

A careful examination of the adjudged cases has failed to discover a single authority in which the attorney-general was permitted to institute a suit of this kind; nor any case in which such a proceeding was instituted by another than the party claiming the possession.

People v. Stevens, 5 Hill, 616; Lambert v.

People, 76 N. Y. 231; Re Application of Gardner, 68 N. Y. 467.

Mandamus issues only to compel the recognition of a clear legal right or the performance of a legal duty; it does not issue so long as the right or the duty is disputed or doubtful.

People v. Lane, 55 N. Y. 219; 2 Jacob & Chaney's Dig. (Mich.) pp. 102, 103, § 14; Peck v. Kent County Supra, 47 Mich. 477.

Nor will courts by mandamus compel delivery of books and papers when there is any doubt as to the title to the office, and will send the relator to his quo warranto to try the right.

High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 77; People v. Kilguff, 15 Ill. 492; People v. Head, 25 Ill. 825.

The Constitution made provision that Johnson might be suspended by the governor, for cause. "This," says the supreme court of Oregon (Biggs v. McBride, 5 L. R. A. 115, 17 Or. 640), "clearly implied that he could not be removed at the mere will of the governor, or without a cause."

It must be done upon notice to the delinquent of the particular charges against him, and an opportunity be given him to be heard in his defense.

Dullam v. Willson, supra; State v. Hawkins, 44 Ohio St. 98; People v. Canal Appraisers, 73 N. Y. 445; People v. New York, 19 Hun, 441.

Mr. W. B. Lamar, Atty-Gen., contra:

The governor had the right and power to suspend Johnson for the cause he assigned—"neglect of duty in office," and no previous notice is required by the Constitution to be given to Johnson before the act of suspension. Such act of suspension is the exercise of executive discretion, is a political act of a co-ordinate department of the government; and this court will not review the act of the governor. The power thus exercised by the governor is administrative, and not judicial. If notice is required, enough is disclosed by the writ herein to justify the court in granting the relief prayed. Officers are presumed to do their duty, and if notice is required, and was not given, it is matter of defense to respondent therein.

Drew*, 17 Fla. 67.

Notice to Johnson was not necessary.

Mandamus is the only adequate remedy in this case, because it is the only speedy method of placing the office, books, etc., in the possession of Gillen.

Raney, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The governor, the administrative officers of the executive department, justices of the supreme court, and judges of the circuit court are liable under section 29, article 8, "Legislative Department," of the Constitution of 1885, to impeachment for any misdemeanor in office; but by section 15, article 4, "Executive Department," "all officers that shall have been appointed or elected, and that are not liable to impeachment, may be suspended from office by the governor for malfeasance or misfeasance or neglect of duty in office, for the commission of any felony, or for drunkenness or incompetency, and the cause of suspension shall be communicated to the officer, and to the Senate at its next session. And the governor by and with the advice of the Senate may remove any officer not liable to impeachment for any cause above named. Every suspension shall continue until the adjournment of the next session of the Senate, unless the officer suspended shall upon the recommendation of the governor be removed; but the governor may reinstate the officer so suspended upon satisfactory evidence that the charge or charges against him are untrue. If the Senate shall refuse to remove or fail to take action before its adjournment, the officer suspended shall resume the duties of the office. The governor shall have power to fill by appointment any office, the incumbent of which has been suspended. No officer suspended who shall under this section resume the duties of his office shall suffer any loss of salary or other compensation in consequence of such suspension. The suspension or removal herein authorized shall not relieve the officer from indictment for any misdemeanor in office."

Tax collectors are county officers, and are chosen by the duly qualified elector of each county, and their term of office is two years. Const. art. 8, § 16. All county officers continue in office until their successors are duly qualified. Art. 16, § 14. The governor is authorized to fill vacancies. Executive Communication & Advisory Opinion, 25 Fla. 427. The present term of respondent expires with the commencement of the next regular term, on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in the coming January, A. D. 1893. Art. 18, §§ 10, 14.

Tax collectors being within the policy of section 15 of article 4, of the Constitution set out above, the construction of such section, to the extent of the questions presented by the record, is necessary. There are two contentions on behalf of respondent which will be disposed of primarily. The first is: That the power of suspension given to the governor cannot be exercised by him until there has been an ascertainment "by the judgment of the courts or some other tribunal possessed of judicial power," of the existence of one or more of the causes for which suspension is authorized by the designated section. The power to make the inquiry and decide upon the existence of that which is "within the legal quality of wrong" for which suspension may be inflicted, is claimed to be judicial in its nature, and not within the official attributes of the governor. Our judgment is that whether the power be strictly judicial, or, on the contrary, administrative in its character, it exists in the governor. Moreover it is indisputable that if there is an adjudication anywhere, which, under a constitutional provision professing, like ours, to give the power of suspension or removal to a governor or other executive or administrative functionary, holds that such functionary has not the power to inquire into and decide upon the existence of the cause of removal, it has not been presented by counsel; nor has one been found by us in our own researches.

The last observation and the importance of the principle involved necessitate a presentation of the authorities relied upon by counsel for respondent. We will consider them in the order in which they appear in the brief. The decision in State v. Pritchard, 86 N. J. L. 101-119 (cited as Police Commissioners v. Jersey City, 86 N. J. L. 112, 118,) is, as summarized in the headnotes, (1), that the right to remove a state officer for misbehavior does not appertain to the executive office; that such act is judicial, and belongs to the court of impeachment (2), certain police commissioners of Jersey City, appointed by statute, having been convicted upon indictment of conspiracy to cheat the city, and the governor having declared their offices to be thereby vacated, and having appointed their successors, it was held that the executive action was illegal and void. The opinion clearly shows that no provision of the Constitution, nor of any statute, professed to give the governor the power of removal or suspension, and that the law did not give the conviction the effect of forfeiting the office, but that under the Constitution the jurisdiction to vacate the office was in the court of impeachment, in which the Constitution invested a part of the judicial power of the state, the Senate having the power of trial, and the Assembly the right to impeach. Another case cited is that of Dullam v. Willson, 53 Mich. 392, 51 Am. Rep. 128, decided in the year 1884, where the removal was for "official misconduct and habitual neglect of duty." By an amendment made in 1862 to the Michigan Constitution, it was ordained: "The governor shall have power, and it shall be his duty, except at such times as the Legislature may be in session, to examine into the condition and administration of any public office, and the acts of any public officer, elective or appointed, to remove from office for gross neglect of duty or for corrupt conduct in office, or any other misfeasance or malfeasance, either of the following state officers, to wit: the attorney-general, . . . or any other officer of the state, except legislative and judicial, elective or appointed, and to appoint a successor for the remainder of their respective unexpired term of office, and to report the cause of such removal to the Legislature at its next session." The opinion delivered by Judge Champlin holds unequivocally that the power of removal can be exercised only for the specific causes mentioned in the amendment, and upon specific charges of the particular acts relied on to make out the causes, and upon reasonable notice and opportunity for a hearing, and that the governor has judicial power to examine into and pass upon the charges. He says: "It is only when the causes named exist that the power conferred can be exercised. It follows as a necessary consequence that the fact must be determined before the removal can be made; . . . and the first question is, What is the proper tribunal in which such facts are to be ascertained. In my opinion this provision of the Constitution requires no legislation to make it effective. Read in the light of the history of the times, and the surrounding circumstances when it was adopted, the grant of power is to the governor, coupled with the duty enjoined to examine into the acts of any public officer, and to remove from office for gross neglect of duty or for corrupt conduct in office, any of the officers specified. The amendment for this purpose clothes him with judicial power. It is implied in the grant, and without it the grant would be nugatory and ineffectual to accomplish the purpose for which it was given." Again he says that the amendment, in effect, gives the governor "the right to try the question whether the officer is guilty or not, and to remove him from office." There is in the opinion nothing inconsistent with these views. At the foot of it we find the following: "Sherwood, J. concurred. Cooley, Ch. J.: I concur, both as to the right of the respondent to be heard upon charges, and as to the power of the governor under the Constitution to decide upon the charges." Then follows the opinion of the fourth judge, Campbell, and he alone asserts the view that any court proceeding was necessary; and whereas he concurs with the other judges in a judgment for the respondent on the ground that respondent had had no notice or opportunity for a hearing, still his views affirming the necessity for a proceeding in court are entirely antagonistic to those as to the sole power of the governor to determine the existence of the cause for removal, asserted by the court through a majority of its judges, and for which the adjudication is an authority. Of the other case relied on in this connection, Page v. Hardin, 8 B. Mon. 648, it is only necessary to say that, like the one from New Jersey, supra, there was no pretense of grant of power of removal or suspension, to the executive; and, considering the differences of organic law, its conclusion that the power of removal was confined to the court of impeachment is, like that in the New Jersey case, not in conflict with the judgment of the majority of the Michigan court in Dullam v. Willson. Viewed in the light of the designated difference in the Constitutions of Michigan and those of New Jersey and Kentucky, there is no real contrariety of views or judgment to be found in the opinions of the three courts, excluding, of course Judge Campbell's opinion as to the necessity for action by a court where there is a special grant to the governor of power to remove as in Michigan.

That the grant of such a power as has been conferred upon the governor by the section under consideration invests him with the power to investigate, and to decide as to the existence of any of the causes for which a suspension of an officer may be made, seems to us beyond controversy in the light of common reason; which it is upon the authorities. Had it been the purpose that the suspension should take place only upon the ascertainment by a court, or other distinct tribunal, of the existence of the cause for suspension, it doubtless would have been made the necessary duty of the governor to suspend upon such ascertainment, or such ascertainment would have given the effect of working, ipso facto, a suspension. It would not have been left to the discretion of the governor to suspend or not, after the supposed tribunal had made its finding; nor would such finding have been subjected to the review and reversal which must be, and as we understand is conceded to be, reserved to the governor in the power "to reinstate the officer so suspended, upon satisfactory evidence that the charge or charges against him are untrue." Certainly the only status which could be claimed for such court or tribunal would be that of merely an advisory body, and the governor would have an appellate or supervisory, but not an original, jurisdiction to ascertain the truth of the charges. It is moreover, a fact that the Convention of 1885 rejected the following propositions: One, that county offices should be removed for incompetency, willful neglect of duty, malfeasance, misfeasance, drunkenness, gambling and any violation of the criminal laws of the state, upon conviction in the circuit court after indictment by the grand jury of the county, the officer to be suspended from the performance of his duties upon the filing of the indictment, and the governor to appoint a person to perform the duties of the office pending the judicial proceedings, and with further power in the governor, when no grand jury was in session, to suspend the officer charged with such offenses, if he should think a case was made upon the papers presented to him. Another, that all officers not liable to impeachment might be suspended or removed from office by the executive in such manner, and for such causes, as might be prescribed by the Legislature; and another, that the county commissioners should have the power to suspend county officers for habitual drunkenness, neglect of duty, incompetency, and the commission of felony; the board to give notice of the charge and of the time and place of trial, and to declare the office vacant if the charge was sustained on the trial, and the governor, thereupon, to order an election to fill the vacancy; and such trial to be within thirty days from service of the notice. And another, that the suspension by the governor should be upon a recommendation of the grand jury of the county, setting forth the charge against the officer; and still another, that the suspension should be after conviction by due course of law. Vide Journal of Constitutional Convention of 1885, pp. 119, 120, 134. The conclusion that the intention was to lodge in the chief executive, and in him alone, the exclusive power to investigate and decide, is to our minds irresistible when we consider the express grant of the Constitution to suspend for cause and reinstate, and the rejection of propositions to give the power of trial to other tribunals, including the courts.

The authorities are all to the effect that a grant of the power to remove either for cause or at discretion, carries with it the exclusive power to hear and decide; and whereas the courts are entirely powerless where the power is discretionary, they are equally so where it is for cause, if the grantee of the power acts within its limits, and upon notice, if notice is required; if the removal is for a cause designated by or following within the grant, the grantee or depository of the removing power is the sole judge of the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the removal. That such is the case where the power is discretionary, is settled by this court in State v. Ledwith, 14 Fla. 220. In State v. Doherty, 25 La. Ann. 119, where the executive power of removing the officer was "for refusing or failing to do his duty as prescribed by this Act," it was said: "The grant of power to the executive to remove an officer for a certain cause implies authority to judge of the existence of the cause. The power vested exclusively in executive discretion cannot be controlled in its exercise by any other branch of the government." In State v. Hawkins, 44 Ohio St. 98, the decision was that where charges embodying facts which, in judgment of law, constitute official misconduct, are preferred to the governor, of which notice is given the members charged, and he acting upon the charges so made removes them from office, his action is final and cannot be reviewed or held for naught by the courts on a proceeding in quo warranto whether he erred or not in exercising the power conferred upon him. And in Keenan v. Perry, 24 Tex. 253, where the governor was given power of removal for certain enumerated causes, the decision was that no principle is more firmly established than that where a special and exclusive authority is delegated to any tribunal or officer of the government, and no mode of revising his decision by appeal or otherwise is provided by law, his action is final and conclusive of the matter, and the law makes him the sole judge of the existence of the cause of removal. Dixon, Ch. J., speaking for the court in State v. McGarry, 21 Wis. 496, a quo warranto proceeding, where a statute gave a board of supervisors power to remove for incompetency, improper conduct, or other cause satisfactory to such board, said: "We are clearly of opinion that the power of the board is absolute and its determination final when acting within the scope of the power. The board may remove for incompetency, improper conduct or other cause satisfactory to the board. By 'other cause' we understand other kindred cause showing that it is improper that the incumbent should be retained in office. If the board should attempt to remove him for some cause not affecting his competency or fitness to discharge the duties of the office, that would be an excess of power, and not a removal within the statute. It would be equivalent to removing him without assigning any cause, a merely arbitrary removal, which the statute does not authorize. The cause must be one which touches the qualifications of the officer for the office, and shows he is not a fit or proper person to perform the duties; and when such cause is assigned, the power to determine whether it exists or not is vested exclusively in the board, and its decision upon the facts cannot be reviewed in the courts. The only question of judicial cognizance is whether the board has kept within its jurisdiction, or whether the cause assigned is a cause for removal under the statute." See also State v. Watertown, 9 Wis. 254; State v. Prince, 45 Wis. 610; State v. Frazier, 48 Ga. 187; Patton v. Vaughan, 89 Ark. 211; Donahue v. Will County, 100 Ill. 94; Ex parte Ramsay, 18 Q. B. 178.

The contention that the power of suspension cannot be exercised by the governor for the reason that it is judicial, is clearly untenable. It is true that the second article of our organic law divides the powers of government into three departments. Legislative, executive and judicial, and declares that no person properly belonging to one department shall exercise any powers appertaining to either of the others except in cases expressly provided for by this Constitution. The Constitution of Michigan contained a similar provision, (Charters and Constitutions of U. S. 996) and vested the judicial power in designated courts (Id. 1001); and the amendatory provision, set out above, was added, not to the executive or judicial articles or departments, but to the "Impeachments and Removals from Office" article, and the supreme court of that state held, in Dullam v. Willson, supra, that it was a judicial power, but was to be exercised, as indicated, by the governor. If the framers of our Constitution are, as claimed by counsel, to be charged with notice of this decision, when acting in convention, they must be accorded a knowledge of the conclusions of the court, which both affirmed the validity of a grant like that made to our chief executive, and held that the judicial power to hear and decide was implied in the grant; and the ordinary professional and lay judgment must be that the makers of our Constitution based their action upon the adjudication which sustained their work, rather than on a dissentient view which is entirely fatal to its efficiency. There are authorities which hold and with force, that such power when vested in a functionary of the executive department of the government is not judicial in its nature. State v. Hawkins and Donahue v. Will County, supra. It is, however, entirely unnecessary to ascertain whether the nature of the power is strictly judicial, or quasi judicial, or administrative, or what is its precise classification, since we are altogether satisfied that it is not a power given to the courts by the fourth, or judiciary, article, which provides that the judicial power of our state shall be vested in the courts there designated. If the power is judicial in its character, the fact nevertheless is that it has been given to the governor by the section of the executive article under discussion, and not to the courts, and the governor exercises it as a member of the executive department of the government, and not as a court, or member of the judiciary department; and the courts enumerated in the judiciary article, sections 1 and 34, as the depositaries of the judicial power of the state, cannot exercise it any more than they can the power of trying an officer under impeachment; and for any such court to attempt it would be a no less bald usurpation of the constitutional power of the chief executive, than an attempt to entertain an impeachment trial would be a lawless assumption of the exclusive functions of the Senate, under the 29th section of the legislature article, to try impeachments.

II. The second of the questions claiming primary consideration is that of the necessity for notice to the officer, of the charges, and an opportunity for a hearing, before the suspension. The alternative writ does not allege such notice or hearing (King v. Gaskin, 8 T. R. 209), and hence it is insufficient if the notice is necessary.

Under the Constitution of 1868 all executive and judicial officers, except the governor and lieutenant-governor and constables, were appointed by the governor, or by him with the concurrence of the Senate. The governor, lieutenant-governor, members of the cabinet, judges of the supreme and circuit courts, were subject to impeachment, the trial being by the Senate, and removal from office following conviction. Legislative Department, art. 4, § 29. The same section provided that all other officers who should have been appointed by the governor, by and with the advice of the Senate, might be removed from office "upon the recommendation of the governor and consent of the Senate." The 18th section of the fifth, or executive, article made assessors of taxes and collectors of revenue, who were appointed by the governor, with the consent of the Senate, and whose terms were two years, removable upon the recommendation of the governor and consent of the Senate, and ordained that county treasurers, county surveyors, superintendents of common schools and county commissioners, whose terms were each two years, were subject to be removed by the governor "when in his judgment the public welfare will be advanced thereby; provided, no officer shall be removed except for willful neglect of duty, or a violation of the criminal laws of the state, or for incompetency." Justices of the peace were appointed for four years, and were removable by the governor "for reasons satisfactory to him." County judges, state attorneys, sheriffs, and clerks of the circuit court were appointed in the same manner, but for four years (Judiciary Article, §§ 9, 10), there being, however, no provision as to their removal other than in section 29 of article 4, supra. State v. Ledwith, supra.

Such, as to the subject in hand, was the condition of the organic law which the Convention of 1885 was called to revise. Revision was the purpose of the convention, and it so understood. Journal, p. 81; State v. George, 23 Fla. 585. It is plain that in some cases the old instrument gave the governor and Senate a joint power of removal that was entirely discretionary (State v. Ledwith), and in others this power was in the governor alone and for cause, whereas, in the case of justices of the peace it was a matter of his sole and unlimited official discretion. That it is held by authorities of high character that the power to remove an officer for cause can be exercised only after notice and hearing, is unquestionable. King v. Gaskin, supra; Reg. v. Canterbury, 1 El. & El. 545; Dullam v. Willson, supra; State v. St. Louis, 90 Mo. 19; Fild v. Com. 82 Pa. 478; State v. Bryce, 7 Ohio, 82; People v. Whitlock, 92 N. Y. 191; Biggs v. McBride, 17 Or. 640, 5 L. R. A. 115; Mechem, Pub. Off. § 454. No notice is necessary either where the officer's tenure is at the pleasure of the appointing power, or where he holds for a particular term, and the power of removal is discretionary. Mechem, Pub. Off. § 454; State v. Stevens, 46 N. J. L. 844; People v. Whitlock, supra. Of course the authority which lawfully creates an office has full power to make the incumbent removable at the mere will of the appointing power, or for cause. State v. Ledwith, People v. Whitlock, State v. Stevens, supra; Mechem, Pub. Off. § 454.

There is, however, authority which holds that no notice is necessary even where the power of removal is limited to designated causes. State v. McGarry, supra. Mechem also puts this construction on Putton v. Vaughan, 87 Ark. 211, and State v. Doherty, 25 La. Ann. 119.

From what is said in the next preceding paragraph it necessarily follows that it was entirely competent for the framers of the organic law to have prescribed whatever conditions as to removal or suspension may have seemed advisable, and the adoption of them by the people in ratifying the Constitution would have made them the law of the land: and no incumbent of the office could be heard to complain of their enforcement. It is, moreover, altogether clear that the governor has not been given any sole power of removal. Whereas he may suspend an officer from the performance of the functions of his office until the Senate shall act at its next session, he has no exclusive power to remove him or deprive him of the future emoluments of his office. All such power existing under the former Constitution has been taken away, and the function of the governor in a recess of the Senate is limited and clearly defined. Where, in the performance of the duty enjoined upon him by the mandate to "take care that the law be faithfully executed" (Const. 1885, art. 4, § 6), he, in the exercise of a fair and just official judgment, finds that there is the misfeasance or malfeasance or neglect of duty in office, or the drunkenness or incompetency which, in the light of the public good, requires the removal of the officer, or where there has been the commission of a felony, the Constitution contemplates that the suspension shall be made. And though this power of suspension might have been bestowed without any right of hearing in the officer, or with the right of hearing before there could be any exercise of the power, neither course has been pursued. The provision that the governor "may reinstate the officer so suspended upon satisfactory evidence that the charge or charges against him are untrue," was not intended to merely give an arbitrary or willful discretion to the executive to make inquiry or not as might please a caprice or a prejudice, but it was both to impose upon him the duty of hearing evidence upon the charge and to secure to the suspended officer the constitutional right to be heard by the governor upon the charges which the latter has communicated to him upon suspending him. It is as much the duty of the governor on suspending an officer to notify him of the cause of the suspension, or charge upon which he has been suspended as it is to suspend when the facts of a particular case, viewed in the light of the public weal, demand removal; or as it is to refuse to suspend when they do not seem to demand removal or reinstate when under a misapprehension he may have erroneously suspended an officer. By this provision last quoted above the officer's right to a hearing has been postponed till after the suspension. This is one of the conditions upon which he accepts the office, and it is as obligatory upon him as are those as to age, residence, or bond, or any other which the Constitution or any valid statute may prescribe. That a governor may give notice of the charges before suspension, does not defeat the plain policy of the Constitution not to require him to do so, nor does it relieve him from the specific duties imposed by that instrument in this matter. It cannot be denied that there may be cases in which the public interest would suffer grievous detriment by postponing the suspension till after the hearing. The hearing contemplated, though its regulation is left to the chief executive, (at least until the law-making power shall act,) is a full and fair hearing, and often will take much time. It is always to be presumed that he will not hesitate to reinstate at any time, at least in the recess of the Senate, where it may be shown that he has erred in the act of suspension. This is, of course, a consideration which the people have confided to the conscience of the executive under his responsibility to them, yet it is patent that the exercise of the executive power to reinstate implies the status of suspension in the officer.

In reaching this conclusion we have not omitted to give serious consideration to the officer's property rights in his office; the right to its tenure and the enjoyment of its profits and honors against all unlawful invasion. Of course he is a public agent or servant, and has no such title to his office as prevents the power which gave it from terminating it or changing it. He holds subject to the law of the land as to its termination, modification, and as to suspension or removal therefrom. State v. Ledwith, State v. Hawkins, State v. Stevens and Donahue v. Will County, supra; Taft v. Adams, 3 Gray, 127. So long as the governor acts within the limits of his power the courts are powerless. The Constitution has made the Senate the sole check upon any erroneous action on his part. Any mere error of judgment, whether free from or attended by improper motive, is beyond our cognizance and not merely because, as in most of the adjudicated cases, there has been given no power to any tribunal to correct or arrest the effect of his error, but for the reason that a branch of the legislative department has been given that express power.

Under Rev. Stat., § 154, subsec. 6, electors had the right to pay poll taxes on Saturday, the third day of September, 1892, to qualify them to vote at the election of October 4 of the same year; and whether or not the collector was guilty of neglect of duty in not receiving the taxes as alleged in the alternative writ, was a question for the governor's decision. Rev. Stat., § 343, cannot be made to control it, as a matter of law, because the thirtieth day before the election fell on Sunday. The latter section required the collector to furnish the supervisor of registration, thirty days before the election, a list of all persons who had paid their capitation taxes for two years next preceding the year of the election.

III. It is also argued that the power of suspension cannot apply where, as in the case at bar, the term of the officer suspended will expire before the next session of the Senate, and in support of the point it is urged that the officer cannot in such cases be "restored to the right to resume the duties of the office," unless the governor should convene the Legislature in special session; and, further, that it enables him to practically defeat the elective system. If this position is correct, then the power of suspension does not apply to those officers whose term is only two years, except for the period, never more than about three months, which may antecede a session of the Legislature; nor will it apply to a four-year officer after the second session of the Legislature during any gubernatorial term. This would result from the prescribed commencement of the terms of officers and from the fixed time of the meeting of the biennial sessions of the Legislature. Is it to be supposed for a moment that the intelligence of the constitutional convention was oblivious to the fact that, under the general effect of the organic law they proposed to the people, many suspensions might necessarily occur of officers whose terms would expire before the next ensuing session of the Legislature, or that the people did not so understand when they ratified it? Both the members of the convention and the electors are presumed, and conclusively, to have understood it, and yet we find that the power of suspension has been given without any limitation to periods avoiding the result referred to. The purpose of the grant of power was good government; it was intrusted to the governor because the people believed the public welfare demanded it. They knew that there could be no resumption of duties where the officer's term would expire, and that in such cases the refusal or omission of the Senate to remove would merely preserve the officer's right to the compensation he would have earned had he not been suspended. Whatever defeat of the elective system it involves, was intended; it, however, in its theory, involves none, as the delinquencies falling within the enumerated causes of suspension must be held to be unanticipated by the people in any particular instance, and wherever they occur and the suspension or removal takes place, the expressed will of the people has been enforced by the suspension and removal. If it be that a governor may err in executing the powers, it must be admitted that the convention and the people were well aware that this might be, yet they intrusted him with the power, and they made it applicable as well when the officer's term would expire before the next Legislature as when it would not. We may remark here that we are aware that a similar argument is used by Judge Campbell in his opinion referred to above; but it must be remembered that he was contending against the power of the governor to remove on his own action, and this argument, like his petition, finds no support; but, on the contrary, condemnation in the conclusion of the majority of the Michigan court.

IV. Another position is, in effect, that the governor has, as shown by the terms of Gillen's commission, extended Gillen's appointment into the term of Johnson's successor, and in doing this he has also attempted to fill a term which does not become vacant until after the expiration of his own official life. Gillen's commission bears date November 26, 1892, and appoints him tax collector in and for Duval county until the adjournment of the next session of the Senate. The terms of Gillen's commission cannot extend his tenure beyond the actual period, whatever it may be, which the law attaches to the appointment; nor can any act of the governor impair the exclusive authority of his successor as to any official function. Any expression further than that the appointment of Gillen is, on the pleadings before us, valid for all the purposes of this case as it now stands, would be mere obiter and will not be indulged in. The case of Hench v. State, 72 Ind. 297, does not even tend to sustain the theory that Gillen's commission is void if it be he cannot legally hold for the time it specifies, but rather shows that it is valid for so long as the law will entitle him to hold; and such, in our judgment, is the legal effect of the commission. Advisory Opinion as to Attorney-General, 14 Fla. 277.

V. The only points remaining to be considered are those as to the propriety of the remedy invoked, and the absence of Gillen as a party. We will dispose of them in the order stated.

In Thompson v. Holt, 52 Ala. 491, Thompson, the appellant, had been duly elected judge of probate for six years, and having duly qualified by taking the oath and giving bond, and having received a commission from the governor, he entered upon the duties of the office. The law required that judges of probate should give an additional bond whenever the grand jury, in term time, or in vacation three members of the commissioners' court, should, by address to the circuit judge, require it, and it made the failure to execute such additional bond a forfeiture or vacation of the office. It also imposed on the circuit judge the duty of certifying the vacancy to the governor, who was required to fill it. Thompson having during his term of office been required in the manner stated to give an additional bond, and the circuit judge having upon investigation refused to approve a bond, in due form, tendered by Thompson, the judge certified the fact of the vacancy to the governor, who appointed Holt to fill the vacancy. Holt having qualified and been commissioned by the governor to the vacancy, demanded the books and other property of the office, but Thompson refused to deliver, whereupon Holt instituted a statutory remedy given to compel delivery in such cases. The opinion of the supreme court of that state, delivered by Brickell, Ch. J., holds that the giving of the additional bond was a condition upon which the continuance in the office depended, and that the statutory proceeding to compel the transfer of books and other property of a public office, though more summary and less formal, was merely cumulative, and would lie wherever mandamus could be obtained at common law. "A mandamus," says this learned judge, "to compel the delivery of property, could not be invoked when in reality the object was to test the title to the office. If the title was the real question in issue, the courts could not interfere by mandamus, but remitted the parties to quo warranto or other appropriate legal remedy. The relator must have exhibited a clear prima facie title, entitling him to the custody of the property of the office, or the courts would not compel its transfer to him. The same rule must prevail with reference to the statutory proceeding. It cannot be perverted into a method of determining the strength of rival claims to a public office. The complainant resorting to it must show a prima facie title to the office free from all reasonable doubt—a title to which the law attaches the possession of the property of the office, and the right to exercise the functions of the office until in a direct judicial proceeding that title has been vacated. A prima facie title to a public office confers a right to exercise its functions, and a right to the possession of the insignia and property thereof. On this prima facie title the court will compel a delivery of the insignia and property, that the functions and duties of the office may be exercised." It was also held that the action of the circuit judge in refusing to approve the additional bond could not be inquired into collaterally or on the special proceeding to deliver the official property, and the order made on the special proceeding for the delivery of the property was affirmed. "Public officers," says the opinion, "are elective, and the returns of the elections are made to the secretary of state, on whose certificate the commission originally issues. When subsequently to an election a vacancy occurs otherwise than by resignation, some public officer, ministerial or judicial, acting under the sanction of official oath, is charged with the duty of ascertaining and certifying the fact of vacancy to the governor. On this certificate an appointment is made, when it discloses that the office is vacant. The commission of the governor, whether granted on the certificate of election, or a certificate of vacancy, is the highest and best evidence of who is the officer, until on a quo warranto, or a proceeding in the nature of quo warranto, it is annulled by a judicial determination. It is this commission which imparts to the courts judicial notice and which informs the community who are clothed with official authority and bound to official duty. In a proceeding, whether by mandamus or under the statute, to compel the transfer of property attached to a public office, this commission is a clear prima facie title to the office, on which the courts will proceed without indulging any inquiries behind it, when it is founded on a certificate of election or a certificate disclosing vacancy made by proper authority. Inquiries behind it would generate a controversy as to title to the office, which, as we have already said, cannot be entertained either on an application for a mandamus or in the statutory proceeding. The court must rest on the prima facie title, and award the keeping of the property of the office to this title, for the time being, without adjudicating whether the relator has or has not the actual title."

In State v. Saxon, 25 Fla. 792, 796, we said that if the relator gave the bond and qualified and received the commission he had his remedy by mandamus against Saxon to compel him to surrender the custody of the books, files, office room and other property of the office without prejudice to the question of the ultimate right to the office. In State v. Sherwood, 15 Minn. 221, 2 Am. Rep. 116, the decision was that upon mandamus at the relation of the holder of a certificate of election to the office of clerk of the district court who has given the bond and taken the oath prescribed by law, the relator is entitled to the seal and other property of the office against one holding by virtue of an appointment till his successor is elected and qualified, and the court will not go behind the certificate of election and try the question whether or not the relator was eligible to such office. These conclusions are affirmed in Oswell v. Lambert, 10 Minn. 369; State v. Jaynes, 19 Neb. 161; People v. Kilduff, 15 Ill. 492; People v. Head, 25 Ill. 325; High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 73 et seq. See also State v. Hudson County Chosen Freeholders, 35 N. J. L. 269.

The case at bar is controlled by these authorities, which are clearly distinguishable from cases cited for respondent: People v. Stevens, 5 Hill, 616, where on an attempted election of a clerk by a board of aldermen there was a tie vote, the relator receiving nine votes, and the defendant, the then incumbent, the same number, and it was declared that no choice was made; and the relator, who was seeking by mandamus the books and other official property from the defendant, claimed that one of the aldermen, Osborn, who had voted for the defendant, was not a lawful member of the board, and that consequently he, the relator, had been elected; whereas the defendant claimed there was no election, and the consequent right to hold over until another clerk should be elected and qualify. The majority opinion states, in effect, that the facts showed that the relator proposed to try the title to the office, and "in so doing he must necessarily try the title of Osborn to the office of alderman," and that this could not be done collaterally; and that Osborn being at least a de facto officer, his vote was not a nullity, but his acts were valid as to the public. Re Gardner, 68 N. Y. 467. Gardner had in 1873 been elected an alderman and had entered upon the duties of his office January 1, 1874, and as alderman was ex officio supervisor, and in November, 1875, under a law of that year, one Carr was elected alderman, and one Coates, supervisor, and were in possession of the offices. Gardner claiming that the Act of 1875 was unconstitutional, and complaining that the clerk of the board refused to call his name, or recognize him as a member, asked a mandamus to compel him to do so. People v. Lane, 55 N. Y. 217, holds that where one has been installed into an office and is in possession discharging his duties under color of law, and where his right to the office depends upon the construction of a statute so ambiguous as to be difficult of interpretation, the title to the office should not be determined in a proceeding by mandamus instituted by another, who had been removed therefrom and claimed the office, to compel payment to him of the salary, the incumbent of the office not being a party to such proceeding. People v. Goetting, 133 N. Y. 569, was also a mandamus by one removed from the office of clerk, against the respondent who had removed him, to compel respondent to recognize him as clerk, and the new appointee was occupying and performing the duties of the office. In these cases there was either no clear prima facie title in the relator or the incumbent was not, and properly could not have been, a party.

In the case at bar there is a clear prima facie title free from all reasonable doubt, in Gillen, and there has been not even an irregularity in the exercise of the exclusive executive power of suspension and appointment, and the power to suspend is unquestionable. When the power has been executed in due form it is the duty of the suspended officer to cease to exercise the duties of his office, and it is likewise his duty to turn over the books to the appointee commissioned by the governor to perform the duties of the office. If it is not done voluntarily, and there is no remedy to compel it, then nothing but confusion in government will follow. It is a mistake to suppose that mandamus is excluded or avoided by the mere fact that there is another remedy. The law is that there must be another specific and adequate remedy. Ray v. Wilson, 29 Fla. 342, 14 L. R. A. 778; Tapping, Mandamus, 18, 19; High, Extr. Legal Rem. §§ 9, 15-17; Baker v. Johnson, 41 Me. 15; People v. Stevens, supra; Harwood v. Marshall, 9 Md. 83. Mandamus is clearly the only adequate remedy for preventing the confusion alluded to, and particularly as the Senate, and not the courts, is the body to pass upon the correctness of the action of the executive, so long as he keeps within the range of the power confided to him.

2. Gillen is not a necessary party to this proceeding. The state is the real plaintiff here, just as it would be if he, instead of the attorney-general, were the relator. The purpose of the action is to enforce the performance of a public duty, the interest in which is common to the whole community. State v. Jefferson County Comrs. 17 Fla. 707; Hamilton v. State, 3 Ind. 452; Pike County v. People, 11 Ill. 203; Ottawa v. People, 48 Ill. 233; People v. Collins, 19 Wend. 56; People v. Halsey, 37 N. Y. 344; State v. Marshall County Judge, 7 Iowa, 186, 202; State v. Crawford, 28 Fla. 441, 14 L. R. A. 253.

In Walter v. Belding, 24 Vt. 658, where the books of record of a town were wrongfully held by a person claiming to be the town clerk, it was held that the writ of mandamus was the proper remedy, and that the same might with propriety be supplicated by the legal town clerk, but if done by the town agent in behalf of the town, it was no such irregularity as to defeat the proceedings. The attorney-general is a proper representative of the people for instituting these proceedings. It is not an action of replevin for personal property of Gillen, nor an ejectment for his real estate.

The motion to quash, or demurrer, is overruled, and it will be ordered accordingly.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

J. M. ANDERSON et al., Appts.,

v.

George W. CRISP, Resp't.

A contract for the sale of a certain number of "merchantable brick," which are not yet segregated, but which are to be taken from a kiln containing a larger number, some of which are unmerchantable, does not pass the title although the purchase price is paid.

(November 14, 1892.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Chehalis County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover possession of certain brick. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. B. F. Jacobs and Schofield & Schofield, for appellants:

A sale is a contract, nothing less, nothing more; and the same cardinal rule governs in the contract of sale that governs in any other contract, to wit, the intention of the parties.

1 Travis, Sales, p. 2; 2 Kent, Com. p. 468; Campbell, Sales, 1, 2; Blackburn, Sales, Text Book ed. § 91; Newmark, Sales, §§ 1-3; Gardner v. Lane, 12 Allen, 39; Atkinson, Sales, 5; 2 Abbott, Law Dict. 442; Cunningham v. Ashbrook, 20 Mo. 558; Schermerhorn v. Taiman, 14 N. Y. 117; Story, Sales, 1.

And a delivery is not a prerequisite to the passing of the title.

2 Bl. Com. Hammond's ed. 448, 449; Bloxam v. Sanders, 4 Barn. & C. 941.

But delivery is usually looked to as an evidence of the intention of the parties.

Newmark, Sales, § 94, and authorities there cited in note 1.

And it is the growing practice of the American courts to let each case go upon its own facts, upon the criterion of the intention of the parties.

Newmark, Sales, § 98; 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. § 250, and authorities there cited.

And the old rule that title does not pass as long as anything remains to be done on the part of the vendor will not prevail where it is the intention of the parties that the title is to vest immediately in the buyer, notwithstanding something remains to be done on the part of the seller, a fortiori, where all that remains to be done is to be done by the buyer.

Newmark, Sales, § 94; Foster v. Ropes, 111 Mass. 10; Lingham v. Eggleston, 27 Mich. 324.

Where the intention of the parties is clearly manifest, that intention is to govern.

Newmark, Sales, § 98; 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. § 250, and authorities there cited; Hyde v. Lathrop, 3 Keyes, 597; Groat v. Gile, 51 N. Y. 431; Marble v. Moore, 102 Mass. 443; Southwestern Freight & C. Leonard, 24 Pa. 14, 62 Am. Dec. 854; Olyphant v. Baker, 5 Denio, 379.

The old rule is not applicable in this action, for the reason that the separating and the counting in this case were to be done by the vendee, and all was done by the vendor that was required or contemplated on his part.

The sale will be sustained without separation where the property is part of a general mass of the same kind and value, and the intention of the parties is to make a complete sale.

Dunbar, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is contended by the appellants that the determining question in this case is whether a sale of personal property constituting a part of a large mass of like property passes title to the purchaser until it is separated from the mass, or in some other way designated or distinguished; and appellants' brief on this proposition is elaborate and painstaking, and would greatly aid the court in investigating this question, did we deem its determination necessary in this cause. The question presented by appellants is a new question in this state, and is an exceedingly important one; and in consideration of its importance, and in consideration of the fact that the authorities are so conflicting, we deem it advisable not to decide it until such decision is necessary to the determination of the cause at issue. We say this because, conceding the force of appellants' argument, this cause, we think, must be distinguished from the cases cited which sustain the rule contended for by appellants, that it is not necessary to separate or distinguish a portion of personal property from the mass which includes it, to pass title to the portion sold. All those cases are based on the supposition that all the different portions of the mass are of equal value and of uniform quality, so that there is nothing left to be done by either party but to weigh, measure, or count, which acts involve no discretion; that the intention of the parties to the contract is the only thing to be considered, and that, when it can be definitely determined from the terms of the contract that the intention of the parties was to pass the title, the title is held to pass. Or, in other words, we presume they mean to say that, while the separation from the common mass is a circumstance going to show the intention of the parties to pass the title, it is not an essential circumstance. Kimberly v. Patchin, 19 N. Y. 880, 75 Am. Dec. 834, is the leading case supporting this rule, and has received much criticism, both favorable and adverse, by courts and text-writers. There it was held, upon a sale of a specific quantity of grain, that its separation from a mass indistinguishable in quality or value, in which it is included, is not necessary to pass the title, when the intention to do so is otherwise clearly manifested. In that case it will be noticed that the goods were indistinguishable in quality or value, and it was upon that particular state of facts that the argument of the court was based. "It is," said the court, "a rule asserted in many legal authorities, but which may be quite as fitly called a rule of reason and logic as of law, that in order to an executed sale, so as to transfer a title from one party to the other, the thing sold must be ascertained. This is a self-evident truth, when applied to those subjects of property which are distinguishable by their physical attributes from all other things, and therefore are capable of exact identification." But the court with great force proceeds to argue that other character of property, such as grains, wines, oils, etc., which are not susceptible of definite description, are not subject to this rule, but that the title to such property can be held to pass by contract without separation or manual delivery, if nothing further remains to be done in regard to it. But it must be admitted that if all the property in the mass is not of equal value something more does remain to be done. Thus, in the case at bar, another element is injected into the contract, and there is a question of relative values to be yet determined. The appellants did not buy a portion of an indistinguishable mass, where all the component parts were of equal value; but their contract called for 162,000 merchantable brick; and the evidence was that the brick that were deemed unmerchantable were thrown aside and not counted in when they came to haul them. So that it is impossible to determine, before the segregation of the brick, not only what particular brick were sold, but what relative portions of the kiln were sold. And while, as we have said before, it may be conceded that the intention of the parties will be carried into effect, if it can be ascertained, yet under this contract it is impossible to ascertain, not only the particular brick sold, but the actual relative number of brick sold, by reason of the unsettled question of what brick were and what were not merchantable, creating an element of uncertainty in the contract which does not exist in those cases where the vendor sells a certain number of bushels of grain or a certain number of gallons of oil or tons of hay, in an undivided mass, where all the different portions are of equal value. We think to hold that the title passed in this case would be carrying the principles of liberal construction beyond the rule laid down in any of the cases cited by appellants. It is true that some of them were brick cases, similar in most respects to the case at bar, but in none of them did it appear that the brick in the kiln were not of uniform and equal value; and all the American cases were decided on the strength of Kimberly v. Patchin, supra, and the principles upon which that case was based are thus stated by Mr. Ralston, who is an earnest advocate of what he terms "the new rule." "When the constituent parts which make up a mass are indistinguishable from each other by any physical difference in size, shape, texture, or quality, and the quantity and general mass from which it is to be taken are specified, the subject of the contract is sufficiently ascertained, and the title will pass, if the sale is complete in all its other circumstances." Plainly, the case at bar does not fall within those principles.

This being our view of the law covering this particular case, and there being no conflict in the testimony concerning the fact that it was only merchantable brick that were sold, the appellants could not have been injured by the instruction complained of; for they would not have been entitled to a verdict, in any event. Reaching this conclusion renders unnecessary the investigation of the other questions raised.

The judgment is affirmed.

TEXAS COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS.

Louis EVERS, Appt.,

STATE of Texas.

(.....Tex.....)

1. Insulting language which can reduce a homicide to manslaughter being restricted by statute to that for which the killing takes place immediately it cannot have that effect where the defendant ignored it and started to go away and committed the homicide only after he had been called back.

2. Proof of the reputation of deceased as a dangerous man is not admissible in favor of one being tried for killing him, where at the time of the homicide deceased had done no act indicating a purpose to harm defendant.

NOTE.—The subject of insanity as affecting criminal liability, which is modified by the Texas Statute, is treated, so far as the right and wrong test is 18 L. R. A.

concerned, in a note to State v. Harrison (W. Va.) ante, 224, with which, see also Hornish v. People (Ill.) ante, 237.

3. Proof of the declarations of a cab driver which consisted of calling, "There he goes," as an officer went to arrest a person, is inadmissible.
4. The court should define "temporary insanity," where it has charged under the Texas statute that the guilt of a person who has committed a homicide is to be tried without reference to his drunkenness unless that produced temporary insanity.
5. The fact that one who committed a homicide was temporarily insane when he formed and executed the design to kill another may be taken into consideration under Pen. Code, art. 40a, both to determine the degree of the murder and in fixing the penalty.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Bexar County convicting him of murder in the second degree and fixing his punishment at forty years' confinement in the penitentiary. Reversed.

Defendant, and one, Robert Richter, became involved in a difficulty. On the Sunday morning on which the homicide occurred defendant was drinking and, meeting Richter, they renewed the quarrel and proceeded to fight. They were separated and Richter went home whither defendant subsequently followed him. After some altercation, during which deceased was in his dooryard, and defendant in the street in front of the house, deceased jeered at and taunted defendant and defendant offered to settle with deceased, either peaceably or by fighting with fists or with pistols, and at the same time produced two pistols and offered deceased his choice of them. Deceased refused the offer and after some further talk, defendant in the meantime starting to leave and returning, he drew one of the pistols and shot and killed Richter.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Perry J. Lewis and Denman & Franklin for appellant.

Mr. R. H. Harrison, Asst. Atty-Gen., for the State.

Simkins, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There are numerous bills of exception and assignments of error, but it will be only necessary to consider the following:

1. The defendant complains that the court refused to charge the jury on manslaughter. The ground relied upon was the fact that Richter, while jeering at and abusing defendant, told him "he didn't know who his father was." If any such remark was made by Richter, it cannot avail defendant, for after it was made said defendant turned and went away, and Richter went into the house, and, according to the same witness, (Flora,) called to him to come back, and shook his fist at him. The statute declares that, to reduce homicide to manslaughter, the killing must take place immediately upon the utterance of the insulting words. Penal Code, art. 598. The insulting language seems to have been disregarded. Defendant drew out of his own witness, Flora, the fact that defendant would not have come back, even after the alleged insult, if deceased had not kept calling him. But, while the taunts and cries of, "Come back and kill me," of the infuriated Richter may have led to that result, it would be none the less murder on the part of defendant.

2. The court did not err in refusing to permit defendant to prove the reputation of deceased as a violent, dangerous man. If such a character could have been proven, the deceased had certainly done no act indicating any purpose whatever to take defendant's life or do him any harm. He stood in his yard, in shirt sleeves and stocking feet, and according to defendant's own witness, had declined to touch defendant's pistol when defendant proposed to have a combat. Willson, Crim. Stat. § 1054.

3. The court erred in admitting the cry of the cab driver, "There he goes!" referring to the defendant, when the officer went out to arrest him. If the cab driver saw the defendant making his escape, he ought to have been placed on the stand to testify to that fact.

4. There is, however, a serious question presented by the record, which will necessitate a reversal of this cause. The court charged the statute on drunkenness, and then instructed the jury that "the law just quoted places a person charged with crime before the law to be tried without reference to his drunkenness, unless said drunkenness goes to the extent of producing temporary insanity. It is therefore your duty, as a preliminary inquiry, to discover the mental status of the defendant at the time of the homicide." Conceding the charge to be correct so far as it goes, it was manifestly insufficient merely to submit to the jury, without further comment than the charge above quoted, a statute about which there was such uncertainty and diversity of opinion, and let the jury draw their own inference as to its purport and meaning. We think the exception, duly reserved by the defendant, was well taken, to the effect that the court erred in failing to define "temporary insanity," and in failing to charge they could consider it in mitigation of the penalty after they had determined the degree of murder.

The statute on drunkenness (Penal Code, art. 40a) has been twice considered and passed upon by this court, and it was held, as we think, correctly: First, that mere intoxication from the recent use of ardent spirits should not excuse nor mitigate the degree or penalty of crime; second, that intoxication must go to the extent of producing temporary insanity before it can mitigate the penalty in any crime, or be considered in murder cases to determine the degree of murder. Clor's Case, 26 Tex. App. 624; and Evans' Case, 29 Tex. App. 539, in which the case was heard on habeas corpus on a state of facts different from that here presented. The difficulty, however, seems not to be so much in the terms of the statute as in the reluctance of the trial courts to hold that one grossly intoxicated, or temporarily insane from intoxication, is any more liable for punishment for crime than one insane from any other cause. The history of the statute is well known. Some ten years ago one Porter, a traveling actor, was shot down without provocation in an eastern town in this state. The defendant was tried and acquitted on the ground of temporary insanity, caused by drunkenness. The Legislature, assembling shortly after, passed this Act: Article 40a: "Neither intoxication, nor temporary insanity of mind produced by the voluntary recent use of ardent spirits, shall constitute any excuse in this state for the commission of crime, nor shall intoxication mitigate either the degree or penalty of crime; but evidence of temporary insanity produced by such use of ardent spirits may be introduced by the defendant in any criminal prosecution in mitigation of the penalty attached to the offense for which he is being tried, and, in cases of murder, for the purpose of determining the degree of murder of which the defendant may be found guilty." By its terms there were two purposes clearly intended: First, to eliminate mere intoxication as any defense in any criminal prosecution whatever, regardless of the constituent elements of the crime; second, to prevent temporary insanity from being a defense to any crime, but permitting it to be introduced in murder cases to determine the degree, and in all criminal prosecutions to mitigate or lessen the penalty.

The object of the statute was to prevent parties from pleading their own wrong, after voluntarily placing themselves under the influence of drink, and becoming a terror to the community, or a menace to other citizens, whose feelings are often outraged, and their lives endangered or destroyed, by the insolence and recklessness of such intoxicated persons. The underlying principle of the statute is that laid down by common-law writers, to wit, that a sane man, who voluntarily puts himself in such a condition as to have no control over his will or actions, must be held to intend the consequences springing therefrom. Puff. de Jur. Nat. lib. 8, chap. 6, § 4; 2 Co. Litt. 247a; 1 Hale, P. C. 82; 4 Bl. Com. 20.

There is no question that, under the common law, intoxication was not deemed a defense for any criminal act, even though done while a person was insensible to his surroundings, unconscious of his acts, and had no memory or understanding; (Reniger v. Fogossa, 1 Plowd. 19; Beverley's Case, 4 Coke, 123; Pirtle v. State, 9 Humph. 668;) and such was the law in England and America as late as 1835, (State v. John, 80 N. C. 883; State v. Turner, 1 Wright (Ohio), 81; Cornwell v. State, 1 Mart. & Y. 147; Rea v. Carroll, 7 Car. & P. 145.) During the past sixty years there has been a persistent, and in the English and many of the American courts a successful, effort to ingraft upon the common-law doctrine the proposition that drunkenness ought to be admitted in evidence, not to excuse, justify, or mitigate the crime, but simply to throw light upon the mental status of the offender, to enable the jury to find out what crime had been committed; or, rather, by proving the absence of the necessary constituents of the crime, (such as malice, premeditation, intent, etc.,) to show that no crime was committed. At first the proposition was only insisted upon and applied in murder cases, or assaults with intent to murder, but the doctrine was soon pushed out to its logical results, and is now applied by some courts to every species of crime which has an intent. It is now generally held that intoxication is admissible as evidence in all the states where murder is divided into degrees, not to deny the guilt, but to determine the degree. Wharton, Crim. Law, § 51. But this innovation on the common law was vigorously opposed by the early judges. It was, indeed, by its advocates admitted to be dangerous doctrine, and one that ought to be received with caution. Id.; State v. John, 80 N. C. 880; Pirtle Case, supra. Mr. Wharton says: "It has been held with marked uniformity in this country that voluntary drunkenness is no defense to the factum of guilt. The only difference has been the extent to which evidence of drunkenness is received to determine the exactness of intent and the extent of deliberation." Wharton, Crim. Law, § 49.

There has been no subject upon which courts have so widely differed, or in which the same courts have so often changed their views, as upon this question. A fair illustration of this is shown in the Tennessee decisions referred to in the Lyle Case (Tex. App.) 19 S. W. Rep. 908, which case, in so far as it conflicts with this case, is overruled. In 1827 the law was laid down, in accord with the best authorities, that insanity resulting from long-continued drunkenness is an excuse for crime; but insanity, the immediate result of intoxication, is not. Cornwell Case, Mart. & Y. 147; Bennett Case, Id. 188. But in 1843 the court in a murder case laid down the doctrine in all its fullness: "That, although drunkenness, in point of law, constitutes no excuse for crime, still when the nature and essence of a crime are made by law to depend on the peculiar state of defendant's mind at the commission of the act, drunkenness is a proper subject of consideration. The question is, What is the mental status at the time of the act, and with reference to the act? This is not holding that drunkenness is an excuse, but it is an inquiry whether the very crime defined by law has been in fact committed. If the mental state required by law to constitute the crime be one of deliberation and premeditation, and drunkenness or other cause excludes the existence of such mental state, then the crime is not excused by the drunkenness or such other cause, but has not in fact been committed." Swan's Case, 4 Humph. 186. This reasoning authorized the introduction of drunkenness in any degree in all cases of crime. But in 1849, in the Pirtle Case, 9 Humph. 668, the same court expressly asserted the common-law doctrine to be correct, and expressly limited the doctrine announced in Swan's Case to murder cases only, and declared that this was only admitted in Tennessee because of the statute of that state dividing murder into two degrees; and also asserting that the drunkenness must be excessive, and that it can only be introduced to reduce the degree of murder, but not to make it manslaughter. But, while the court adhered to common law, it also indulged in reflections that tend to sustain the propositions of the Swan Case, and question the correctness of the common law. State v. Cross, 27 Mo. 332. In the following year the question came again before the Tennessee courts in the case of Haile v. State, 11 Humph. 154, and the courts sustained the views announced in Pirtle v. State, but held that the degree of drunkenness which may be considered to shed light on the mental status need not be that excessive intoxication which renders a party incapable of a criminal intent, but that any state of drunkenness is a proper subject of inquiry. So it appears that in Tennessee drunkenness to any extent is admissible only in murder cases, and for the sole purpose of reducing the crime, if at all, to murder in the second degree, but not to manslaughter, or any lower degree of crime. Cartwright v. State, 8 Lea, 377. The statute is right in excluding mere drunkenness as evidence in criminal cases. But the law laid down by the Pirtle Case seems to have been the law in Texas prior to the statute, as declared by this court in Colbath's Case, 4 Tex. App. 76, and in McCarty's Case, Id. 461.

It is certainly difficult for an ordinary mind to understand how drunkenness is admissible to shed light on the mental status of the offender, and yet not mitigate his offense; how it may be a circumstance to be considered by the jury in determining the intent, and yet not be an excuse for crime, if taken into consideration at all. It is claimed there is no inconsistency, because intoxication simply goes to show that no crime has been committed. It would certainly seem that, if no crime had been committed, it is immaterial whether defendant was drunk or sober. If all the facts in the case except the drunkenness show a crime was committed, yet the element of drunkenness changes the nature of the offense, and makes it nothing, then it must certainly excuse the crime. It unquestionably overturns the common-law doctrine; and the naked proposition, divested of its metaphysical distinctions and fine-spun explanations, is boldly asserted, that drunkenness can avoid moral and legal responsibility for crime. Punishment of crime rests upon the theory that the criminal not only has possession of his will, but of the power to control it. It is upon this fact that human responsibility must rest. The drunkard does not lose the power to control his will unless unconscious, but he does lose the desire to do so. So all criminals become such because they lose the desire to control their will; hence the necessity for the strong arm of the law to supply that missing incentive for good behavior which was lost by vicious indulgence. It cannot be denied there is a great difference between a crime deliberately planned and executed by a sober, calculating criminal, and one hastily committed by one whose mind is clouded or infuriated by intoxication; but human laws are based upon considerations of public policy, and look rather to the maintenance of the social order and personal security of the citizen than to fine discriminations in the conduct of wrongdoers. Against the ordinary assassin or wrongdoer there may be some check,—caution may ward off the crime, or innocence may escape its work; but the drunkard is dangerous to the innocent as well as to the most depraved. Wharton, Crim. Law, § 49.

But the statute of the state definitely settles this question, and this court is not at liberty to follow the reasoning under which other courts have drifted far away from the common law. Yet the statute, wisely conceding something to modern thought, permits the intoxicated person, when it is so excessive as to render a person unconscious that the act he is doing is wrong, and will subject him to punishment, to plead his condition, and if it appears the design to kill was not previously formed, or premeditated, or arising out of a previous difficulty, or from revenge, or executed with cool, deliberate, and passionless action indicating malice, but was the result of a sudden, rash, and unpremeditated design, springing out of inconsiderate or irrational action or excitement, and originating in a mind so inflamed by intoxicants as to be wholly incapable of reflection or self-control, the jury should find the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree, but nothing less; and may also reduce the penalty they would otherwise attach to the crime for his condition. It is to be observed that it is only in murder cases he can plead temporary insanity as a reduction of the degree of crime. In no other character of crime is it admissible to change its nature for want of constituent elements. It was so at common law. As Wharton says, "there was no denial of the fact of guilt." Hence the court erred in not instructing the jury that, if defendant, while temporarily insane, formed the design to slay Richter, and immediately carried his design into execution, they could take into consideration his condition, both in determining the degree of murder, and in fixing the penalty to be assessed by them. The jury, without instruction, having found the offense to be murder in the second degree, may have found a lower penalty had they been so instructed.

The next question is, What does the statute mean by the term "temporary insanity?" Whatever be the form or cause of insanity, it is settled by all authorities that the law will not consider it in a criminal case unless it deprives a person of the capacity and power to distinguish between right and wrong as to the particular act charged as an offense. If a person has knowledge and consciousness that the act he is doing is wrong, and will deserve punishment, whatever be his mental or physical weakness, he is, in the eye of the law, of sound mind and memory, and consequently the subject of punishment. But if a person is incapable of having a knowledge and a consciousness that the act he is doing is wrong and criminal, and will subject him to punishment, he is insane, and not responsible for crime committed by him. Willson, Crim. Stat. § 81, and cases cited; Nixon's Case, 32 Kan. 205; 5-Lawson, Defenses to Crime, Insanity, 231; Whart. & S. Med. Jur. 45. Though it is a general rule that insanity is an excuse for crime, there is one exception to the rule, and that is, where the crime is committed by a party in a fit of intoxication, though the party is bereft of his reason by drunkenness, and therefore is insane as from any other cause. All authorities recognize drunkenness to be a species of insanity that may be attended, when carried far enough, with loss of reason and self-control while under the direct effects of the intoxicant; but this effect is voluntary, and brought about by the acts of the party, and thereby differs from ordinary insanity, which is the act of Providence, and the sufferer is not responsible.

There are two kinds of insanity produced by alcoholism: First. Delirium tremens, caused by the breaking down of the person's system by long-continued or habitual drunkenness.

and brought on by abstinence from drink. This is what is called "settled insanity," to distinguish it from "temporary insanity" or drunkenness, directly resulting from drink. "Settled insanity," from the earliest times, has been held to be a complete defense to crime. Lord Hale says: If by means of drunkenness an habitual or fixed madness be caused, though contracted by the will of the party, it will excuse crime. P. C. pt. 1, chap. 4. In United States v. Drew, 5 Mason, 28, decided in 1828, Story, J., says: "Insanity, whose remote cause is habitual drunkenness, is an excuse for crime committed by the party while so insane, but not intoxicated, or under the influence of whiskey. Such insanity has always been deemed a sufficient excuse for any crime done under its influence." United States v. McGuire, 1 Curt. C. C. 1; Macconnehey v. State, 5 Ohio St. 77; Carter v. State, 12 Tex. 500, 62 Am. Dec. 539; Erwin's Case, 10 Tex. App. 702. Second. The other kind of insanity, or temporary insanity, is that condition of the mind directly produced by the use of ardent spirits; and where a fit of intoxication is carried to such a degree that the person becomes incapable of knowing the act he is doing is wrong and criminal, as above stated, he is in that condition referred to by the statute as being "temporarily insane," as stated by this court in the Kelly Case (Tex.) 20 S. W. Rep. 357 (decided at this term). There is no difference between the two kinds of insanity, so far as the mental status is concerned, but they differ widely in their causes and results. The first is from drinking as a remote result, the second from drinking as a direct result. The first is an involuntary result, from which all shrink alike; the second is voluntarily sought after. In the first, there is no criminal responsibility; but in the second, responsibility never ceases.

There is evidence only of temporary insanity in the record, and the court erred in not explaining temporary insanity to the jury, and also instructing them that, if they believed that defendant was temporarily insane at the time he formed the intent to kill deceased, and the same was carried into execution while defendant was so insane, they should take such insanity into consideration, both in determining the degree and in reducing the penalty.

For the errors indicated, the cause is reversed and remanded.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

E. A. SANDERS, Appt.,

v.

Oscar McMILLIAN.

1. The test whether an assignment of dower by metes and bounds would or would not be unjust under Code 1886, §§ 1910, 1911, is not to be determined by the interest of the doweress alone, but according to what would be just and right as between her and the present owner of the land.

2. The depreciation in the value of land which is subject to dower after alienation by the husband whether from natural causes or from the mere negligence of the purchaser or alienee in keeping the property in repair is not sufficient cause for assigning compensation to the widow according to the value at the time of the alienation, instead of setting off the dower by metes and bounds.

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Greene County

NOTE.—Effect of depreciation in the value of land on a widow's dower right therein.

The doctrine of the above case although it has rarely been brought into direct decision is supported by nearly all the decisions which have been made on the question.

It is said, indeed, in Co. Litt. 32a, in respect to a widow's dower, "if the value be impaired in the time of the heir she shall be endowed according to the value at the time of the assignment and not according to the value as it was at the time of her husband."

But in Thompson v. Morrow, 5 Serg. & R. 280, 9 Am. Dec. 368, it is said by Chief Justice Tilghman, and his language is expressly adopted by Judge Story in Powell v. Monson & B. Mfg. Co., 3 Mason, 347: "I have found no adjudged cases in the year books confining the widow to the value at the time of the alienation by her husband where the question did not arise on improvements made after the alienation."

In the main case the court says: "We have not been able to discover any case, nor has any been cited by counsel, in which deterioration in value either from natural causes or from the mere negligence of the purchaser or alienee in keeping the property in repair has been considered sufficient cause for assigning compensation in lieu of dower 18 L. R. A.

instead of setting the same off by metes and bounds, or in which it is held that the widow is entitled to compensation on account of such deterioration." We believe that no search will be able to discover any such case except Hale v. James, 6 Johns. Ch. 258, 2 L. ed. 118, 10 Am. Dec. 338.

It is true that Chancellor Kent in Hale v. James, supra, said: "The rule is fixed and steady and whether the land be improved in value or whether it be impaired in value in the time of the heir the endowment is still to be according to the value at the time of the assignment (Co. Litt. 32a)," and the court held in that case that the time of alienation of premises by the husband was the time at which the value must be taken for the purpose of assigning the widow's dower.

But the general rule in this country is that the value of the lands at the time of the allotment of dower, exclusive of improvements made after alienation by the husband, must control in determining the amount of the widow's dower right. Fritz v. Tudor, 1 Bush, 28; Powell v. Monson & B. Mfg. Co. 3 Mason, 347; Westcott v. Campbell, 11 R. L. 378; McClanahan v. Porter, 10 Mo. 746; Braxton v. Coleman, 5 Call, 433, 2 Am. Dec. 522; Dunseith v. Bank of United States, 6 Ohio, 78.

In Dunseith v. Bank of United States, supra, the effect of an increase in value was the chief matter of contention, but the court said: "If the lands awarding complainant dower by metes and bounds out of land which had been alienated by her husband in his lifetime disallowing her claim to an allowance in lieu of dower. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Greene & Mobley for appellant.
Messrs. Judge & De Graffenried for appellee.

Thorington, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant filed her bill in the chancery court for the assignment of dower in lands of which her husband was seised in fee in his lifetime, but which were alienated by him to appellee's vendor without appellant's joining in the conveyance or otherwise relinquishing her dower interest since such conveyance. The bill alleges that an assignment of dower by metes and bounds would be unjust, and claims that appellant is dowerable of the value of the land at the time of the alienation, and that the interest on one third part of such valuation from the death of her husband shall be paid to her annually during her life, and secured by a lien on the land. The reasons alleged to show that an assignment of dower in the lands by metes and bounds would be unjust are that the tract of land at the time of its alienation was worth about $14,000, and that its value at the time of the death of appellant's husband was $1,000; that the depreciation in value was caused "largely by the wear and tear of time and the unskillful cultivation of the soil, coupled with the want of fertilizers and the failure to keep the houses in repair; all these coupled with the fact that there is a general decline in values in real estate in that locality;" and it is further alleged "that if said tract of land had been kept up to the standard of a well-regulated farm, and the buildings kept in good repair, then the depreciation in value would not be so great." The land was aliened by the husband in the year 1861, and the death of the husband occurred in the year 1889. The general rule is that, whenever the property in which the widow is entitled to dower is capable of division, dower must be set off by metes and bounds. 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 927; 2 Scribner, Dower, p. 581, § 1, McClanahan v. Porter, 10 Mo. 746; Dunseath v. Bank of United States, 6 Ohio, 76; Code 1886, §§ 1901, 1910.

The assignment of dower by the common law is of one third part of the lands and tenements of which the widow is dowerable, to be set out by metes and bounds where it is practicable, to be held by her for life. The endowment is required to be of parcel of the lands and tenements themselves. Dower so assigned is said to have been set out "according to common right." When, however, the property did not admit of an assignment of dower in severalty, either from the nature of the husband's interests in it or from the quality of the thing itself, the assignment by metes and bounds was of necessity dispensed with, and an assignment of compensation in lieu of dower was made, or an assignment "against common right," as it is sometimes designated; and this assignment was so made as to yield the widow one third of the rents and profits received from the entire estate. It was further the rule of the common law that if the land was held by the heir or devisee the widow was entitled to have the value of the land estimated at the time dower was assigned, thus giving her the benefit of improvements made by the heir or devisee, and also that she should bear a proportion of the loss which may have been incurred by an unavoidable diminution in the value of the lands during the time which intervenes between the death of her husband and the assignment of her dower. If such deterioration was caused by the willful waste of the heir, she was entitled to an action for diminish in value subsequent to the alienation the widow is, it is conceded, subjected to the loss."

In Fritz v. Tudor, supra, it is said: "Both principle and authority prescribe the value of the use at the time of the allotment considering the land in the same condition it was in when alienated without amelioration or deterioration resulting from the acts of the purchaser." And it was said that this common-law rule was not essentially changed by Ky. Rev. Stat., chap. 47, § 10, providing that the wife be endowed according to the value of the estate when received by the heir, devisee, or purchaser so as not to include in the estimated value any permanent improvements he has made on the lands, but that the value at the time of the allotment without augmentation by improvements must control.

The fact that the depreciation in value is due to the acts or omissions of the alienee does not make him responsible therefor to the widow or change the rule that her dower must be assessed according to the depreciated value. McClanahan v. Porter, 10 Mo. 746.

A purchaser at sheriff's sale during the husband's life stands in the same attitude with the husband's alienee in this respect. Ibid.

The rule was applied in Braxton v. Coleman, 5 Call, 433, 2 Am. Dec. 592, in which a widow was held entitled to dower in the land only excluding the value of a mill erected thereon by a purchaser from the husband after a mill which was on the premises when purchased had been carried away by a freshet.

So in Westcott v. Campbell, 11 R. L. 578, where a mill fully insured was burned down after alienation of the real estate and was rebuilt the grantor's widow was held entitled to dower in the property only according to its value at the time of the assignment of dower, less the amount of increase in the value by reason of the new mill. The court based its decision on the doctrine, that if the mill had not been rebuilt, the widow could have had dower only according to the depreciated value of the property. Nothing was said in the opinion about the effect of the insurance.

But where a building was burned after the death of the owner, his widow was held entitled under her dower right to a share of the insurance thereon which had been collected by the administrator. Campbell v. Murphy, 55 N. C. 387.

Where heirs take upon themselves to sell land and receive the purchase money without consulting or providing for the widow's dower they will not be heard to show that the property was worth less than they sold it for at the time or that it has depreciated since the sale. Clift v. Clift, 37 Tenn. 27.

damages against him, but it did not affect or alter the manner of assignment. Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 185. With regard to the assignment of dower in alienated estates the rule in England, as declared in Doe v. Guinnell, 1 Q. B. 682, is that the widow shall be endowed according to the value of the estate at the death of the husband, regardless of any improvement or deterioration resulting from the acts of the purchaser. But in this country the rule in such cases, according to the weight of authority, is more favorable to the purchaser, and excludes the widow from taking advantage of his improvements upon the estate; but it allows her generally, though not in all the states, to have the benefit of any rise in value resulting from other causes, the policy of the rule being to avoid discouraging purchasers from making improvements. Westcott v. Campbell, 11 R. I. 378; 2 Scribner, Dower, pp. 612-617; Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 185. And that is the rule adopted in this state, both by judicial decisions and by statute. Barney v. Frouner, 9 Ala. 901; Beavers v. Smith, 11 Ala. 20; Springle v. Shields, 17 Ala. 295; Francis v. Garrard, 18 Ala. 794; Ware v. Owens, 42 Ala. 212, 94 Am. Dec. 642; Wood v. Morgan, 56 Ala. 897; Code 1886, § 1910.

In this state, before the present statute, when a dilapidated mill upon the land was torn down by a purchaser from the husband, and a new and expensive structure erected in its stead, it was held that the widow of the grantor was not entitled to any share of the improvements, and that her dower should be estimated with reference to the nature of the premises at the time of the alienation; that the destruction of the old mill afforded a proper case for compensation to the widow by a court of equity, instead of an assignment by metes and bounds. Beavers v. Smith, supra.

We have not been able to discover any case, nor has any been cited by counsel, in which deterioration in value, either from natural causes or from the mere negligence of the purchaser or alienee in keeping the property in repair, has been considered sufficient cause for assigning compensation in lieu of dower, instead of setting the same off by metes and bounds, or in which it is held that the widow is entitled to compensation on account of such deterioration. On the contrary, the doctrine of permissive waste seems never to have been introduced into the common-law jurisprudence of this country to that extent. It is said by Chancellor Kent that, "whether the land be improved in value or be impaired by acts of the party subsequently, the endowment, in every event of that kind, is to be according to the value at the time of the assignment, if the land descended to the heir." 4 Com. (Lacy's ed.) *65. And again: "The widow takes the risk of the deterioration of the estate arising from public misfortunes or the acts of the party." Id. *66. The foregoing quotations are contained in an elaborate and learned opinion of the supreme court of Missouri in the case of McClanahan v. Porter, 10 Mo. 746, in which the conclusion is reached that the widow takes her dower according to the value of the land at the time of the assignment, and that, although she gains nothing by the improvements of the heir or alienee, she suffers loss by his waste or neglect, depreciating the value of the property. And in 2 Scribner on Dower, p. 685, it is said: "In the United States the doctrine laid down by Perkins, that the widow has no remedy for waste committed by the alienee during the lifetime of the husband, seems to be generally acquiesced in. But for waste committed after the husband's death, she has her remedy." 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 981.

In this state, when the dower is incapable of being set off by metes and bounds, or when it would be unjust, from improvements made by an alienee or from any other cause, to assign the dower by that mode, the chancery court alone has jurisdiction to make an assignment of compensation in lieu of dower; and in such case the rule is fixed by statute that the widow is dowable of the value of the land at the time of alienation, the interest on one third part thereof from the death of the husband to be paid her annually during her life, and secured, if necessary, by a lien on the land, unless the parties agree to a compensation in gross, to which the court must give effect. Code 1886, §§ 1910, 1911. The test, however, whether an assignment by metes and bounds would or not be unjust, within the meaning of the statute, is not whether the interests of the dowress alone would be promoted or prejudiced by that mode of assignment. The rule prescribed by the statute, "to be equal and just, must be mutual." The mutual rights of the demandant and of the alienee must be considered, and the conclusion must be influenced, not by what would be the interest of the one or the other, but by what would be just and right, as between the two.

We do not think the facts alleged in the bill of complaint in this case make out a case within the contemplation of the statute, and entitling the demandant to an assignment of compensation in lieu of dower, instead of by metes and bounds. It is shown by the averments of the bill that the depreciation in the value of the land since the alienation is due largely to natural causes, and to a much less extent to the mere failure of the alienee to keep the property in repair from 1861, the time of the alienation, to 1891, the time of the demands for dower, and not from any willful waste on his part. By the common law, as we have shown, while the widow shared in improvements made by the heir or devisee, neither the improvements made by an alienee of the husband, nor depreciation in value caused by his acts or from natural causes, affected the rule for the assignment of dower, though willful waste by either the heir, devisee, or alienee, after the husband's death, would afford the basis for a claim for damages to be allowed, not, it has been declared, as of any fixed period, but as of the value of the property at the different periods at which the widow is deprived of her dower,—in the case of the heir, from the death of the husband; in the case of an alienee, from the time of the demand for dower until the assignment. McClanahan v. Porter, 10 Mo. 746; Steels v. Brown, 70 Ala. 235. We discover nothing in our statute designed to change this general rule. On the contrary, this court, in Wood v. Morgan, 56 Ala. 397, speaking of a statute in substance the same as this, said: "So that the section of the Code we are considering is rather a legislative recognition of an existing rule than the enactment of a new one." Our statute, therefore, being in harmony with the common law instead of making a change therein, it follows that mere depreciation of value whether from natural causes or the act or omission of the alienee, presents no good reason for making an assignment of dower against the common right, instead of according to the common right, or by metes and bounds.

Furthermore, recurring to the question whether it would be unjust, within the meaning of the statute, to the demandant, to set off her dower by metes and bounds, we will add that the law would not have cast upon her husband, had he lived until this time, any duty or obligation towards her, as respects her inchoate right of dower, to keep the premises in good repair, or to cultivate the lands "according to the standard of a well-regulated farm;" and, if no such duty rested on the husband, we can conceive of no principle of law that would impose that obligation upon the alienee of the husband, any more than upon the latter himself. To assign dower as the bill in this case seeks to have it done, would require a valuation of the land, which would make the widow's third some four or five times greater than the present value of the entire tract. Thus the alienee would be compelled to pay annual interest for the life of the dowress on a sum four or five times greater than the present value of the whole tract of land, and more than thirteen times greater than her one third of the present value of the land. This would be the grossest injustice to the alienee. An assignment of dower by metes and bounds, so far as anything in the bill shows to the contrary, would operate justly to both parties. There is no question of willful waste committed after the death of the husband presented by the bill, and consequently it is unnecessary to consider what the rights of the demandant would be in that case, or what the remedy for their enforcement.

We discover no error in the decree of the chancery court on the motions and demurrers filed by appellee, and it is accordingly affirmed.

(November 2, 1892.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Third District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Macoupin County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover attorneys' fees provided for in a certain promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Palmer & Shutt for appellant.
Mr. A. N. Yancey for appellee.

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of assumpsit begun in the circuit court of Macoupin county on May 16, 1889, by Marcus A. Wolff against the appellant, Dorsey, to recover, as attorneys' fees, the sum of 10 per cent upon the amount found to be due upon the promissory notes hereinafter mentioned, in a suit theretofore brought upon said notes. The defendant demurred to the declaration. The demurrer was overruled. The defendant excepted to the order overruling the demurrer, and elected to stand by his demurrer. Thereupon plaintiff's damages were assessed at $1,619, and judgment was rendered in his favor for that amount. The judgment has been affirmed by the appellate court, from which latter court the case is brought here by appeal.

The declaration sets up three notes, executed by the defendant, William M. Dorsey, dated December 31, 1885, payable to the order of George W. Belt, at the banking house of Belt Bros. & Co., in Bunker Hill, Ill.,—the first for $13,586.84, on or before two years after date; the second for $543.47, on or before eighteen months after date; and the third for $543.47, on or before two years after date,—each of which notes, after the maker promises for value received to pay the amount therein named to the order of said Belt, contains the following words: "With eight per cent interest per annum after maturity, and, if not paid when due and suit is brought thereon, then we promise to pay ten per cent on the amount due hereon in addition as an attorneys' fee, and to be recovered as part of this note, or by separate suit." By the terms of each note, also, the makers and indorsees waive presentment for payment, protest, and notice, etc. The declaration then avers that Dorsey delivered said notes to Belt, and Belt indorsed the same to plaintiff, etc.; that said notes were not paid when due; that suit was brought thereon; that the said 10 per cent was not paid before or after said suit was brought, and was not recovered in said suit so brought upon said notes as a part thereof etc. One of the counts, in addition to the foregoing averments, alleges that, after the maturity of the notes, they were placed in the hands of an attorney for suit; that suit was brought thereon, and, the 10 per cent attorneys' fee not having been recovered therein, the plaintiff, before the bringing of the present suit, paid his attorney for his services in said former suit the said sum of $1,619.20.

The main question presented by the assignments of error is whether or not the notes described in the declaration are negotiable instruments. It is claimed by the appellant that the notes are made non-negotiable by the insertion therein of the written promise of the maker that, if they were not paid when due and suit was brought thereon, he would pay 10 per cent on the amount due thereon in addition, as an attorneys' fee, and to be recovered as a part of the notes, or by separate suit; that the indorsements by the payee did not confer the right upon the indorsee to bring suit in his own name upon the notes; that, even if such indorsements should be held to have conferred upon the assignee the right to bring suit upon the notes in his own name, it did not confer upon such assignee the right to bring a separate suit upon the stipulations or promises as to the attorneys' fees.

Various definitions have been given of a "promissory note." In general terms, it may be defined to be a written promise by one person to pay to another person therein named or order a fixed sum of money, at all events, and at a time specified therein, or at a time which must certainly arrive. Love v. Bliss, 24 Ill. 168; Chicago R. Equip. Co. v. Merchant's Nat. Bank of Chicago, 186 U. S. 268, 34 L. ed. 349; Story, Prom. Notes, p. 2; 3 Kent, Com. 74; 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 314. A note is none the less negotiable because it is made payable on or before a named date. Chicago R. Equip. Co. v. Merchant's Nat. Bank of Chicago, supra; Cisme v. Chidester, 85 Ill. 523; Ernst v. Steckman, 74 Pa. 18, 15 Am. Rep. 542. An instrument for a specified sum of money, and also for the payment of something else, the value of which is not ascertained, but depends upon extrinsic evidence, is not a note. Love v. Bliss, supra. A note which provides for the payment, after the maturity thereof, of a certain rate of interest per annum, not exceeding the legal rate, is not made conditional by such provision. Houghton v. Francis, 29 Ill. 244; Reeves v. Stipp, 91 Ill. 609; Laird v. Warren, 92 Ill. 204.

Applying these definitions to the notes mentioned in the declaration in this case, we find that each note is "a note for a sum certain, payable at a fixed date." Dietrich v. Baylis, 28 La. Ann. 787. The notes are not payable on a contingency, because the maker has the option of paying on or before a certain date; nor are they conditional instruments because they contain the words, "with eight per cent interest per annum after maturity." The portion of each note which precedes the stipulation or promise as to the attorneys' fee is in itself a complete promissory note. For example, the part of the first note that goes before the provision for the fee is as follows: "$13,586.84. Bunker Hill, Ills., Dec. 31st, 1885. On or before two years after date, for value received, we or either of us promise to pay to the order of George W. Belt, thirteen thousand five hundred eighty-six and 84-100 dollars, payable at the banking house of Belt Bros. & Co. in Bunker Hill, Illinois, with eight per cent interest per annum after maturity," etc. "Here the sum, time of payment, and payee are certain, and these are the essential characteristics of a promissory note." Houghton v. Francis, supra. The promise to pay the attorneys' fee is a promise to do something after the note matures. It does not affect the character of the note before or up to the time of its maturity, either as to certainty in the amount to be paid, or fixedness in the date of payment, or definiteness in the description of the person to whom the payment is to be made. The stipulation or promise as to the attorneys' fee cannot, therefore, affect the negotiability of the note, because the negotiability of a promissory note is, for all practical purposes, at an end when it matures. Parties taking it after its maturity cannot claim to be innocent holders without notice of defenses which may be set up by the maker against its collection. If the stipulation for an attorneys' fee is of such a character as to make the amount to be paid at maturity uncertain or indefinite, the note cannot be regarded as negotiable so as to authorize a suit upon it by the indorsee; but, where the stipulation does not have such an effect, its insertion in the note does not destroy the negotiability of the note.

When the amount to be paid at maturity is certain and fixed, the maker knows what he is to pay, and the holder knows what he is to receive, from the face of the note itself. Commercial paper is expected to be paid promptly when it is due. A stipulation for an attorneys' fee, which is only to be recovered if the note is not paid when due and suit is brought upon it, can have no force except upon the maker's default. If he keeps his contract by paying his note at its maturity, he will not be obliged to pay the additional amount; and no element of uncertainty enters into the contract. By the stipulation, the maker offers to the holder an assurance of his own confidence in his ability to pay without suit, and thereby adds to the value of the paper, as promising less expense in its collection. It has been said that "the additional agreement relates rather to the remedy upon the note, if a legal remedy be pursued, than to the sum which the maker is bound to pay; and that it is not different in its character from a cognovit, which, when attached to promissory notes, does not destroy their negotiability." Dan. Neg. Inst. 4th ed. §§ 62, 62a. We do not think that the negotiability of the notes in this case was destroyed by the stipulations therein as to attorneys' fees.

The view here expressed is sustained by the authorities. In Nickerson v. Sheldon, 83 Ill. 372, 85 Am. Dec. 280, the note contained this provision: "And we further agree, if the above note is not paid without suit, to pay ten dollars, in addition to the above, for attorneys' fees." In that case the plaintiff did not declare for the $10, and hence the recovery was only for the principal and interest due on the note, but we held the note to be negotiable under the statute, and said: "The amount due by this note is absolutely certain, and it possesses all the requisites of a negotiable instrument under the statute." Stewart v. Smith, 28 Ill. 397. There is no uncertainty as to the precise sum of money to be paid on the maturity of the note." Bane v. Gridley, 67 Ill. 888; Gobble v. Linder, 76 Ill. 157; Barton v. Farmers & M. Nat. Bank, 123 Ill. 852. In Stoneman v. Byle, 85 Ind. 103, 9 Am. Rep. 637, the note contained a stipulation for the payment of attorneys' fees should suit be instituted thereon, and it was said: "We see no reason, on principle or authority, or on grounds of public policy, for holding that such a stipulation destroys the commercial character of paper otherwise having that character."

So here the defendant had the right to pay the face of the note when due, and avoid the attorneys' fees. As long as the note retained the peculiar characteristics of commercial paper, viz., up to the time of its maturity and dishonor, the amount to be paid on the one hand, and recovered on the other, was fixed and definite." Smock v. Ripley, 62 Ind. 81. In Gaar v. Louisville Bkg. Co., 11 Bush, 180, there was indorsed upon the back of an accepted bill of exchange an agreement by the drawers, indorsers, and acceptors thereof "to pay a reasonable attorney's fee to any holder thereof if the same shall thereafter be sued upon, and also pay interest at the rate of ten per cent per annum after maturity until paid;" and it was claimed that the written agreement so indorsed upon the bill destroyed its negotiability on the ground that the amount of the attorneys' fee was not ascertained, and hence that the bill was for an uncertain amount; but the court held otherwise, and said: "The amount to be paid at maturity was fixed and certain, and it was only in the event that the bill was not paid when due that any uncertainty arose. The reason for the rule that the amount to be paid must be fixed and certain is that the paper is to become a substitute for money, and this it cannot be, unless it can be ascertained from it exactly how much money it represents. As long, therefore, as it remains a substitute for money, the amount which it entitles the holder to demand must be fixed and certain; but when it is past due it ceases to have that peculiar quality denominated 'negotiability,' or to perform the office of money; and hence anything which only renders its amount uncertain after it has ceased to be a substitute for money, but which in no wise affected it until after it had performed its office, cannot prevent it becoming negotiable paper." In Seaton v. Scovill, 18 Kan. 483, 26 Am. Rep. 779, a note for the payment of a certain sum, "with interest at twelve per cent per annum after due until paid, also costs of collecting including reasonable attorneys' fees if suit be instituted on this note," was held to be negotiable; and Mr. Justice Brewer, delivering the opinion of the court, quoted with approval the above extract from the Kentucky case, and said: "The amount due at the maturity of the paper is certain; and the only uncertainty is in the amount which shall be collectible in case the maker defaults, at the maturity of the paper, in his promise to pay, and the holder is driven to the necessity of instituting a suit for collection, and then only as to the expenses of such collection." In Sperry v. Horr, 83 Iowa, 184, each of the notes sued upon was for a certain sum, and contained the following words: "With ten per cent interest until paid; if not paid when due, and suit is brought thereon, I hereby agree to pay collection and attorneys' fees therefor," and the court held them to be negotiable, saying the attorneys' fees are not part of the sums due on the notes, but are an amount for which the maker may become liable when a legal remedy is enforced against him. Shugart v. Puttee, 37 Iowa, 422; Fort Dodge First Nat. Bank v. Breece, 39 Iowa, 640; Hovenstein v. Barnes, 5 Dill. 483; Schlesinger v. Arline, 81 Fed. Rep. 648; Wilson Sewing Mach. Co. v. Moreno, 6 Sawy. 35, 7 Fed. Rep. 806.

Inasmuch as the note is negotiable, and passes by indorsement to the assignee, the agreement as the attorneys' fee also passes to such assignee as a part of the note. The stipulation or promise to pay the attorneys' fee is not made with the payee alone. The note is payable to the payee or order. The promise is as much to the holder as to the original payee. The fee is to be paid if the note is not paid when due, whether it is then owned by the payee or by any other holder. Moreover, the attorneys' fee is an incident to the main debt and passes with it. Bank of British North America v. Ellis, 2 Fed. Rep. 44; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 62a; Adams v. Ad-dington, 16 Fed. Rep. 89. The promise to pay it, thereby lessening the cost of collection in case of suit, gives the note currency as well as security, and is regarded as a provision for the indorsee or holder as well as for the payee. Bank of British North America v. Ellis, 6 Sawy. 96, 2 Fed. Rep. 44. Daniel, in his work on Negotiable Instruments, (vol 2, § 62a,) says: "When the added stipulation is deemed valid, and the bill or note negotiable, such stipulation becomes a part of the acceptor's or indorser's contract, and need not be sued for by the attorney, but it is recoverable by the holder of the instrument." See cases cited in note 3.

A further question arises as to the mode of enforcing the collection of the fee. It is said that it cannot be recovered in a separate suit if it is not embraced in the recovery on the note. Such seems to be the doctrine in Indiana. Smiley v. Meir, 47 Ind. 559. In a case in Iowa, also where the note sued on contained a stipulation "to pay, in addition to the amount thereof, fifteen dollars attorneys' fees if the note is collected by suit," it was held not to be the intention of the parties that the fee should become due only after the note was collected by suit, but to be their intention that the fee should be recoverable with the amount of the note. Shugart v. Patten, 87 Iowa, 422. In this state it has been held that the fee is not due when the suit is brought on the note, and therefore cannot be included in the assessment of damages. Nickerson v. Babcock, 29 Ill. 497; Easter v. Boyd, 79 Ill. 325. In the two cases, however, in which this court so held, there was no express agreement in the note that the fee might be recovered in a separate suit. Nickerson v. Babcock, and Easter v. Boyd supra. In the case at bar, the promise is "to pay ten per cent on the amount due hereon in addition as an attorneys' fee, and to be recovered as a part of this note or by separate suit." Whether or not a stipulation to pay the fee to be recovered as a part of the note, in case suit is brought on it for its nonpayment when due, is so far a mere incident to the main debt that a separate suit cannot be brought for the fee after the termination of the suit on the note, is a question which is not presented by this record. We see no reason why the maker of the note may not stipulate that a separate suit may be brought for the fee, and why such stipulation cannot be enforced by the payee or the holder. If the written promise to pay the fee passes to the holder by the indorsement, the written agreement as to the mode of recovery also passes. The fact that the engagement to pay a fee is incidental and auxiliary to the main engagement to pay the debt does not prevent the maker of the note from agreeing to submit to a separate suit for the recovery of the fee. We are therefore of the opinion that the present suit is properly brought.

It is further claimed that the agreement to pay the 10 per cent as a fee is usurious. The authorities above referred to hold to the contrary. Stoneman v. Pyle and Wilson Sewing Mach. Co. v. Moreno, supra. See also 2 Parsons, Notes & Bills, pp. 418, 414; Clawson v. Munson, 55 Ill. 394; Barton v. Farmers & M. Nat. Bank, 122 Ill. 352. There is here no violation of the Usury Law, because the agreement "provides for new or additional compensation or interest for the use of the money because of the failure to pay at maturity. It is not in the nature of a contract for additional interest, but a provision merely against loss or damage to the payee (or holder) specifically pointed out." Barton v. Farmers & M. Nat. Bank, supra. There is nothing to show that 10 per cent on the amount due is an unreasonable fee. The defendant stood by his demurrer to the declaration, which described the notes, and the provision therein for a fee of 10 per cent. The declaration must therefore be regarded as alleging, in substance, that a reasonable attorney's fee was 10 per cent on the amount due on the notes. Smiley v. Meir, supra.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Mary VAN WALTERS et al., App'ts
v.
BOARD OF CHILDREN'S GUARDIANS OF MARION COUNTY.

(.....Ind.....)

1. The supreme right of the state to the guardianship of children controls the natural right of parents when the welfare of society or of the children themselves conflicts with such parental rights.
2. A judgment cannot be set aside on a petition which merely alleges facts in contradiction of the judgment.
3. A petitioner who has no cause of action has no right to compel answers to interrogatories.

(November 15, 1892.)

APPEAL by petitioners from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to set aside a decree committing plaintiff's children to the custody of defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Jacob B. Julian and J. F. Julian for appellants.

Mr. C. L. Hare for appellee.

Elliott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioners in the court below, Georgia Wilkins and John D. Wilkins are here the appellants. The material allegations of their complaint are these: That the appellant, Georgia Wilkins, is the mother of Mary Van Walters, William F. VanWalters and Clara VanWalters; that she married her co-appellant on the 17th day of August, 1891; that the eldest of the three children was born on the 31st day of August, 1879, and the youngest on the 12th day of February, 1887; that on the 11th day of July, 1891, the children by a decree of court were committed to the custody of the appellee; that neither of the children was "at any time abandoned, neglected or cruelly treated, nor were they of vicious habits nor were their surroundings of such a character as to lead to their demoralization;" that the petitioner, Georgia Wilkins, was so distracted in mind, so crazed with grief over her children being taken from her, that she was at the time incapable of comprehending or doing anything; "that the petitioners are able and willing to take care of the children and to make reasonable provision for their physical comfort and welfare, and that they are able and willing to see that the children "go to school and receive a good education." The petition prays that the decree be set aside or that it be so modified as to give them custody of the children for a time specified to enable them to convince the court that they are competent to take care of the children.

It has been for many centuries theoretically true that the state, through its appropriate organs, is the guardian of the children within its borders. The Constitution of a state is always presumed to be framed by organized society governed by settled principles. State v. Noble, 118 Ind. 350-361, 4 L. R. A. 101; Johnston v. State, 128 Ind. 16-18, 12 L. R. A. 235, and authorities cited.

It is therefore proper to assume that our Constitution and our laws enacted under its sanction and confirm the great principle of the sovereign's guardianship of the children within the dominions of the sovereign. But while it is true that this great principle is thus sanctioned and confirmed, it is still true that the equally great principle that natural right vests in parents the custody and control of their children is confirmed and enforced. This high and strong natural right yields only when the welfare of society or of the children themselves comes into conflict with it; but where there is such conflict the supreme right of guardianship asserts itself for the protection of society and the promotion of the welfare of the wards of the commonwealth. It is unnecessary to define the boundaries or prescribe the limits of the power of the state to take children from the custody of parents who will lead them into evil paths or surround them with vicious influences, and place them in the custody of those who will train and educate them for good lives and make them useful members of society, for our statute is far within the limits of the great power of inherent state guardianship. The statute which provides that children may be taken from the custody of parents whose course of life or whose evil conduct unfits them to rear children so that they will become good and useful citizens was enacted pursuant to the great constitutional provision of which we have spoken, and is not to be broken down by the declaration of a doctrine that will make the duty of those who are selected to take charge of the children so vexatious and difficult that good men and women will be deterred from accepting the office which, at best, is an unpleasant one. The statute violates no constitutional principle, inasmuch as it guards the interests and rights of parents by requiring that their children shall not be taken from them without a hearing, upon due notice, in the courts of the state. As a check to an abuse of power and the exercise of arbitrary authority by the courts of original jurisdiction, it provides for the right of appeal to the highest court of the state. Here, then, we have a case where the proceedings are founded upon a statute enacted for the purpose of promoting the highest interests of society and in which ample provision is made for a hearing before a court of justice upon due process of law. There is neither denial nor abridgement of constitutional rights, and hence no reason why a proceeding conducted in accordance with the provisions of the statute should be excepted from the operation of the general rules of law. What those rules award to the appellants they are entitled to demand, but they are entitled to nothing more.

The fundamental rule is that public officers are presumed to do their duty. This rule intensifies in force when applied to judges, for they hear with deliberation, act with impartiality, and decide upon the law and the evidence. In the law they are learned, and the evidence upon which they act they derive, under wise rules, from trustworthy sources. If this were a direct attack in the strongest form it would be our plain duty to presume that the trial court acted upon sufficient evidence, proceeded regularly and gave a just judgment. See authorities cited, Elliott's Appellate Procedure, §§ 709, 710, 712.

Under the attack here made we are imperatively required to conclusively presume that there was evidence fully supporting the judgment of the court of original jurisdiction.

Another relevant rule, and an old one, is expressed in the maxim, "A man shall not be twice vexed for one and the same cause." We should violate this rule without justification or excuse if we sustain the assault of the appellants upon the judgment from which this appeal is prosecuted. That judgment has all the attributes of a valid judgment, for there was a hearing in a court of justice, and the hearing was upon due notice. The only allegations that assail the judgment are those which contradict it, and contradiction cannot be suffered since judgments import absolute verity. If we should hold that a defeated suitor may deny what a solemn judgment affirms, we should necessarily adjudge that issues may be tried again and again despite a judgment rendered in due course of law by a court possessing plenary jurisdiction. That we cannot do, inasmuch as to do it would be to defy authority and disregard principle.

The vague and indefinite allegation concerning the mental condition of the petitioner, Georgia Wilkins, is not sufficient to overthrow a solemn judgment. One who seeks to impeach a judgment upon the ground of mental incapacity must directly state material facts, for mere rhetoric cannot supply their place. Here there are general statements showing, if they show anything at all of a substantial nature, mere temporary mental trouble, and that is not enough to overbear a judgment pronounced after a lawful hearing. For anything that appears, the mental condition may have lasted but a brief time and not even approached insanity.

Where a petitioner has no cause of action he has no right to compel answers to interrogatories.

Judgment affirmed.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

ALABAMA GREAT SOUTHERN R.
CO., Appl.,
v.

William D. CARROLL.

1. It will be presumed that the common law of another state is the same as that where the court is sitting in the absence of evidence to the contrary.
2. The law of a state in which a railroad brakeman is injured by negligence of a co-employee determines his right to recover, although such law is contrary to that of another state in which the negligence transpired and which is also the domicile of the parties and the place of the contract of employment.

(November 22, 1892.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the City Court of Birmingham in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries received by plaintiff while in the employ of defendant through an alleged defect in certain machinery. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. W. Fewell and A. G. Smith, for appellant:

Plaintiff contracted to work for the railroad in the state of Mississippi as well as in the state of Alabama; so that while he was at work in the state of Alabama the laws of that state would fix and determine his rights and remedies, so far as any negligence of the employer, or his fellow servants, was concerned, and when he was at work in the state of Mississippi his rights and remedies in regard to the same would be determined by the laws of Mississippi.

Where the cause of action arises in other states, if plaintiff sees proper to sue in the courts of Alabama, those courts must apply the law of the state in which the cause of action arose.

McClellan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, W. D. Carroll, is, and was at the time of entering into the service of the defendant, the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company, and at the time of being injured in that service, a citizen of Alabama. The defendant is an Alabama corporation, operating a railroad extending from Chattanooga, in the state of Tennessee, through Alabama to Meridian, in the state of Mississippi. At the time of the casualty complained of plaintiff was in the service of the defendant in the capacity of brakeman on freight trains running from Birmingham, Ala., to Meridian, Miss., under a contract which was made in the state of Alabama. The injury was caused by the breaking of a link between two cars in a freight train which was proceeding from Birmingham to Meridian. The point at which the link broke and the injury was suffered was in the state of Mississippi. The evidence tended to show that the link which broke was a defective link, and that it was in a defective condition when the train left Birmingham. It was shown that this link had come to the defendant road at Chattanooga, Tenn., with a car which belonged to, and came to that point over, a road which was foreign to the Alabama Great Southern road; that at Chattanooga this foreign car was coupled into a train of the defendant by means of this link, the destination of the car next in rear of it being Birmingham, and the destination of the second car in the rear of it, which belonged to defendant, being Meridian, to which point the foreign car was also bound. At Birmingham the car between this foreign car and the Alabama Great Southern car, which were billed to Meridian, was cut out, and these two cars were coupled together by means of the link which had come to the defendant with the foreign car. The evidence went also to show that the defect in this link consisted in or resulted from its having been bent while cold; that this tended to weaken the iron, and in this instance had cracked the link somewhat on the outer curve of the bend, and that the link broke at the point of this crack. It was shown to be the duty of certain employes of defendant stationed along its line to inspect the links attached to cars to be put in trains, or forming the couplings between cars in trains at Chattanooga, Birmingham, and some points between Birmingham and the place where this link broke, and also that it was the duty of the conductor of freight trains, and the other train men, to maintain such inspection as occasion afforded throughout the runs or trips of such trains; and the evidence affords ground for inference that there was a negligent omission on the part of such employes to perform this duty, or, if performed, the failure to discover the defect in, and to remove, this link was the result of negligence.

The foregoing statement of facts, either proved or finding lodgment in the tendencies of the evidence, together with the evidence of the law of Mississippi as to the master's liability for injuries sustained by an employe in his service, will suffice for the consideration and determination of the question which is of chief importance in this case, namely, whether the defendant is liable at all, on the facts presented by this record, for an injury sustained by the plaintiff in the state of Mississippi. The affirmative of this inquiry is sought to be rested and maintained upon two distinct propositions. In the first place, it is insisted that the negligence which one aspect of the evidence tends to establish is that of the defendant in respect of a duty which the law imposes upon the master, and which, whether performed, or undertaken to be performed, in the particular instance by the hand of the master, or by the hand of one to whom he had delegated its performance, is yet to be taken as being performed, or attempted to be performed, by the master himself, in such sort that the employer is responsible for its misperformance or nonperformance, whereby injury results to one of his employes, under the doctrine of the common law, and wholly irrespective of statutory provisions. These doctrines are presumed, and also shown, by the evidence in this case, to obtain in the state of Mississippi; and the defendant being an Alabama corporation, it cannot be questioned that an action may be maintained in this state to recover damages for an injury sustained in Mississippi by one of its servants, if the facts present a good cause of action under the law of that state. It is manifest, beyond adverse inference, on the evidence, conceding the link, the breaking of which caused the accident, to have been in a defective condition when it came to defendant's road at Chattanooga, attached to, and intended to be used in, the further transportation of the foreign car, that it was so used from that point to the place of the accident, that this defective condition of the link was patent to such observation as should have been bestowed upon it, and that the defect in it was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff,—it is, we say, clear upon every aspect of the testimony, conceding all this to be true, that the use of that link in coupling the foreign car to the defendant's train, and also in its use throughout the voyage from Chattanooga into Mississippi, was due to the negligence of employes of the defendant, who were charged by it with the duty of inspecting the link before and at the time of incorporating the foreign car into this train, and at the several points in Alabama where inspectors were stationed, as shown by the evidence, and also of the train men charged with the duty of inspection as the train was en route. There is no pretense that the defendant had not been sufficiently careful in the selection of these inspectors, or that they were incompetent. It is not pretended that they were insufficient in number, or stationed at points too widely separated along the line. There is no such idea advanced as that the defendant was negligent in the purchasing of links of adequate strength, and supplying them to these inspectors and to trains generally, or that there was any necessity for the continued use of this link upon a discovery of its defective condition; but, to the contrary, it is affirmatively shown that the defendant purchased and supplied its trains and employes with all necessary links of good quality and perfect condition to be used in its trains, to supply the places of links which became defective from use, and to substitute for defective links coming to this road with foreign cars. The only negligence, in other words and in short, which finds support, by direction or inference, in any tendency of the evidence, is that of persons whose duty it was to inspect the links of the train, and remove such as were defective, and replace them with others which were not defective. This was the negligence, not of the master, the defendant, but of fellow servants of the plaintiff, for which at common law the defendant is not liable. Thus it is said in McKinney on Fellow Servants, § 197: "It is a very common thing for train hands to receive injury through the negligence of persons employed by the company to inspect their cars to discover defects and repair them. The weight of authority, perhaps, is to the effect that the negligence of such employes in the performance of such duties cannot be attributed to the company, and it is consequently not liable for it,"—citing, among other cases, Smith v. Potter, 46 Mich. 258, 46 Am. Rep. 456; Mackin v. Boston & A. R. Co. 135 Mass. 201; Columbus & X. R. Co. v. Webb, 12 Ohio St. 475; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Rice, 51 Ark. 467; Kidwell v. Houston & G. N. R. Co. 8 Woods, C. C. 813; and our own case of Smoot v. Mobile & M. R. Co., 67 Ala. 18; and these and other cases are cited to the same proposition in 7 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 864, note. There are cases which hold to the contrary, but the law is, and has long been settled in this state, as we have stated it; the case of Smoot v. Mobile & M. R. Co., supra, being directly in point. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Thomas, 42 Ala. 672, 720 et seq.; Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Smith, 59 Ala. 245; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Allen, 78 Ala. 494.

This being the common law applicable to the premises as understood and declared in Alabama, it will be presumed in our courts, as thus declared, to be the common law of Mississippi, unless the evidence shows a different rule to have been announced by the supreme court of that state as being the common law thereof. The evidence adduced here fails to show any such thing, but, to the contrary, it is made to appear, from the testimony of Judge Arnold, and by the decisions of the Supreme Court of Mississippi, which were introduced on the trial below, that that court is in full accord with this one in this respect. Indeed, if anything, those decisions go further than this court has ever gone in applying the doctrine of fellow servants to the exemption of railway companies from liability to one servant for injuries resulting from the negligence of another, holding, in one case, that a hostler, whose only duty it was to supply an engine with sufficient sand before turning it over to the engineer to go on the road, is a fellow servant of the engineer, for whose negligent failure to supply the sand the company would not be liable, (Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Petty, 67 Miss. 255;) in another, that a section foreman and a laborer working under him were fellow servants in such sort that their common master would not be liable for the negligence of the former in attempting to repair a fish bar, which he ought to have discarded, and applied for a new one, (Lagrons v. Mobile & O. R. Co. 67 Miss. 592;) and in yet another case, that a section foreman and train men are fellow servants in respect of the negligence of the former, unknown to the company, in failing to keep the track in repair, and that an engineer on a passing train, who was injured in consequence, could not recover against the common employer, (New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Hughes, 49 Miss. 258;) and the doctrine of this case is said by Mr. McKinney to be "substantially the rule recognized by the English common-law decisions," (McKinney, Fellow Servants, p. 82, § 29.) See also McMaster v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 65 Miss. 264.

Proceeding, therefore, on the presumptions we are authorized to indulge, and also on the evidence adduced in this case as to the law of Mississippi in this connection, and upon the testimony most favorable to the plaintiff as to the cause of his injuries, we feel entirely safe in declaring that plaintiff has shown no cause of action under the common law as it is understood and applied both here and in the state of Mississippi.

It is, however, further contended that the plaintiff, if his evidence be believed, has made out a case for the recovery sought under the Employers' Liability Act of Alabama, it being clearly shown that there is no such or similar law of force in the state of Mississippi. Considering this position in the abstract,—that is, dissociated from the facts of this particular case which are supposed to exert an important influence upon it,—there cannot be two opinions as to its being unsound and untenable. So looked at, we do not understand appellee's counsel even to deny either the proposition or its application to this case,—that there can be no recovery in one state for injuries to the person sustained in another, unless the infliction of the injuries is actionable under the law of the state in which they were received. Certainly this is the well-established rule of law, subject, in some jurisdictions, to the qualification that the infliction of the injuries would also support an action in the state where the suit is brought had they been received within that state. 3 Am. & Eng. But it is claimed that the fact, of this case take it out of the general rule which the authorities cited above abundantly support, and authorize the courts of Alabama to subject the defendant to the payment of damages under section 2590 of the Code, although the injuries counted on were sustained in Mississippi under circumstances which involved no liability on the defendant by the laws of that state. This insistence is, in the first instance, based on that aspect of the evidence which goes to show that the negligence which produced the casualty transpired in Alabama and the theory that, wherever the consequences of that negligence manifested itself, a recovery can be had in Alabama. We are referred to no authority in support of this proposition, and exhaustive investigation on our part has failed to disclose any. There are at least two well-considered cases against it, one of which involved an effort to recover for personal injuries, sustained in Alabama under circumstances which afforded no cause of action in Alabama, in the courts of Tennessee, where the casual negligence occurred, and where, also, had the negligence manifested itself in the result complained of there, the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover. The accident happened on a train going from Nashville to Chattanooga, in Tennessee, on a railway which runs for a comparatively short distance through Alabama. The negligence relied on consisted in the failure of employes of the defendant, charged in that behalf, to discover and remedy a defective brake before the train left Nashville, as well as during its passage through Tennessee. While the train was running through Alabama, a brakeman was killed in consequence of the defect in this brake. All this is precisely on all fours with our case in those of its aspects most favorable to the plaintiff; that plaintiff, the court conceded, would have had a good cause of action under the law of Tennessee, the place of the negligence, if his intestate had been injured within its limits. So here, the plaintiff, on one aspect of the evidence, would have had a good cause of action in Alabama, the place of the negligence, had he been injured in Alabama. But it was found in that case that the laws of Alabama gave no cause of action for the negligent failure to inspect the appliances used in operating a train, but held the brakemen and the inspectors to be fellow servants in respect thereto, just as here the laws of Mississippi afford no redress for the consequences of such negligence, though our statutes have since the Tennessee decision provided therefore; and it was held on the authority of Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Thomas, 42 Ala. 672, that there could have been no recovery in Alabama, and that of consequence no cause of action existed in Tennessee; the court saying: "There is no question but the laws of Alabama . . . controlled the rights of the parties in this case, and whether there was error in this part of the charge [referring to an instruction as to defendant's liability on the negligence shown] as given, or the refusal of the specific instructions asked for, [substantially that the negligence of a car inspector from which a brakeman suffers injury is no ground for action against their common employer,] depends wholly upon the laws of that state." Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Foster, 10 Lea, 358. In the other case the precise point here under consideration was brought before the Supreme Court of Mississippi, in an action instituted in that state sounding in damages for fatal injuries inflicted upon plaintiff's intestate in the state of Tennessee. It was insisted that, inasmuch as the death of the deceased resulted from the negligent failure of a train dispatcher in Mississippi to give requisite orders to the train men at a certain point in Tennessee, the rights of the parties were determinable by the laws of Mississippi, the place of the disastrous negligent omission. But the court held to the contrary, saying: "The right of the appellee is determinable by the law of Tennessee, in which state the killing of her husband occurred. The view that no recovery could be had here, except for a result traceable to an omission of duty in Mississippi, is unfounded. Physical force, proceeding from this state, and inflicting injury in another state, might give rise to an action in either state, and vice versa; but the omission of duty in Mississippi cannot transfer a consequence of it, manifested physically in another state, to Mississippi. The cases of injuries commenced in one jurisdiction and completed in another illustrate our view on this subject. The true view is that the legal entity called the "corporation" is omnipresent on its railroad, and the presence or absence of negligence with respect to an occurrence at any point of the line is not to be resolved by the place at which any officer or employé was stationed for duty. The question is as to duty operating effectually at the place where its alleged failure caused harm to result. The locality of the collision was in Tennessee. It was there, if anywhere, that the company was remiss in duty, for there is where its proper caution should have been used." Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Doyle, 60 Miss. 977, 984. If this doctrine was properly applied to the facts of that case, where the act to be performed, the failure to perform which caused the injury, could only be performed at a point in Mississippi, and by an employé who was stationed and remained at that place, it would seem to address itself with more force to the case at bar, where it appears the corporation was in fact present with the train and with the defective link every inch of the journey from Birmingham to the point of the accident, in the person of the conductor and other train men who were charged with the duty all along the line of discovering and removing the unsafe appliance.

The position of the Mississippi court appears to us to be eminently sound in principle and upon logic. It is admitted, or at least cannot be denied, that negligence of duty unproductive of damnifying results will not authorize or support a recovery. Up to the time this train passed out of Alabama no injury had resulted. For all that occurred in Alabama, therefore, no cause of action whatever arose. The fact which created the right to sue,—the injury,—without which confessedly no action would lie anywhere, transpired in the state of Mississippi. It was in that state, therefore, necessarily that the cause of action, if any, arose; and whether a cause of action arose and existed at all, or not, must in all reason be determined by the law which obtained at the time and place when and where the fact which is relied on to justify a recovery transpired. Section 2590 of the Code of Alabama had no efficacy beyond the lines of Alabama. It cannot be allowed to operate upon facts occurring in another state, so as to evolve out of them rights and liabilities which do not exist under the law of that state, which is of course paramount in the premises. Where the facts occur in Alabama, and a liability becomes fixed in Alabama, it may be enforced in another state having like enactments, or whose policy is not opposed to the spirit of such enactments; but this is quite a different matter. This is but enforcing the statute upon facts to which it is applicable, all of which occurred within the territory for the government of which it was enacted. Section 2590 of the Code, in other words, is to be interpreted in the light of universally recognized principles of private, international, or interstate law, as if its operation had been expressly limited to this state, and as if its first line read as follows: "When a personal injury is received in Alabama by a servant or employé," etc. The negligent infliction of an injury here, under statutory circumstances creates a right of action here, which, being transitory, may be enforced in any other state or country the comity of which admits of it; but for an injury inflicted elsewhere than in Alabama our statute gives no right of recovery, and the aggrieved party must look to the local law to ascertain what his rights are. Under that law this plaintiff had no cause of action, as we have seen, and hence he has no rights which our courts can enforce, unless it be upon a consideration to be presently adverted to. We have not been inattentive to the suggestions of counsel in this connection, which are based upon that rule of the statutory and common criminal law under which a murderer is punishable where the fatal blow is delivered, regardless of the place where death ensues. Green v. State, 66 Ala. 40. This principle is patently without application here. There would be some analogy if the plaintiff had been stricken in Alabama, and suffered in Mississippi, which is not the fact. There is, however, an analogy which is afforded by the criminal law, but which points away from the conclusion appellee's counsel desire us to reach. This is found in that well-established doctrine of criminal law that where the unlawful act is committed in one jurisdiction or state, and takes effect—produces the result which it is the purpose of the law to prevent, or, it having ensued, punish for—in another jurisdiction or state, the crime is deemed to have been committed and is punished in that jurisdiction or state in which the result is manifested, and not where the act was committed. 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 110 et seq.; 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 58 et seq.

Another consideration,—that referred to above,—it is insisted, entitles this plaintiff to recover here under the Employers' Liability Act for an injury inflicted beyond the territorial operation of that Act. This is claimed upon the fact that at the time plaintiff was injured he was in the discharge of duties which rested on him by the terms of a contract between him and the defendant, which had been entered into in Alabama, and hence was an Alabama contract, in connection with the fact that plaintiff was and is a citizen of this state, and the defendant is an Alabama corporation. These latter facts—of citizenship and domicile, respectively, of plaintiff and defendant—are of no importance in this connection, it seems to us, further than this: they may tend to show that the contract was made here, which is not controverted, and, if the plaintiff has a cause of action at all, he, by reason of them, may prosecute it in our courts. They have no bearing on the primary question of the existence of a cause of action, and, as that is the question before us, we need not further advert to the fact of plaintiff's citizenship or defendant's domicile.

The contract was that plaintiff should serve the defendant in the capacity of a brakeman on its freight trains between Birmingham, Ala., and Meridian, Miss., and should receive as compensation a stipulated sum for each trip from Birmingham to Meridian and return. The theory is that the Employers' Liability Act became a part of this contract, that the duties and liabilities which it prescribes became contractual duties and liabilities, or duties and liabilities springing out of the contract, and that these duties attended upon the execution whenever its performance was required, in Mississippi as well as in Alabama, and that the liability prescribed for a failure to perform any of such duties attached upon such failure and consequent injury wherever it occurred, and was enforceable here, because imposed by an Alabama contract, notwithstanding the remission of duty and the resulting injury occurred in Mississippi, under whose laws no liability was incurred by such remission. The argument is that a contract for service is a condition precedent to the application of the statute, and that, "as soon as the contract is made, the rights and obligations of the parties under the Employers' Act "became vested and fixed," so that "no subsequent repeal of the law could deprive the injured party of his rights, nor discharge the master from his liabilities," etc. If this argument is sound, and it is sound if the duties and liabilities prescribed by the Act can be said to be contractual duties and obligations at all, it would lead to conclusions, the possibility of which has not hitherto been suggested by any court or law writer, and which, to say the least, would be astounding to the profession. For instance, if the Act of 1885 becomes a part of every contract of service entered into since its passage, just "as if such law were in so many words expressly included in the contract as a part thereof," as counsel insist it did, so as to make the liability of the master to pay damages for injuries to a fellow servant of his negligent employé a contractual obligation, no reason can be conceived why the law existing in this regard prior to the passage of that Act did not become in like manner a part of every contract of service then entered into, so that every such contract would be deemed to contain stipulations for the non-liability of the master for injuries flowing from the negligence of a fellow servant, and confining the injured servant's right to damages to a claim against his negligent fellow servant; the former, in other words, agreeing to look alone to the latter. There were many thousands of such contracts existing in this country and England at the time when statutes similar to section 2590 of our Code were enacted. There were, indeed, many thousands of such contracts existing in Alabama when that section became the law of this state. Each of these contracts, if the position of plaintiff as to our statute being embodied into the terms of his contract, so that its duties were contractual duties and its liabilities contractual obligations to pay money, can be maintained, involved the assurances of organic provisions, state and Federal, of the continued nonliability of the master for the negligence of his servants, notwithstanding the passage of such statutes. Yet these statutes were passed, and they have been applied to servants under pre-existing contracts as fully as to servants under subsequent contracts, and there has never been a suggestion even, in any part of the common-law world, that they were not rightly so applied. If plaintiff's contention is well taken, many a judgment has gone on the rolls in this state and throughout the country, and been satisfied, which palpably overrode vested rights, without the least suspicion on the part of court or counsel that one of the most familiar ordinances of the fundamental law was being violated. Nay, more; another result, not heretofore at all contemplated, would ensue. Contracts for service partly in Alabama might be now entered into in adjoining states, where the common-law rule still obtains, as in Mississippi, for instance, were the servant has no right to recover for the negligence of his fellow; and the assumption of this risk, under the law, becoming, according to the argument of counsel, a contractual obligation to bear it, such contracts would be good in Alabama; and, as to servants entering into them, our statute would have no operation, even upon negligence and resulting injury, within its terms, occurring wholly in Alabama. And, on the other hand, if this defendant is under a contractual obligation to pay the plaintiff the damages sustained by him because of the injury inflicted in Mississippi, the contract could be of course enforced in Mississippi, and damages there awarded by its courts, notwithstanding the law of that state provides that there can be no recovery, under any circumstances whatever, by one servant for the negligence of his fellow employé. We do not suppose that such a proposition ever has been or ever will be made in the courts of Mississippi. Yet that it should be made and sustained is the natural and necessary sequence of the position advanced in this case.

These considerations demonstrate the infirmity of plaintiff's position in this connection, and serve to show the necessity and propriety of the conclusion we propose to announce on this part of the case. That conclusion is that the duties and liabilities incident to the relation between the plaintiff and the defendant, which are involved in this case, are not imposed by, and do not rest in or spring from, the contract between the parties. The only office of the contract, under section 2590 of the Code, is the establishment of a relation between them,—that of master and servant; and it is upon that relation, that incident or consequence of the contract, and not upon the rights of the parties under the contract, that our statute operates. The law is not concerned with the contractual stipulations, except in so far as to determine from them that the relation upon which it is to operate exists. Finding this relation, the statute imposes certain duties and liabilities on the parties to it, wholly regardless of the stipulations of the contract as to the rights of the parties under it, and, it may be, in the teeth of such stipulations. It is the purpose of the statute, and must be the limit of its operation, to govern persons standing in the relation of master and servants to each other, in respect of their conduct in certain particulars within the state of Alabama. Mississippi has the same right to establish governmental rules for such persons within her borders as Alabama, and she has established rules which are different from those of our law; and the conduct of such persons towards each other is, when its legality is brought in question, to be adjudged by the rules of the one or the other state, as it falls territorially within the one or the other. The doctrine is like that which prevails in respect of other relations, as that of man and wife. Marriage is a contract. The entering into this contract raises up certain duties and imposes certain liabilities in all civilized countries. What these duties and liabilities are at the place of the contract are determinable by the law of that place; but, when the parties go into other jurisdictions, the relation created by the contract under the law of the place of its execution will be recognized, but the personal duties, obligations, and liabilities incident to the relation are such as exist under the law of the jurisdiction in which an act is done or omitted, as to the legality, effect, or consequence of which the question arises. It might as well be said, where there is a marriage in Alabama, and the parties remove to Mississippi, and the wife there makes a contract which is void in Mississippi, but valid under our statute, and subsequently they return to Alabama, that our courts will enforce that contract; or if such husband, while in Mississippi, does an act which is innocuous and lawful in that state, but which, if done here, would entail liability upon him, and the parties afterwards return here, that the liability imposed by our laws could be enforced here, because the parties entered into the contract here,—as that a master is liable here for conduct towards his servant which was proper, or at least involved no liability, where it took place, simply because the contract which created the relation was entered into in this state. This whole argument is at fault. The only true doctrine is that each sovereignty, state or nation, has the exclusive power to finally determine and declare what act or omissions in the conduct of one to another—whether they be strangers, or sustain relations to each other which the law recognizes, as parent and child, husband and wife, master and servants, and the like—shall impose a liability in damages for the consequent injury, and the courts of no other sovereignty can impute a damaging quality to an act or omission which afforded no cause of action where it transpired. These propositions find illustration and support in the case of Whitford v. Panama R. Co., 23 N. Y. 465, where the relation involved was that of carrier and passenger,—a relation which had been created by a contract made in New York between a corporation and a citizen thereof for carriage, commencing in that state, and ending in San Francisco, via Panama, and over the Panama Railroad. The passenger was killed, through the fault of the corporation's servants, while being transported along this railroad. The law of New York gave to the personal representative of a person whose death was caused by the wrongful act or omission of another a right of action therefor in all cases where the deceased, had the injury fallen short of death, could have recovered. It did not appear that the laws of New Granada, where the injury was inflicted, authorized any recovery on the facts alleged and proved. It was urged, as here, that the domicile of the parties, and the fact that they contracted in New York, took the case out of general rules as to territorial limitations upon the operation of statutes; but the plaintiff was nonsuited, it being held, in effect, that the laws of New Granada were controlling as to the duties and liabilities incident to the relation which existed between them, while the contract of carriage was being performed in that country, and that the carrier, so far as care and diligence were concerned, owed the passenger no duties there, except such as were imposed upon the relation by the local law, and that no liability for negligence and its results, not prescribed by that law, rested on the company. And the court, inter alia, said: "Suppose the government of New Granada to have enacted that the proprietors of a railroad company should not be responsible for the negligence of its servants, provided there was no want of due care in selecting them, it could not be pretended that its will could be set at naught by prosecuting the corporation in the courts of another state, where the law was different. . . . The true theory is that no suit whatever respecting this injury could be sustained in the courts of this state, except pursuant to the law of international comity. By that law, foreign contracts and foreign transactions, out of which liabilities have arisen, may be prosecuted in our tribunals by the implied assent of the government of this state; but in all such cases we administer the foreign law as from the proofs we find it to be, or as without proofs we presume it to be." So in the case of Gray v. Jackson, 51 N. H. 9, 12 Am. Rep. 1, there was a contract of affreightment, by the terms of which goods were to be carried out of one state into and through other states. They were lost in a state other than that in which the contract was made and the carriage commenced. By the law of the place of the contract, the carrier was liable for the loss, under the circumstances shown in evidence, had it occurred in that state. By the law of the state where the loss occurred, however, the carrier was not liable. In an action for the loss, prosecuted in the state of the contract, the law, not of that state, but of the place of the loss, which operated as to the particular transaction on the relation of shipper and carrier, and prescribed the duties and liabilities incident to that relation in that state, regardless of the place where the contract creating the relation was entered into, was applied, and made to determine the rights of the parties to be other than they were under the law of the place of the contract, which was also, as here, the place of the forum.

The foregoing views will suffice to indicate the grounds of our opinion that the rights of this plaintiff are determinable solely by the law of the state of Mississippi, and of our conclusion that upon no aspect or tendency of the evidence as to the circumstances under which the injury was sustained, and as to the laws of Mississippi obtaining in the premises, was the plaintiff entitled to recover. The general affirmative charge requested for defendant should therefore have been given. The other very numerous assignments of error need not be considered. For the error in refusing to instruct the jury to find for the defendant, if they believed the evidence, the judgment is reversed, and the cause will be remanded.

1. The police power of a state has no application respecting the liability of a railroad company for fires communicated by its engines or originating on its right of way as this power applies only to matters pertaining to the public health, the public morals, and the public safety.
2. A contract made by a railroad charter is not impaired by a statute making the company liable for fires caused by its engines or the act of its servants on its right of way where although the original charter was not subject to amendment or repeal the company accepted an amendment, the effect of which under general laws then in force was to make the charter subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal.
3. The privileges or immunities of citizens are not abridged by a statute creating a liability on railroad corporations for fires on its right of way or set by its engines.

4. The property of a railroad company is not taken without due process of law by a statute making the company liable for fires set by its locomotives or originating on its right of way by an act of its agents or servants but giving the company an insurable interest in the property exposed to such dangers.
5. The equal protection of the law is not denied to railroad corporations by statutes making them liable for fires set by their engines or upon their right of way by the act of their agents or servants and giving them an insurable interest in the property exposed to such loss.
6. Making a railroad company liable for fires set by its engines or on its right of way is not a regulation of commerce among the states.
7. No restraints, disqualifications, or burdens are placed upon or discriminations made against railroad corporations, within the prohibition of S. C. Const., art. 1, § 12, by a statute applicable only to the Property rights, however absolute, are subject to such limitations as not to be injurious.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 714.

Pope, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced in the court of common pleas for the county of Chester, in this state, and came on for trial at the March term, 1891, of said court, before his honor, Judge Kershaw, and a jury. At the trial the plaintiff and defendant submitted to the court the following agreement in writing: "The defendant consents to a verdict herein in the sum of one hundred dollars in favor of the plaintiff: provided, that the court should determine that section 1511 of the General Statutes is constitutional, it being admitted that the fire which destroyed plaintiff's property was communicated from defendant's locomotive. That, if the court holds that said section of the General Statutes is unconstitutional, then the verdict shall be 18 L. R. A.

p>for defendant." Section 1511 of the General Statutes of this state is as follows: "Every railroad corporation shall be responsible in damages to any person or corporation whose buildings or other property may be injured by fire communicated by its locomotive engines, or originating within the limits of the right of way of said road in consequence of the act of any of its authorized agents or employes, except in any case where property shall have been placed on the right [of way] of such corporation unlawfully, or without its consent; and it shall have an insurable interest in the property upon its route for which it may so be held responsible, and may procure insurance thereon in its own behalf." The presiding judge then charged as follows: "The parties in this case, admitting the origin of the fire to be sparks from defendant's locomotive, and the amount of damages sustained by reason thereof to be $100, and that the same was communicated from the locomotive of the defendant without negligence, and the supreme court of this state having held, in the case of Thompson v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 24 S. C. 366, that in such case, under section 1511 of the General Statutes, the defendant would be liable irrespective of any negligence, have agreed that a verdict shall be rendered in favor of the plaintiff for one hundred dollars, unless I shall hold that said section 1511 is unconstitutional, so far as it undertakes to make railroad corporations responsible in damages for property injured by fire communicated by its locomotive engines, without any negligence upon its part, and while in the prudent, careful, and proper operation of its road and franchises. I now charge you, gentlemen of the jury, that said section of the General Statutes is constitutional in every respect, and is not contrary in any manner to the Constitution of the state or of the United States, and is a proper exercise of the police power of the state by the Legislature. Under the stipulation entered into by the parties hereto, I must therefore direct that you find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of one hundred dollars." The jury rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $100, and, judgment having been duly entered thereon, the defendant now appeals to this court on the following grounds: "The defendant, the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, excepts to the charge and ruling of the presiding judge in the above-stated case that section 1511 of the General Statutes of the state of South Carolina is constitutional wherein it undertakes to make railroad corporations responsible in damages for property injured by fire communicated by their locomotive engines, absolutely and irrespective of any question of negligence, whereas he should have held that said section was unconstitutional so far as it undertook to make railroad corporations responsible for damages irrespective of the question whether its conduct was proper, or whether it was neglectful of duty. (1) Because said section contravenes the Constitution of the United States, in that (a) it deprives railroad corporations of their property without due process of law, in violation of the 14th Amendment; (b) it denies to railroad corporations within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law, in violation of the 14th Amendment; (c) it impairs the obligation of the charter contract of the defendant in violation of section 10, art. 1; (d) it interferes with the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several states, in violation of section 8, art. 1. (2) Because said section contravenes the Constitution of the state of South Carolina, in that (a) it subjects railroad corporations to restraints and disqualifications other than are laid upon other corporations and citizens of the state, in violation of section 13, art. 1; (b) it discriminates between railroad corporations and other corporations and citizens of the state, by imposing upon them conditions and obligations, and subjects them to burdens, different from those imposed upon other corporations and citizens, in violation of the same section and article; (c) it imposes a new obligation upon railroad corporations for the benefit of another class of citizens, when they are guilty of no neglect of duty, in violation of the same section and article; (d) it dispossesses railroad corporations of their property under a rule of law to which other corporations and citizens are not subjected, in violation of the same section and article; (e) it deprives railroad corporations of their property under a rule of law to which other corporations and citizens are not subjected, in violation of the same section and article; (f) it takes the private property of railroad corporations, and applies the same to a private use, without the consent of said corporation, or a just compensation being made therefor, in violation of section 23, art. 1."

1. We observe that the learned circuit judge has announced in his charge to the jury that section 1511 of the General Statutes of this state was constitutional because it was the exercise by the state of what is known in law as the "police power" of the state. We hesitate in venturing to dissent from this view as expressed by one for whose judgment we have so much respect, and in whose accuracy we have always with so much pleasure confided, yet candor, in the light of our own official responsibilities, requires that we should do so in this instance, no matter how distasteful it may be to us personally. We are aware that many eminent lawyers and judges have adopted the views of the circuit judge. But a careful consideration of the latest official declarations of this law by the Supreme Court of the United States has led us to modify our conceptions of what is involved in what is called the "police power" of a state in this Union of states. The fundamental idea in ascribing such potency to this principle of the law is based upon the immutable principles of self-defense,—a doctrine ever dear to the freeman in his individual status, and very precious to the affections of a people united in society, in an organized government; that, inasmuch as all rights of the state, not delegated expressly or by necessary implication to the general government, were reserved to the states in their individual sovereignty, and that, as all provisions in the laws of the United States were made upon the theory that this reserved right in the sovereign states was preserved intact, when any such laws of the United States contravened this principle, such principle would be preserved. To make our meaning clear, take this illustration: The Constitution of the United States requires that no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of a contract. Where a contract had been made by the state of Louisiana, whereby she invested a corporation, formed under her laws, with the exclusive privilege of having slaughter houses in the city of New Orleans, within that state, and yet a subsequent Legislature of that state made another contract with another corporation that directly impinged upon the first contract, and the question was finally carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, that august tribunal decided that the second contract was valid, although it was in violation of the obligation of the first contract, and justified such Legislature upon the principle of law known as the "police power," which required the protection of the public health of the citizens of that state. As we before remarked, in view of this and some previous decisions of that court, many lawyers and judges conceived that all questions relating to the exercise of the sovereign powers of a state by that state fell within this principle of the law. A moment's reflection will satisfy any one that such a broad doctrine would have in its wake untold evils. Three cases finally reached the supreme court, involving this principle. They are all to be found in 115 U. S. and are Louisville Gas Co. v. Citizens Gas-Light Co. 115 U. S. 683, 29 L. ed. 510; New Orleans Gas-Light Co. v. Louisiana Light & Heat Producing & Mfg. Co. 115 U. S. 650, 29 L. ed. 516; and New Orleans Water-Works Co. v. Rivers, 115 U. S. 674, 29 L. ed. 525. Mr. Justice Harlan delivered most carefully considered decisions in the three cases, wherein he reviewed every decision of that court relating to the police power of the states, and announced the conclusion that there was a harmony in all of them, one with the other, and that such law only comprised questions pertaining to the public health, the public morals, and the public safety, and that the police power was confined within the limits of these three questions. It must be admitted on all hands that the official declarations by a majority of this supreme court are final, conclusive, and authoritative declarations of the true construction to be placed upon the Constitution and laws of the United States. Such being the result, we therefore cannot agree with the learned circuit judge here in sustaining the constitutionality of this Act of our Legislature on the ground that it is an exercise of the police power of the state.

But it by no means follows that, being unable to agree to the reason assigned by the circuit judge in support of his charge to the jury wherein he sustained this provision of the law as constitutional, we must reverse his judgment, for, if there are any sound grounds in law for its support, we must do so. The assertion by him of the police power in the state was only a reason for his conclusion.

It remains for us to consider the constitutionality of this part of the Act of our Legislature in other aspects. Does that section operate to defeat any of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States or of this state in any of the particulars complained of? We propose to discuss these matters not exactly in the line suggested by the grounds of appeal, but our discussion will ultimate in a consideration of the merits of each one.

1. It may be as well to remark in the outset that the appellant here in its separate individuality is not a corporation created under the laws of this commonwealth. It is a creature of the laws of Virginia; but it has leased the Charlotte, Columbia & Augusta Railroad, and this railroad is a creature of the state of South Carolina. 11 Stat. at L. pp. 415, 536; 14 Stat. at L. p. 232. Any corporate rights exercised by the appellant in its management of the franchises of the Charlotte, Columbia & Augusta Railroad Company as its lessee are referable solely to the charter rights of its lessor. No clearer definition of a corporation exists than that announced by Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Dartmouth College Trustees v. Woodward, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. ed. 639: "A corporation is an artificial being, invisible, intangible, and existing only in contemplation of law. Being the mere creature of the law, it possesses only those properties which the charter of its creation confers upon it, either expressly, or as incidental to its very existence." One of the rights conceded in this country to corporations is that of being regarded as a person in the eyes of the law. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. v. Gibbs, 142 U. S. 386, 35 L. ed. 1061; and authorities therein cited in support of such proposition. The effect of the adjudicated cases on the subject of the charters conferred upon corporations operating railroads is that railroad corporations are private corporations affected by a use in the public. They are formed for the benefit and convenience of the public, hence by law invested with special privileges. As public purposes are by them subverted, they are invested, to an extent limited to their needs, with the state's right of eminent domain. Their business, being affected with a public use, to that extent is subject to legislative action. Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. v. Gibbs, supra; Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Smith, 128 U. S. 174, 32 L. ed. 877. As the charter of a corporation sets into existence the properties which it passes, it may not be amiss at this point to examine the charter which the laws of this state have conferred upon and which has been accepted by the Charlotte, Columbia & Augusta Railroad Company. So far as the grant of the usual rights possessed by a railroad company, the charter in this instance is complete. We mean by this statement that from the initial points of Augusta, Ga., by way of Columbia, in this state, to the city of Charlotte, in North Carolina, this corporation has had conferred upon it the usual properties possessed by railroads, but it may be proper to state that in the Act of the Legislature of this 18 L. R. A.

state providing for its creation any remuneration secured by its terms to the owners of the lands through which the right of way was to be obtained, only looked for compensation by such railroad to such landowners for the value of the property so taken by the railroad, such value being liable to be reduced by the consideration of the increased value lent to such lands by the railroad being built. In no case was there any provision for the injury that might accrue to such property by reason of fire being used by its locomotives. This railroad company was made up by the consolidation of the Charlotte & South Carolina Railroad Company with that of the Columbia & Augusta Railroad. The first had been chartered in 1846-1848; the second, some time during the year 1858. The consolidation occurred in 1869, under an Act of the Legislature of this state. The state of South Carolina in 1841 made the following enactment: "(41) Be it further enacted that it shall become part of the charter of every corporation which shall at the present or any succeeding session of the General Assembly receive a grant of a charter, or any renewal, amendment, or modification thereof, (unless the Act granting such charter, renewal, amendment, or modification shall in express terms except it,) that every charter of incorporation granted, renewed, or modified as aforesaid shall at all times remain subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal by the legislative authority." 11 Stat. at L. p. 183. The Act of 1846, providing a charter for the Charlotte & South Carolina Railroad Company, contained a clause especially excepting this corporation from such forty-first section of the Act of 1841. The Act passed in 1848 made no reference to such section. The Act providing for the consolidation as aforesaid was silent as to this forty-first section of the Act of 1841. The effect of this section 41 of the Act of 1841 has been construed by the court of last resort on constitutional questions,—the United States Supreme Court at least twice. Tomlinson v. Jessup, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 454, 21 L. ed. 204; Hoge v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 99 U. S. 348, 25 L. ed. 808,—in which last-cited suit Mr. Justice Field as the organ of the court, said: "By the Law of 1841 every charter of a corporation in South Carolina subsequently granted, amended or modified was subject to repeal, amendment or modification by the Legislature, unless specially excepted from such legislative control in the Act granting the charter, amendment, or modification. Such is evidently the meaning of the forty-first section of that law, though the intention is inaptly expressed. This construction is somewhat different from that placed upon it in Tomlinson v. Jessup, supra, and gives the Legislature more extended control, but it is the construction to which a more careful examination of the language has led us. By it the Legislature said that subsequent charters should be subject to repeal or amendment, unless they were in express terms excepted from its control in the Acts granting them; and that existing charters, if subsequently amended or modified, should stand in the same position. Its provisions constituted the condition upon which every charter was afterwards granted, amended or modified. They formed as much a part of the new or amended charter as if they had been originally embraced in it." Also Tomlinson v. Jessup, supra, in which the construction in Hoge v. Richmond & D. R. Co. supra, as to the effect of section 41, was virtually given in these words: "The power reserved to the state by the Law of 1841 authorized any change in the contract as it originally existed, or as subsequently modified, or its entire revocation."

It is admitted that a charter granted by a state to a corporation makes a contract between the state and the corporation, and that a question as to impairment of that contract arises whenever a state by subsequent legislation seeks to alter the same against the will of the corporation; and that, when such action of the state is questioned in law, the answer will have to be made justifying such legislative interference with its contract by the state. It is contended here that the Legislature of this state has no right, by the enactment of section 1511, to interfere with her contract with the Charlotte, Columbia & Augusta Railroad Company. But does it not seem that this state makes perfect answer to the appellant here when it shows that the party who accepted the contract contained in the Act of incorporation did so with a positive stipulation on the part of the state that, if the railroad company ever accepted any alteration or modification of its original charter by an Act of the Legislature of this state, thereafter it would be competent for the Legislature to alter, modify, or repeal such contract at the pleasure of the state? Such is the inevitable effect, unless there should be placed upon the Act in question some restraining hand by the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution. It is well-settled law that the laws which subsist at the time and place of the making of a contract and when it is to be performed enter into and form a part of it, as if they were expressly referred to or incorporated in its terms. White v. Hart, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 653, 20 L. ed. 688; Von Hoffman v. Quincy, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 552, 18 L. ed. 409; Edwards v. Kearzey, 96 U. S. 601, 24 L. ed. 797. So, when the state of South Carolina made a contract by the grant to this railroad company, all of her laws in existence at that time pertaining thereto became a part of such contract. At the date of this contract, under the law as it then existed, in case injury resulted to the property of another by fire communicated from the locomotive in use by the appellant, no damages could be recovered therefor unless negligence—want of due care—by the railroad company was shown. Thompson v. Richmond & D. R. Co. supra; Rodemacher v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. supra; Lyman v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 4 Cush. 288. After all, what is the controlling motive in this legislation? It certainly is not animosity against railroads. Look at the facts underlying the exercise of this principle of law: The Constitution and laws of every well-regulated community secure the enjoyment by every one of life, liberty, and property. A man owns property through which, or near by the place where, a railroad is constructed. The property of the man is destroyed by the fire communicated to the same by the railroad company. One man has lost his property of others. It adds, however, a provision allowing the railroad company to insure the property on its route against such loss resulting from fire communicated by its engines, or occurring on its right of way. Let it be remembered that such a privilege to the railroads could not be secured when losses occurred from negligence.

The inquiry must now be made, as previously suggested, does this section contravene the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution? In the case of Minor v. Happersett, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 171, 22 L. ed. 629, when the effect of the 14th Amendment was under consideration, Chief Justice Waite, in announcing that court's decision, stated: "The Amendment did not add to the privileges and immunities of a citizen. It simply furnished an additional guaranty for the protection of such as he already had." The language of the first section of this Amendment, in part, is as follows: ". . . No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States. Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Where can it be pretended that in this section 1511 the state of South Carolina has attempted to abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States? Is there not provided in the section an absolute equality of all railroad companies? Was not the Charlotte, Columbia & Augusta Railroad Company one on its own creatures, deriving its life from her laws? Care should be taken to restrict the view of this appeal to the fact that it is really this railroad, and no other, that makes this question. We are not required to answer questions fanciful in their nature. Our duty is to confine ourselves and our judgment to the parties actually before this court. We repeat it, this appellant has no other rights in this connection than those possessed by its lessor; and we fail to see how this section under discussion has abridged the privileges or immunities of such lessor through his lessee. The right to alter the contract existed before 1869. It existed in 1862, when this section was enacted. The right to control in determining the propriety of its alteration by the assent of the lessor was in the state. All that has been done has been to exercise that admitted right. The same course has been adopted by other states, and the courts of last resort in those states have upheld such legislation. Rodemacher v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. supra; Lyman v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 4 Cush. 288. After all, what is the controlling motive in this legislation? It certainly is not animosity against railroads. Look at the facts underlying the exercise of this principle of law: The Constitution and laws of every well-regulated community secure the enjoyment by every one of life, liberty, and property. A man owns property through which, or near by the place where, a railroad is constructed. The property of the man is destroyed by the fire communicated to the same by the railroad company. One man has lost his property through no carelessness of his own, and the railroad has destroyed that property through agencies necessary to the conduct of its business. The property of the citizen destroyed was not in the way of the proper conduct of the railway's business, but the fire set to it by the railroad company was while such property was off of its roadbed. Now, under all those circumstances, who shall suffer? In Danner v. South Carolina R. Co., 4 Rich. L. 329, 55 Am. Dec. 678, which was a case for negligence, and of course differs in that particular from the case at bar, the court ruled the law in this state to be that, upon the proof by the plaintiff of the killing of his cattle by the railroad company, it was then incumbent on the railroad company to rebut by its proof the charge of negligence. This section goes only a step further by holding the railroad company responsible for injuries to the rights of others, resulting from agencies set in motion by it, and which had escaped from the railroad's control, so as to work an injury to the property of another, while such property was on its owner's premises. The charge that this section takes the property of another without due process of law cannot be successfully maintained. Here there is no reference to the taking of the property of another. There is no compulsion used to this railroad to allow the fire of its engine to escape and burn up the property of another, but rather it incites care to prevent that result by providing a penalty for a failure to do so. Granted that the result is the payment of damages for the injuries aimed to be suppressed by this legislation, still it is only the result. No legislative provision vests the money of the railroad in the owner of property destroyed by the railroad. Nor do we see how it denies to this railroad the equal protection of the law. Nor, from what has been already said herein, is there any ground to imply an impairment of the obligation of the contract. These matters are somewhat involved in the decision of the United States court in the case of Charlotte, C. & A. R. Co. v. Gibbs, supra, and were all decided adversely to the railroad. As to the last, where it is suggested that this section interferes with the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the states in violation of section 8 of article 1, we are utterly unable to perceive the slightest soundness in that position. The argument of appellant is silent at this point. We apprehend that it must be a vast circuit that must be traversed to make this suggestion of error available to the correction of this judgment of the circuit court.

2. (a) A rule of law ought to apply generally; that is true; that is, there ought to be no excepted classes. What is the crime of murder in one man ought, under the law, to be the same crime in another man, under the same circumstances. When a tax is levied upon the profession of law, one gentleman at the bar should be required to pay it, just as do all the other members of the profession. One pilot should be allowed to collect the same fees as another pilot for similar services. One railroad should be subjected to a fine, or other penalty, for failing to blow its whistle at a crossing, just as all other railroads should be required to do. One railroad should be required to pay, on its gross earnings, a tax to pay the expenses of the railroad commissioners of this state, just as all the balance of the railroads in this state are required to do. Equality is equity. But when the law reaches out its strong arms, and punishes the murderer, he should not complain that his other fellow citizens, who have not committed murder, are not also hung. The lawyer who pays a tax on his profession should not complain that a tanner does not pay a like tax. A commission merchant should not feel chagrined because a pilot collects fees for bringing a vessel into port and he cannot. A railroad should not complain when it has to pay the expenses of the railroad commission, whose office it is to superintend its business, because a cotton factory, with whom the railroad commission has no business, is not required to pay its part of such expenses. And so with the balance. It is upon those common carriers who have been confided valuable franchises by the state on condition of a use of them by the public, and who operate railroads over a right of way contiguous to the property of others with a flying locomotive whose sparks sometimes spread ruin to others. It is to the railroads, who alone do this, that the law speaks, whether such railroads are operated and owned by one man, a partnership of men, or a chartered company. It speaks to every one alike. It is no respecter of persons. This exception is overruled.

(b) What is said in disposing of the objection indicated as "(a)" will apply with equal force to the objection now presented.

(c) The laws of this state reserved the right to change the contract. The Legislature, in its wisdom, has acted. In our judgment, its action is not liable to be considered an error as alleged.

(d) The short reference in (c) applies here as well.

(e) and (f). We are at a loss to perceive how this action of the state can be said to deprive or take the private property of railroads and give it to another without the railroads' consent, and contrary to law,—especially to the Constitution of this state. A little reflection, we are sure, will remove this difficulty. Where railroads are made to pay damages to persons whose persons or property they have injured, it cannot be said that such damages, though very unwillingly paid, are taken from them contrary to law. It is the law when enforced that requires the damages paid. The provision of the statute creating the offense, for the commission of which the damages are adjudged to be paid, can in no sense be made to apply to the case suggested in these exceptions. The grounds of appeal must all be dismissed.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

McGowan, J.:

I am not inclined to declare an Act of the Legislature unconstitutional unless it is clearly so. I concur in the result.

McIver, C. J., dissenting:

It being admitted that the fire which destroyed plaintiff's property some time in July, 1890, had its origin in sparks escaping from defendant's locomotive, and that the damages sustained amounted to $100, the only question in the court below, and the only question raised by this appeal, is whether section 1511 of the General Statutes comes in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution of this state or that of the United States. The section in question reads as follows: "Every railroad corporation shall be responsible in damages to any person or corporation whose buildings or other property may be injured by fire communicated by its locomotive engines, or originating within the limits of the right of way of said road in consequence of the act of any of its authorized agents or employes, except in any case where property shall have been placed on the right of way of such corporation unlawfully, or without its consent; and shall have an insurable interest in the property upon its route for which it may be so held responsible, and may procure insurance thereon in its own behalf." This section has been construed by this court in the case of Thompson v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 24 S. C. 366, as designed to eliminate the element of negligence, whenever a railroad company is sued for damages occasioned by fire communicated by its locomotives, or originating upon the right of way in consequence of the act of any of the authorized agents or employes of such company. So that the practical inquiry here is whether the Legislature has the power to pass an Act making a railroad company liable for damages done to the property of another, without fault on its part, and while in the lawful use of its own property. This question, not having been raised or considered in Thompson's Case, supra, is now presented for the first time, and must now be determined. The general rule, as I understand it, is that where one person, in the lawful use of his own property, happens to do some injury to the property of another, without fault on his part, he is not liable for the damages resulting from such injury. To make him so liable, it is necessary to show, not only the injury done, but also that it was due to some fault, either willful or negligent, on the part of the person sought to be charged. This rule has been applied to cases in which the damages sustained resulted from fire communicated by sparks from locomotive engines running on railways. Cooley, Torts, 589-592, where that eminent author says, "The gist of the action is negligence." See also McCready v. South Carolina R. Co., 2 Strobb. L. 356, where Wardlaw, J., lays down the same doctrine. In addition to this, it will be found that the Legislature has incorporated this principle in its legislation upon the subject of the destruction of property by fire, for by section 2497 of the General Statutes, as amended by the Act of 1886, (19 Stat. at L. p. 621, which was the law in force at the time of the destruction of the property of plaintiff by fire,) it is expressly declared that whoever shall maliciously or negligently set fire to any combustible matter, so as thereby the woods, etc., of another be set on fire, shall be liable to indictment, and shall, moreover, be liable to an action for damages; and, in the subsequent amendment by the Act of 1891, (20 Stat. at L. p. 1125,) the same element of negligence is retained. It seems, therefore, that the Legislature, by the provisions of section 1511 of the General Statutes, has undertaken to apply a much more stringent rule to railroad corporations than would be applied to all other persons under like circumstances. Now, as it is properly conceded that corporations, in inquiries like the present, must be regarded as persons, it seems to me that the section in question is a violation of section 12, art. 1, of the Constitution of this state, as well as of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. In other words, it is class legislation, which it was one of the objects of those constitutional provisions to prevent. It subjects a railroad corporation to "other restraints or disqualifications" in regard to its personal rights than such as are laid upon others under like circumstances, and it denies to railroad corporations "the equal protection of the laws;" and it tends to deprive a railroad corporation of its property without due process of law, and merely by legislative declaration, for, as we have seen, where fire is communicated to the lands of another by sparks escaping from a locomotive engine of a railroad corporation while passing over its track lawfully, as it has a right to do under the provisions of its charter, this legislation undertakes to make such corporation liable for any damage that may ensue, whether there is any negligence on the part of the corporation or not; while, if the same damage is done by any other person to the property of another, he cannot be made liable without proof of some fault or negligence upon the part of the person causing the damage. It is true that class legislation may sometimes be vindicated as an exercise of the police power, but I agree with Mr. Justice Pope that the legislation here under consideration cannot be vindicated as an exercise of the police power; and I need not undertake to add anything to what he has said in his opinion upon this subject. It must be remembered that the question here is not as to the power of the Legislature to enact laws for the proper regulation of railroad corporations in the exercise of the franchises granted to them, which would be readily conceded. The chapter of the General Statutes in which the section under consideration is found affords numerous instances of the exercise of such a power, which never have been, and never can be, successfully questioned. But the question here is as to the power of the Legislature to enact a law by which the liability of a railroad corporation for an injury done to the property of another without fault on its part, while in the lawful use of its own property, shall be measured by a different rule, and determined by a different principle, from that which would be applied to every other person who, while in the lawful use of his own property, should, without fault on his part, injure the property of another, whereby, in the latter case, it would be absolutely necessary to show negligence in order to fix liability, while in the former it would not be necessary to show any negligence whatever. Nor is this a question whether the Legislature may not enact a law altering the rules of evidence, by declaring that, where the property of a person is injured by fire caused by sparks escaping from a locomotive engine, proof of the injury from such a cause shall constitute prima facie evidence of negligence, and throw the burden of proof upon the railroad corporation using such locomotive of showing that there was no negligence; but, as I have said, the question practically is whether one principle of law can be applied to railroad corporations and another to all other persons, under like circumstances. We have no case in this state directly in point, and it must be conceded that the authorities elsewhere are conflicting. It seems to me, however, that the cases which hold legislation of the character of this now under consideration as unconstitutional, are better founded in reason than those which hold the contrary. See Zeigler v. South & North Alabama R. Co. 58 Ala. 594; San Mateo County v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 723; New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. Bourgeois, 66 Miss. 3; Oregon R. & Nav. R. Co. v. Smalley, 1 Wash. 206; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 184 U. S. 418, 88 L. ed. 970. It seems to me, therefore, that section 1511 of the General Statutes is clearly unconstitutional, and should be so declared.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Andrew MILLIKIN, Appt.,
v.
EDGAR COUNTY.

(.....Ill.....)

A contract for the employment of a keeper of a county poor-house for three years is not within the power of a board of supervisors, each of whom is elected for one year only, although the statute gives them power to appoint such keeper without any express limitation as to the time.

(November 2, 1892.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Court, Third District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Edgar County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount of compensation which plaintiff alleged that he had earned as keeper of the county poor-house. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. H. S. Tanner, Joseph E. Dyas and George A. VanDyke, for appellant;

The contract between appellant and the county is authorized by paragraph 4, § 28, chap. 107, p. 1788, Starr & Curtis' Annotated Statutes of Illinois. The power of the county board to appoint a keeper of the poor-house being conceded, leaves nothing in dispute but the length of time for which the keeper may be appointed.

A contract made in good faith by the county board employing a keeper of the poor farm for a reasonable time, even though such time exceeds the term of office of the members of the board of supervisors, is valid and binding on the county.

Stevenson v. School Directors, 87 Ill. 255.

Messrs. James A. Eads and Henry Van Sellar, for appellee:

Counties possess no powers, except such as are expressly, or by necessary implication, conferred upon them by the legislative department of government.

Scates v. King, 110 Ill. 466; Dill. Mun. Corp. pp. 82, 83, § 10, and note, p. 102, § 55.

A county may make authorized contracts, but they have no power to make contracts which shall cede away, control, or embarrass their governmental powers, or which shall disable them from performing their public duties.

Dill. Mun. Corp. p. 110, § 61.

The support and care of the poor is a matter of public concern and is a governmental or public duty imposed by law on counties.

Dill. Mun. Corp. p. 82, § 10.

The law imposes on the county the duty of caring for the poor, by levying annually the necessary taxes and by the employment of the necessary agents and servants. This duty they cannot delegate to others, nor can they make any contract that will hinder or embarrass them in the performance of that duty.

East St. Louis v. East St. Louis Gaslight & Coke Co. 19 Ill. App. 46; Stevenson v. School Directors, 87 Ill. 255; Davis v. School Directors, 93 Ill. 294.

Craig, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of assumpsit brought by Andrew Millikin against the county of Edgar to recover damages for the breach of an alleged contract entered into by and between the parties. It is averred in the declaration that on the 11th day of April, 1889, the board of supervisors of the county appointed the plaintiff steward or keeper of Edgar county poor-house for the term of three years from the 1st day of May, 1889, and agreed to pay him as compensation $1,700 per annum, payable in quarterly installments on the 1st days of March, June, September, and December; that, the plaintiff gave bond with security for the performance of his duties, which was approved by the board; that he entered upon the discharge of his duties under the appointment, and continued in the discharge thereof, faithfully performing all duties imposed upon him, until the 6th day of March, 1890, when the board of supervisors discharged the plaintiff, and ordered him to vacate the poor farm, and then and there dispossessed him, and refused longer to permit plaintiff to perform the duties of said appointment, by means whereof he was injured, and has sustained damages, etc. The defendant interposed a general demurrer to the declaration, which the court sustained, and, the plaintiff electing to abide by his declaration, judgment was entered against him for costs, which was affirmed in the appellate court.

The only question presented by the appeal is whether the board of supervisors had the power to enter into the contract with the plaintiff described in the declaration for the term of three years. Counties are political divisions of the state created for governmental purposes. They possess such powers as have been conferred by the Constitution and legislative department of the state. Their powers are of a public nature conferred merely for public purposes, and they should be exercised in such a manner as will best promote the interest and advance the welfare of the people. In chapter 84, Rev. Stat., will be found many of the principal powers conferred upon counties. Section 23 provides that each county shall be a body politic and corporate, and may sue and be sued; section 23 provides that the powers shall be exercised by a county board; and section 24 confers authority to purchase and hold real and personal property necessary for the use of the county, to make contracts, and do all other acts in relation to the property and concerns of the county, necessary to the exercise of its corporate powers; section 26 makes it the duty of the county board to erect and keep in repair alms-houses, jails, and other necessary county buildings; while section 25 confers power on the board to cause to be annually levied and collected taxes for county purposes. Section 14, chapter 107, provides that every county (except those in which the poor are supplied by the towns) shall receive and support the poor resident in the county. Section 28 also provides that the county board shall have power to acquire a suitable tract of land upon which to erect and maintain a county poor-house; to appoint a keeper of the poor-house, and all necessary agents for the management and control of the poor-house and farm, and prescribe their compensation and duties. The power and duty of the county board to make proper provision for the care, custody, and support of the poor of the county is so plainly conferred and so clearly enjoined by the provisions of the statute cited that neither can, with any show of plausibility, be questioned or denied. But while the power of the county board to employ a suitable person to keep and manage the poor-house may be conceded, can that power be exercised, as was attempted to be done, by entering into a contract like the one described in plaintiff's declaration, running for a period of three years? Reliance is placed on the last part of section 28 of chapter 107 of the Statutes, set out above, as authority for the making of the contract by the board. That clause of the statute does not in terms impose a limit as to the time for which the keeper of the poor-house may be appointed by the board, but, in placing a construction upon it, it must be construed in view of and in connection with other provisions of the statute relating to the powers of the board. At the time the contract was attempted to be made the members of the board of supervisors were elected annually; each member held his office for the term of one year, and no longer. The board was clothed with authority to levy taxes to raise funds to support paupers, but this power was required to be exercised annually. In view of these provisions of the statute it would be an unreasonable construction of the statute relied upon to hold that the Legislature intended to clothe the board with authority to enter into a contract with the keeper of a poor-house to run for the term of three years. If the board had the power to enter into a binding contract of this character for three years, no reason is perceived why it might not make a contract for five or even ten years, and, if this could be done, the hands of succeeding boards would be tied,—their powers taken from them. If this important power—the supervision of a poor farm and the care of the unfortunate—may be so far delegated as was attempted in this case, the county might be deprived in a great measure of one of the most important affairs intrusted to its care and supervision. The statute should not receive a construction which might lead to such disastrous results, unless the language employed would admit of no other reasonable interpretation. While the identical question presented by this record has not heretofore been before this court, similar questions arose in Stevenson v. School Directors, 87 Ill. 255, and Davis v. School Directors, 93 Ill. 394; and in those cases we held that school directors were powerless to enter into contracts with teachers extending substantially beyond the current year. What was said in those cases would seem to be applicable here. East St. Louis v. East St. Louis Gas Light & Coke Co., 98 Ill. 415, although not clearly in point, involves a question somewhat similar. In conclusion, we are satisfied the county board exceeded its power in making the contract relied upon by appellant, and we fully concur with the judgment of the county court and appellate court in holding it invalid.

The judgment of the Appellate Court will be affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Walter V. WILSON, Respt.,
v.
City of TROY, Appt.

(.....N. Y.)

1. The jury must determine whether the plumber or the city was responsible for the acts of laborers in leaving unguarded an excavation made in the street to connect private property with the city water main, where a city ordinance prohibited any person without the consent of the water board from tapping or making any connection with a distributing pipe, which had been interpreted to include the making of the excavation, by the board whose custom had been to furnish men for that purpose, and the plumber employed by the landowner had in accordance with such custom applied for and received the men who were to be paid by the city which was to be reimbursed by the plumber.
2. The negligence of city employees in leaving uncovered an excavation in a street made by them under direction of the superintendent of the city waterworks for the purpose of connecting a private house with the street main makes the city liable although the work was done at the request of a private contractor who had agreed with the owner of the house to do the work.

3. Notice to a city of a dangerous excavation in a street is not necessary to make it liable for injuries caused thereby where the excavation was made by employees of the city under proper authority.
4. Interest on the sum by which property is diminished in value on account of an accident in a street caused by the negligence of a city may be included in the damages awarded therefor.

(October 4, 1892.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming a judgment of NOTE.—Interest on sum allowed as damages.

I. For personal injuries.

Interest cannot be allowed on a sum awarded as damages for a personal injury to a brakeman on a railroad but the verdict should be for a sum in gross for all damages to the date of the judgment. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wallace (Tenn.) 14 L. R. A. 548.

Interest cannot be added to the discretionary damages allowed by the jury for a personal injury inflicted by reason of the negligence of a railroad company. Western & A. R. Co. v. Young, 81 Ga. 397.

Interest cannot be allowed on damages for personal injuries received by the running away of a horse caused by fright at cars which had run off the track at a crossing. Pittsburgh S. R. Co. v. Taylor, 104 Pa. 306. The judgment was, however, reversed on the ground that there had been no negligence.

Interest cannot be allowed on the damages given by the jury for unlawfully ejecting a person from a railroad train. Nichols v. Union Pac. R. Co. (Utah) Sept. 12, 1891.

But in Ell v. Northern Pac. R. Co. (N. Dak.) 12 L. R. A. 97, it was said that while an instruction to a jury to allow interest on the sum allowed as damages to an employee of the company for injuries received through the negligence of the foreman under whom he was working, was error, interest might be given in the discretion of the jury, under N. Dak. Comp. Laws, § 4573, providing that "in an action for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract . . . interest may be given in the discretion of the jury."

When death results.

Interest on damages for the death of a railroad employé cannot be allowed as a matter of right, but the allowance of it is in the discretion of the jury, and if allowed it must not be as interest, but as a part of the damages. Central R. Co. v. Sears, 66 Ga. 499.

But in New York interest must be added under N. Y. Laws 1847, chap. 450, as amended by N. Y. Laws 1870, chap. 78, N. Y. Code Civ. Proc., § 1904, providing that damages not to exceed five thousand dollars may be awarded for the death of a person, through the wrongful act, neglect, or default 18 L. R. A.

of another person or of a corporation, and that the clerk must add to the sum awarded interest from the decedent's death and include it in the judgment. Salter v. Utica & B. R. Co. 86 N. Y. 401; Erwin v. Neversink S. B. Co. 23 Hun, 578.

In Cornwall v. Mills, 12 Jones & S. 45, this provision was held not to be unconstitutional.

And in Manning v. Port Henry I. O. Co. of Lake Champlain, 61 N. Y. 664, it was held that the clerk must add this interest even though the jury had intended to include it in their verdict, the defendant's remedy being to move to set aside the verdict on that ground.

But in Robostelli v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co., 84 Fed. Rep. 719, it was held that when the complaint demanded $5,000, but no demand was made for interest, none could be allowed on a verdict of $5,000, but with the plaintiffs' consent the verdict might be reduced to such an amount that with interest it would amount only to that sum.

II. For injuries to property.

1. By railway fires.

On this subject there is a direct conflict in the authorities. In Missouri it is held that it cannot be recovered on the damages allowed for property destroyed by fire originating from a locomotive, as there is no statute providing for allowing it. Kenney v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 63 Mo. 99; Atkinson v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. 63 Mo. 367; Meyer v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. 64 Mo. 542; De Steiger v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 73 Mo. 83.

This was conceded by the plaintiff in Flannery v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 44 Mo. App. 306.

In Garrett v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 36 Iowa, 121, it was held that while the jury might include interest in assessing damages in such a case, it could not be added by the court to their verdict.

In Arthur v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 61 Iowa, 648, it was held that interest was properly included by the court on the value of what was thus destroyed.

And in Johnson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 77 Iowa, 666, it was held that interest should be added to the value of hay thus destroyed.

Interest should be allowed, though not as such but as an addition to the damages. Parrott v. Housatonic R. Co. 47 Conn. 575.

Interest should be allowed on the value of property thus destroyed which has a definite money the Rensselaer County Circuit in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to a horse which resulted from a defect in a street. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William J. Roche, for appellant:

In actions sounding in tort, such as the present, where the damages are unliquidated, are not readily ascertainable, and the claim is contested, the allowance of interest has no basis in law or reason; at most, it is to be left to the discretion of the jury to determine whether interest should be granted as a part of the indemnity.

Fitch v. Livingston, 4 Sandf. 492; Walrath v. Redfield, 18 N. Y. 457; Mygatt v. Wilcox, 45 N. Y. 306, 6 Am. Rep. 90; McCollum v. Seaward, 62 N. Y. 816; Adams v. Fort Plain Bank, 88 N. Y. 255; McCormick v. Pennsylvania Cent. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 308; Van Rensselaer v. Jewett, 2 N. Y. 185; Day v. New York Cent. R. Co. 22 Hun, 412, affirmed, 89 N. Y. 616; Mercer v. Vose, 67 N. Hampden*, 88 Me. 581; Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164; Farrelly v. Cincinnati, 2 Disney (Ohio) 516; McMaster v. State, 108 N. Y. 542; Hodge v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 27 Hun, 394; Reiss v. New York Steam Co. 85 N. Y. S. R. 86; Farrott v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 46 N. Y. 361; Mansfield v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 114 N. Y. 381; Sayre v. State, 123 N. Y. 291.

Mr. Charles E. Patterson, for respondent:

Municipal corporations proper, having the usual duties and powers conferred upon them respecting streets within their limits, owe to the public the duty to keep them in a safe condition for use in the usual mode by travelers, and are liable in a civil action for special injury resulting from neglect to perform this duty.

Ehrgott v. New York, 96 N. Y. 264, 48 Am. Rep. 622.

Defendant cannot avoid the application of this principle to this case, unless it shall estabvalue susceptible of easy proof. Regan v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 60 Conn. 124.

And in Jacksonville, T. & K. W. R. Co. v. Peninsular L. Transp. & Mfg. Co., 17 L. R. A. 33, 27 Fla. 1, it was allowed as a matter of right.

Interest should be allowed on the value of cotton thus destroyed. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Tankersley, 68 Tex. 57; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Levi, 60 Tex. 679.

And this whether the jury is so charged or not. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Horne, 69 Tex. 643.

An instruction to the jury requiring them to allow interest from the commencement of the suit, is proper. Chapman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 26 Wis. 265, 7 Am. Rep. 81.

In Kellogg v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 26 Wis. 223, 7 Am. Rep. 69, an exception to a similar charge was not urged.

And in Whitney v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 27 Wis. 327, interest was allowed on the value of wool destroyed by fire before removal from the freight house.

Interest may be allowed in the discretion of the jury. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Barnes, 2 Ind. App. 213.

By way of additional damages. Woodward v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 1 Biss. 403, 1 Biss. 447.

And an instruction that the jury must allow it is reversible error. Home Ins. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 11 Hun, 182.

But if the jury does not allow it no harm is done. Eddy v. Lafayette, 49 Fed. Rep. 307, 4 U. S. App. 247.

And in Whitbeck v. New York Cent. R. Co., 86 Barb. 644, an instruction that if the jury found for the plaintiff, they should allow him interest on the value of fruit trees destroyed by fire from a locomotive was held proper.

In Kendrick v. Towle, 60 Mich. 363, 1 Am. St. Rep. 526, it was held that interest might be allowed on the value of a sawmill destroyed by fire originating from sparks from a locomotive on a private road, if the recovery was restricted to the actual value of the property destroyed.

2. By other fires.

Interest may be allowed on the value of property destroyed by sparks from a steam dredge used in excavating a canal. Hinds v. Barton, 25 N. Y. 544.

It is proper to allow it, though it is not demandable of right, on the value of buildings destroyed 18 L. R. A.

by a fire started by the defendant on his own land, if the recovery is restricted to the actual value of the property with interest. Lucas v. Wattles, 49 Mich. 380.

3. Injuries to stock by passing trains.

On this subject then is the same conflict. In Dean v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 43 Wis. 305, an instruction that the plaintiff was entitled to recover interest from the time a cow was killed by a passing train was given, to which a general exception was taken, and it was held to be the law that he was entitled to interest from the institution of the suit; and as only a general exception was taken, the right to interest from the time of accident was not decided.

In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Schultz, 43 Ohio St. 270, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to interest from the time his horse had been killed by reason of the bad repair of the company's fence.

An instruction that the proper measure of damages for stock killed by a passing train is the value of the animal with interest from the time of killing, is correct. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Biggs, 50 Ark. 109; Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. McAlpine, 75 Ala. 113.

Interest should be allowed on the value of colts killed by a passing locomotive where the fence has been allowed to remain out of repair two or three weeks. Varco v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 30 Minn. 18.

In Hodge v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co., 27 Hun, 394, it was said that interest was not allowable as a matter of law, but might be allowed as damages in the discretion of the jury on the value of stock killed through a railroad company's neglect to fence.

And in Lackin v. Delaware & H. Canal Co., 22 Hun, 306, it was held to have been properly allowed.

And in Woodland v. Union Pac. R. Co. (Utah) April 2, 1891, that there then was no error in allowing interest from the institution of the suit.

Also in Wabash R. Co. v. Williamson, 3 Ind. App. 190.

But in Chatanooga, R. & C. R. Co. v. Palmer (Ga.) March 31, 1892, it was held that it could not be allowed as such, but if allowed at all, it must be added into the principal sum.

lish as matter of law, from the facts in this case, that the defendant is not liable for the acts of the men who dug the trench in question, and are not chargeable with notice of its existence.

Pettengill v. Yonkers, 116 N. Y. 558.

The waterworks department exists solely for the benefit of the city. Therefore, the liability of the city for injuries resulting from the neglect to properly care for this ditch or trench rests primarily upon the defendant.

Ehrigott v. New York, supra; Walsh v. New York, 107 N. Y. 220; Barnes v. District of Columbia, 91 U. S. 540, 23 L. ed. 440; Brusso v. Buffalo, 90 N. Y. 679; Turner v. Newburgh, 109 N. Y. 301; Nelson v. Canisteo, 100 N. Y. 89; Russell v. Canastota, 98 N. Y. 496.

Error was not committed in including interest in the amount of the verdict given by the jury.

Miller v. White, 78 N. Y. 398, 84 Am. Rep. 544; Walrath v. Redfield, 18 N. Y. 457; Home Ins. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 11 Hun, 182; Mairs v. Manhattan Real Estate Assn. 89 N. Y. 498; Duryee v. New York, 96 N. Y. 477; Moore v. New York Elev. R. Co. 126 N. Y. 671.

Also in Western & A. R. Co. v. McCauley, 68 Ga. 818.

And in Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Johnston, 74 Ill. 83, that it could not be allowed at all on the value of stock killed for want of a fence.

In Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Shultz, 55 Ill. 421, the same question arose, and the court said that to allow interest from the time of the accident would only give the plaintiff compensation, but as the value of the colt killed was more than the verdict the opinion was not held decisive.

And in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Gabbert, 34 Kan. 122, it was held that interest could not be allowed when the action was brought under the Railroad Stock Law of 1874, as it contained no provision for the payment of interest.

In Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Muldrow, 54 Tex. 233, it was also held, under the Texas Railway Law (Sayles' Civ. Stat., § 4245), limiting the measure of damages to the value of the stock killed, that no interest could be allowed.

In Damhorst v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 32 Mo. App. 350, interest was not allowed on damages caused to a wagon and harness by a locomotive.

Nor on the value of a horse killed while blasting rocks. Marshall v. Bohrer, 68 Mo. 308.

Interest cannot be allowed as such on the value of a horse killed by a railroad train through the neglect of a township to erect a barrier between the highway and the track, but the jury in computing the amount of damages may consider the time that has elapsed since the injury was received. Plymouth Twp. v. Graves, 126 Pa. 24.

4. Property injured, delayed, or lost in transportation.

The allowance of interest is in the discretion of the jury, and is not a matter of right, on damages done to cattle in the course of shipment, through the negligence of a common carrier. Black v. Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co. 45 Barb. 40.

Interest is properly allowed on the value of a jack transported in a grossly negligent manner such as to cause its death. Gray v. Missouri R. Packet Co. 64 Mo. 47.

And it may be allowed from the commencement of the suit, on damages sustained by mules, by being left in cars for a long time in cold, sleety weather, without food or water because of the company's failure to supply the necessary means for 18 L. R. A.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The record in this case presents two questions: First, whether the finding of the jury that the damage was the result of the defendant's negligence is sustained by any evidence; and, secondly, whether interest could legally be allowed by the jury in estimating the amount of the damages. On the night of the 13th of November, 1879, a valuable horse belonging to one Learned, while being driven through South street in the city of Troy, fell into an open ditch or unguarded excavation, made during that day, and was permanently injured. There is little, if any, controversy with respect to the value of the horse, the extent of the injury, or the amount of damages. The night was dark, and it is not denied that there was evidence for the jury sufficient to sustain a finding of negligence on the part of some one by reason of the failure to protect a place of danger in a public street, by proper guards and lights. It was not shown that the city had any actual notice of the existence of the excavation, if made by private parties withunloading them, as the negligence is gross. Dunn v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 68 Mo. 288.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McCarty, 82 Tex. 808, it was held that interest should be allowed on damages resulting from the negligent delay of a railroad to receive and ship cattle according to contract.

And it is properly allowed, although not asked for, on damages resulting to beef cattle from the negligence of a railroad company and the unsafe condition of its track, by which they were delayed for twenty hours without food and water, and were bruised and injured by the train running off the track. Fort Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Greathouse, 82 Tex. 104.

A charge authorizing the jury to allow interest on the damage done to cattle in transportation by the uncoupling and negligent bringing together of the cars in which they were carried, is proper. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Johnson (Tex.) May 20, 1892.

The court, sitting as a jury, should allow interest on the value of stock lost through being delivered to the wrong person by a common carrier by reason of the negligence of the railway clerk in making out the bill of consignment. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Ames, 40 Ill. 249.

Interest is recoverable under the general rule as now understood and Iowa Revision, § 1737, on the value of property taken from a trunk, left by a railroad company in a baggage room, insecurely fastened and left without a guard. Mote v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 27 Iowa, 22, 1 Am. Rep. 212.

Interest should be added to the value of baggage lost in course of transportation. Fraloff v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. 10 Blatchf. 18.

But in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Ferguson (Tex.) 9 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 386, it was held that interest could not be allowed on the value of baggage lost, as, although the rule was somewhat unsettled in Texas, it had not yet reached the point where interest would be allowed on breach of contract to transport baggage.

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Mudford, 44 Ark. 439, the court said in a dictum, that interest is allowed on the value of goods lost or converted by a common carrier.

And in Kyle v. Laurens R. Co., 10 Rich. L. 322, 70 Am. Dec. 231, it is said that interest from the time of out its permission; and a sufficient period had not elapsed between the time of opening it and the accident to render the city liable on the ground of implied notice. The excavation was made for the purpose of conducting the water from the principal main in the street, through lateral pipes, into a private house. The owner of the house employed a firm of plumbers to do the work, which included the digging of the trench as well as laying and connecting the lateral pipes with the main in the street. The firm applied to the superintendent of the waterworks for men to open the trench in the street, and that officer directed laborers in the employ of the city to do so. The opening in the street was made by them, and they were paid for the work by the city, the plumbers refunding to it the sum so paid. The question is whether the men who dug the ditch were under the control and direction of the defendant, or subject to the orders of the plumbers engaged in performing a piece of work for the owner of the house.

demand of payment is properly allowed on the value of cotton lost during transportation under a contract to deliver at a certain place.

The measure of damages for non-delivery of goods by a common carrier according to contract is their value at the place of delivery with interest. Spring v. Haskell, 4 Allen, 112; Cushing v. Wells, 98 Mass. 550.

But in Richmond v. Bronson, Fargo & Co., 5 Denio, 55, the allowance of interest in case of non-delivery was held to be in the discretion of the jury.

In Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Ball (Tex.) April 23, 1891, it was held to have been no error to allow interest.

Interest was allowed without opposition on the value of goods lost by a ship's running on a cape in a fog. Bazin v. The Steamship Co. 3 Wall. Jr. 229.

And in British Columbia & V. I. S. Mill Co. v. Nettleship, 18 L. J. 604, L. R. 3 C. P. 499, 37 L. J. Ch. 235, it was allowed without opposition that the plaintiff was entitled to recover interest on the cost of replacing machinery lost by the negligence of a common carrier to whom it was entrusted for transportation.

Interest should not be allowed on the value of goods broken into and embezzled in the course of transportation in the absence of improper conduct on the part of the master of the vessel. Watkinson v. Laughton, 8 Johns. 218.

Nor can it be when destroyed by fire after delivery to a common carrier, in the absence of all negligence on his part. Lakeman v. Grinnell, 5 Bosw. 625.

But in Sherman v. Wells, 23 Barb. 403, the value of the goods with interest from the time they should have been delivered was held to be the proper measure of damages in case of non-delivery.

And in Robinson v. Merchants D. Transp. Co., 45 Iowa, 470, it was held that the owner of freight, destroyed by fire under a contract that the carrier should not be responsible for loss from fire, but containing a provision that the delivery should be without transfer, which was violated, was entitled to interest from the time the goods should have been delivered.

In Blumenthal v. Brainerd, 38 Vt. 402, 91 Am. Dec. 360, interest from the time of their loss was allowed on the value of goods claimed to have been stolen from a depot.

And in The Gold Hunter, 1 Blatchf. & H. 300, the 18 L. R. A.

The system of waterworks in Troy is the property of the municipality, and is under the management and control of a board of water commissioners, which may be regarded as a department of the city government. The commissioners are by law required to nominate, and the common council of the city to appoint, a superintendent of the waterworks, who is the executive officer in that department, and who, in this case, directed the men in the employ and pay of the city to make the excavation in the street. The board is authorized by law to extend the distributing pipes of the waterworks wherever they might think proper, and to make such alterations and improvements in the works, and in the management and preservation thereof, as they might deem necessary and expedient, and to employ such persons and assistants as they might require, to execute any of these purposes, which employes were to be paid for their services from the city treasury. The commissioners were also empowered to enact such by-laws, regulations, owner of wine shipped from Havre, and consumed by the passengers in consequence of being put on short rations, was held to be entitled to interest.

The defendant conceded that legal interest was allowable on the value of cotton destroyed by fire during transportation by a common carrier, in Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Jurey, 111 U. S. 584, 28 L. ed. 527.

Interest from the time salvage proceedings were instituted for saving the wreck was allowed on the value of gold coin lost, after the partial wreck of the vessel in which it was carried, through the gross negligence of the master. King v. Shepherd, 3 Story, 849.

Interest from the time of demand may be allowed on the value of goods deposited in a warehouse, claimed to have been taken away by burglars. Schwern v. McKie, 51 N. Y. 130.

In Smith v. Richardson, 3 Cal. 213, it was said that interest could not be recovered on the price of staves lost by the plaintiffs in transporting them, by reason of the defendant's breach of contract to do so.

In Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Cobb, 72 Ill. 143, it was held that interest could not be allowed on damages for an unreasonable delay in shipping grain, and for damage to it in transitu.

But in Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Jackson, 62 Tex. 209, it was held that interest was allowable, as a matter of law, upon the loss resulting from the failure of a common carrier to transport with reasonable dispatch a quantity of cotton.

And in Wolfe v. Lacy, 30 Tex. 349, it was held that interest might be allowed as punitive damages on the loss resulting to cotton by the removal of planks with which it was covered, and a delay of three weeks in its transportation across a lake.

Interest is properly allowed as damages on the contract price of a cargo of lumber the delivery of which is delayed four months by the unseaworthy condition of the vessel on which it is shipped. Murrell v. Dixey, 14 La. Ann. 236.

In Smith v. Whitman, 13 Mo. 352, it was held that an instruction preventing the allowance of interest on the value of a cargo of lead from the time it should have arrived was improper.

It is proper to allow interest on the difference between the market value of goods at their arrival and at the time they ought to have arrived. Newell v. Smith, 49 Vt. 256; Laurent v. Vaughn, 30 Vt. 90.

Interest on sums lost by reason of a common and ordinances as they should deem necessary for the protection of hydrants and water pipes, and the preservation, protection, and management of the waterworks. These by-laws, unless disapproved by a vote of two thirds of all the members of the common council of the city, were to have all the force and effect of law. In pursuance of the power thus conferred by the statute, the board of water commissioners enacted by-laws and ordinances on the subject which were in force at the time the excavation in question was made. They, in effect, prohibited any person except the superintendent, and those employed by him or by the commissioners, to tap or make any connection with the main or distributing pipe, or permit the same to be done, unless by the permission and under the direction of the superintendent. The learned counsel for the defendant contends that this regulation simply forbids the act of connecting the lateral pipes from the house with the main, and did not prohibit private persons from digging the necessary trenches and uncovering the main or distributing pipe, and hence that part of the work was done by the contractors who were employed by the owner of the house to make the connection, and not by the city. But a private individual had no right to dig in the street for this or any other purpose without the permission of the proper municipal authorities, and the obvious purpose, as well as the language, of the ordinance indicates that it was intended to prevent the uncovering of the main, or any interference with the street in which it was placed, by private parties. At all events, the water board and its chief executive officer, the superintendent, in the discharge of the duties imposed upon them by the statute, might very properly give to it that construction, and act accordingly. To hold that such a by-law did not embrace within its object and purview the evils that might result from ungaurded and unregulated interference with the bed of the street by private parties in order to reach the main, would be giving to it a construction altocarrier's failure to deliver grain within a reasonable time may be included by the jury in their verdict. Cobb v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 38 Iowa, 601.

In an action against a railroad company for non-delivery of a carload of cattle within a reasonable time, it is proper to instruct the jury that the plaintiff is entitled to interest from the date of the breach of contract if the suit be considered as one for breach of contract, or from the date of the injury, if the action be viewed as one in tort. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Haynes, 64 Miss. 604.

5. Vessel captured as a prize.

Interest on the prime cost of a vessel and its cargo is a proper element of damage for unlawfully seizing a vessel under the Non-intercourse Act. Murray v. The Charming Betsey, 6 U. S. 2 Cranch, 64, 2 L. ed. 208.

Interest was also said to be properly given in The Anna Maria, 15 U. S. 2 Wheat, 387, 4 L. ed. 253, on the value of captured property lost through the negligence of the captors. In neither of the foregoing cases was the allowance of interest questioned.

Nor was the giving of interest questioned in The Amiable Nancy, 16 U. S. 8 Wheat, 546, 4 L. ed. 456, an action for the unlawful seizure and plunder of a vessel as a prize.

In Hallett v. Novian, 14 Johns. 273, an instruction that additional damages equal to the interest on the value of the cargo of a ship unlawfully captured during war, was not questioned, but the judgment was reversed on another point in 18 Johns. 337.

Interest, however, was not allowed in Amory v. McGregor, 15 Johns. 24, 58 Am. Dec. 205, on the value of goods seized after the declaration of war between England and the United States, for the purpose of preventing their seizure by the enemy, the court saying that it should have been allowed if there had been any fraud or gross misconduct attending the transaction.

6. Collision.

The owner of a ship which causes a collision without his special fault is liable for interest from the time of the collision, beyond the value of his ship, appurtenances, and freight, to which his liability is limited by Stat. 53 Geo. III., chap. 159, § 1. The Dundee, 2 Hagg. Adm. 137.

In African S. S. Co. v. Swanzy, 25 L. J. Ch. 870, it was held that interest could not be allowed on the 18 L. R. A. limited liability of the owners as fixed by Stat. 17 & 18 Vict. chap. 104, § 514, as the Act contained no provision therefor.

But in Nixon v. Roberts, 4 L. T. 679, 80 L. J. Ch. 844, it was held that interest should be allowed under this Act from the time when freight would become due if any were earned and if not from the time of the collision.

And interest was allowed under the same Act as amended by Stat. 25 & 26 Vict. chap. 63, § 54, limiting the liability of the owner to 8 £ per ton of the ship, goods, and merchandise. The Northumbria, 21 L. T. 681; Straker v. Hartland, 11 L. T. 622, 34 L. J. Ch. 122; Smith v. Kirby, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 131.

It should be allowed if payment is delayed. The Amalia, 84 L. J. Adm. 21, 8 L. T. 805.

Interest is allowed in cases tried in the admiralty division, or removed there by consent from the queen's bench division on the value of property lost by reason of a collision or loss of a vessel at sea. The Baron Abendare and The Gertrude, 59 L. T. N. S. 251, 36 Week. Rep. 618.

Interest is allowable from the time of collision on one half the damages for which a vessel is liable under an agreement of compromise made eleven years after. The Kong Magnus (1891) Prob. 223.

While interest might be properly allowed on the value of a pilot boat lost by reason of a collision, it cannot be awarded against the stipulators beyond the sum in which they have bound themselves. The Wanata, 35 U. S. 600, 24 L. ed. 461.

In The Manitoba, 122 U. S. 97, 30 L. ed. 1095, the value of a vessel lost by a collision was more than the bond given and interest was not allowed on that account.

Interest on the value of a vessel destroyed in a collision cannot be allowed against stipulators who have bound themselves only in a sum equal to the value of the vessel. The Ann Caroline, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 538, 17 L. ed. 633.

Interest may be allowed or not, in the discretion of the jury, on the value of strippings saved from a ship which sinks after causing a collision. The Scotland, 118 U. S. 507, 30 L. ed. 153.

In The Vaughan & Telegraph, 81 U. S. 14 Wall. 258, 20 L. ed. 807, interest was allowed without question on the value of the cargo of a canal boat sunk in a collision through the negligence of the steamer conducting it, another steamer meeting it.

Interest was held to be allowable in The Joshua Barker, 1 Abb. Adm. 215, on the value of a cargo of flour which after being sunk at the wharf, was gether too narrow. The evidence tends to show that the water board gave to it the broader and more comprehensive meaning, as it was the custom and practice for years before the accident in question to make application to the superintendent for men to do the digging, and they were always furnished, as in this case. As between the owner of the house and the plumbers employed by her to introduce the water into her house, the digging was undoubtedly a part of the contract or work of the latter. If no main had been placed in the street at that time, they could also have contracted with her to procure its extension, but that part of the work would be subject to the action and regulations of the water board, and, while the contractors might be obliged to pay the city for the whole or some part of the expense, it would be none the less the work of the city. One of the plumbers testified that while he agreed with the owner of the house to do all the work, yet he knew then that it was the practice and custom to apply to the superintendent of the waterworks for men to do the digging and to make the connection, and acted upon the assumption that he had no right to do it. He also says that the men who made the excavation were not employed by him, but by the city. We think that, upon the proof, it could not be held, as matter of law, that the men who dug the trench and left it unguarded ceased for the time being to be the servants of the city, and subject to the directions of the superintendent, and became, while doing this job of work, the servants of the parties employed to put in the lateral pipes into the house, as is urged by the learned counsel for the defendant. What party sustained the relation of master to the men who dug the trench, and had the control and direction of them, and was charged with the duty of directing them to properly guard the ditch,—whether the plumbers on the one hand, or the city, through the superintendent of the waterworks, on the other,—was the important question to be determined, and the trial court raised and sold without communication with the owners, though they were easily accessible.

And interest was allowed on the value of a cargo of barley lost by collision with the canal boat carrying it on the Hudson River. The Mary J. Vaughan, 2 Ben. 47.

In Williamson v. Barrett, 54 U. S. 13 How. 101, 14 L. ed. 83, the jury were instructed to allow as damages to a steamboat from a collision, the use of her during the time necessary to make repairs, and were told that they were not bound to give interest, but were to give such sum in damages as they should deem just and equitable. On appeal to the supreme court, it was held that nothing could be allowed for loss of use of the vessel, but that full damages for the injury at the time and place of its occurrence, with legal interest, was the proper measure of damages.

In The North Star, 44 Fed. Rep. 422, the allowance of interest in case of a collision was held to be in the discretion of the jury, and its allowance would not be disturbed where both parties were nearly equally in fault, and there was manifest discrepancy in the testimony of the party against whom it is awarded.

And in The Alaska, 44 Fed. Rep. 498, that while interest on the cost of repairs from a collision was usually allowed, it was a matter of discretion, and that where the vessel is materially improved, and there is doubt whether the entire bill for repairs should be allowed, it will be refused.

And in Whitehall Transp. Co. v. New Jersey S. B. Co., 51 N. Y. 300, the owners of a canal boat, injured by a collision, were held to be entitled to interest on the cost of repairs.

And in Mailler v. Express Propeller Line, 61 N. Y. 312, interest was allowed on the cost of repairs and the rental value of a sloop injured by a collision.

Interest may be allowed on the value of a sloop and its cargo, sunk by a steamer's colliding with it, while drifting with the tide without sufficient wind to give it steegeage way. Parrott v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 48 N. Y. 361.

The jury may allow interest on the damage done to a vessel by a collision. Fitch v. Livingston, 4 Sandf. 422.

But in Ormsby v. Johnson, 1 B. Mon. 80, it was held that interest could not be allowed on the damage done to a flatboat and its cargo run into and sunk by a steamboat.

And in Fowler v. Davenport, 21 Tex. 626, it was held to have been erroneous to allow interest on 18 L. R. A.

the value of cotton intrusted to a boat for transportation and which was damaged by reason of the boat's being run into by a raft.

Property destroyed by a mob.

Interest may be allowed by the jury, if justice requires it, on the value of an elevator and machinery destroyed by a mob in a riot, in an action against a city or county under N. Y. Laws 1855, chap. 423. Orr v. New York, 64 Barb. 106.

And in Greer v. New York, 3 Robt. 406, it was held that interest should be added as a matter of right if the jury ascertained the value of the property actually destroyed and the extent of damage to such as was injured.

In St. Michael's Church v. Philadelphia County, Bright (Pa.) 121, the jury were instructed that they might and in the opinion of the court ought to include in their verdict interest from the time the property was destroyed or at least from the commencement of the suit.

And in Hermits of St. Augustine v. Philadelphia County, Bright (Pa.) 116, the jury were told that the proper measure of damages was the value of the property with interest from its destruction, and the court preferred it should be assessed separately as interest, that the supreme court might say whether interest could be allowed, but as the defendant objected this course was not followed.

But in Weir v. Allegheny County, 95 Pa. 412, it was held that interest could not be allowed, as the statute under which the action was brought (Pa. Act 1841, Pamph. Laws, 416), extended to Allegheny County by Pa. Act 1849, Pamph. Laws, 184, contained no provision for its allowance.

From negligent construction of railroads, canals, etc.

The proper measure of damages for crops destroyed and land injured by being flooded by reason of the negligent construction of a railroad, is the actual value of the crops destroyed, and the cost of restoring the land with interest. Sabine & E. T. R. Co. v. Joachimi, 58 Tex. 452.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Holliday, 65 Tex. 512, a similar action, it was held that an instruction that the plaintiff was entitled to interest was correct, but as the jury had allowed none it was not specially discussed.

And in Fremont, E. & M. V. R. Co. v. Marley, 25 Neb. 138, interest was held to have been properly allowed in such an action.

Interest, eo nomine, cannot be allowed on the in-submitted it to the jury. Under all the circumstances, the question became one of fact, and this disposition of it was not error. Ward v. New England Fibre Co. 154 Mass. 420. This finding of the jury is conclusive upon us, and imports that the city itself, through one of its officers or departments, caused the trench to be dug, and left it unguarded, resulting in the damage complained of. In such a case the negligent act is imputable to the city, and the doctrine of actual or implied notice has no application, or, at least, is unnecessary, where one injured by the neglect of the city to properly guard a place made dangerous by its own act brings the action. Pettengill v. Yonkers, 116 N. Y. 558; Walsh v. New York, 107 N. Y. 220; Turner v. Newburgh, 109 N. Y. 801; Brusso v. Buffalo, 90 N. Y. 679; Russell v. Canastota, 98 N. Y. 496; Nelson v. Canistota, 100 N. Y. 89; Ehrgott v. New York, 96 N. Y. 273, 48 Am. Rep. 622; Barnes v. District of Columbia, 91 U. S. 540, 23 L. ed. 440.

The amount demanded in the complaint juries to land from the construction of a railroad, and is within the discretion of the jury if allowed at all. Reading & P. R. Co. v. Balthasar, 126 Pa. 1.

Interest may be allowed on the injury done to abutting property by the construction of a railroad in a public street, although not provided for by statute, if reparation for the injury is delayed for a long time. Lawrence R. Co. v. Cobb, 35 Ohio St. 94.

Interest cannot be allowed as such, but the damages should be increased by that amount on consequential damages to abutting property from the construction of a street railway. Pennsylvania S. V. R. Co. v. Ziemer, 124 Pa. 560.

Interest upon damages caused by the erection of an elevated railroad may be awarded in the discretion of the jury, but cannot be directed as a matter of right. Moore v. New York Elev. R. Co. 126 N. Y. 671.

But in Sayre v. State, 123 N. Y. 291, it was held that interest could not be allowed on money expended in reclaiming land overflowed by reason of the negligent construction and maintenance of a feeder to a canal, as they were unliquidated damages arising from a tort.

The owner of canal boats is entitled to interest from the date of each loss he has sustained to them, through the neglect of a purchaser of the canal to keep them in repair as required by Pa. Act, May 15, 1857, and Pa. Act, May 8, 1864. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Patterson, 73 Pa. 491.

The owner of premises diminished in value by reason of a nuisance may recover, as damages, the amount of such diminution, with interest from the time a sale could have been made, subject to the Statute of Limitations. Hetzel v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 6 Mackey, 1.

But interest cannot be allowed unless there is an anticipated sale which is defeated by reason of the nuisance. Moore v. Langdon, 6 Mackey, 6.

Interest may be allowed as damages, without finding an unreasonable delay in payment in an action against a railroad company for trespassing upon land and removing material. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Swinney, 97 Ind. 538.

Interest cannot be allowed on the sum found as damages for an injury caused by a defective highway, as the statute restricts the claim to the amount of damage sustained. Sargent v. Hampden, 38 Me. 531.

Interest will not be allowed on the value of a 18 L. R. A.

on account of the injury to this horse was $3,000, and the court instructed the jury that they could not, in awarding damages, go beyond that sum, with interest. The defendant's counsel excepted to this in so far as it authorized interest, and requested the court to charge that the jury could not allow interest in the action. The court declined to so charge, and the defendant's counsel excepted. The jury afterwards came into court, and announced that they had found a verdict for the plaintiff for $3,000 and interest. The court then said: "You must compute the interest if you give interest. You will have to render your verdict in dollars and cents." This direction was complied with, and the verdict as entered included interest from the date of the injury, which result has been modified by the general term by striking out the interest awarded prior to the date of the presentation of the claim to the city, which was held to be a prerequisite to the maintenance of the action. The fair construction of the charge is horse killed and wagon broken at a railroad crossing allowed to remain out of repair. Kimes v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 85 Mo. 611.

Interest is properly allowed on the value of a private bridge negligently thrown down and destroyed while being moved to another spot by direction of the common council of Buffalo, under N. Y. Laws 1843, chap. 198, authorizing its entire removal if the plaintiff did not construct a draw therein on fifteen months' notice, as such moving was not a strict compliance with the statute. Buffalo & H. Turnp. Co. v. Buffalo, 58 N. Y. 639.

From explosion, etc.

Interest, in Colorado, is a creature of the statute, and will not be allowed on damages to property caused by an explosion, as it is not one of the cases there recognized. Denver, S. P. & P. R. Co. v. Conway, 8 Colo. 1; Denver, S. P. & P. R. Co. v. Moynahan, 8 Colo. 56.

Interest cannot be allowed as such, or as a matter of right, on damages caused by the explosion of natural gas, through the negligence of the defendant company, but its allowance is in the discretion of the jury as compensation for delay. Richards v. Citizens Nat. Gas Co. 130 Pa. 37.

Also on damages done to the walls of a barn by the negligent mining of coal underneath. Emerson v. Schoonmaker, 135 Pa. 437.

In Holmes v. Barclay, 4 La. Ann. 63, interest was allowed without question on the value of a warehouse destroyed by a steamer's running into it during a high flood.

Interest may be allowed, if necessary to give the plaintiff compensation on the damage done to goods stored in the vault of his store, which has been flooded by reason of an excavation made by the defendant in the street in front, for the purpose of erecting a building, whether there was negligence on his part or not. Mairs v. Manhattan Real Estate Assn. 39 N. Y. 498.

But in Reiss v. New York Steam Co., 35 N. Y. S. R. 86, it was held that an instruction that the plaintiff was entitled to interest, if anything, on damages caused to goods by the negligent escape of steam, was reversible error, unless interest was remitted. The judgment was reversed in 38 N. Y. S. R. 842, after interest had been remitted, on the ground that the defendant was not liable.

Interest should be allowed against a city for the value of flats carried away from a wharf and lost by reason of its removal of posts therefrom, and that the jury could include in the damages interest upon the sum found to represent the diminished value of the horse in consequence of the injury, and not that the plaintiff was entitled to interest as matter of right. The exception, therefore, presents the question whether, in an action to recover damages to property by reason of negligence on the part of the defendant, it is within the power of the jury, in the exercise of discretion, to include in their award of damages interest on the sum found to represent the diminished value of the property in consequence of the injury from the time that the cause of action accrued. When interest may be allowed as part of the damages, in actions of this character, is a question which, in the present state of the law, is involved in much confusion and uncertainty, and in regard to which the decisions of the courts are not harmonious. It is perhaps impossible from the decisions to formulate a general rule embracing every possible case. The tendency of courts in modern times has been to extend the right to recover interest on demands far beyond the limits within which that right was originally confined. What seemed to be the demands of justice did not permit the principle to remain stationary, and hence it has been for years in a state of constant evolution. This, in some measure, accounts for many of the apparently contradictory views to be found in the adjudged cases. There are certain fundamental principles, however, established by the decisions in this state, which, when properly applied, will aid in the solution of the question. There is, of course, a manifest distinction, always to be observed, between actions sounding in tort and actions upon contract. In the latter class of actions there is not much difficulty in ascertaining the rule as to interest until we come to unliquidated demands. The rule in such cases has quite recently been examined in this court, and principles stated that will furnish a guide in most cases. White v. Miller, 78 N. Y. 393, 84 Am. Rep. 544. We are concerned now only with the rule applicable in actions of tort. The right to interest, as a part of the damages, in actions of trover and trespass de bonis asportatis, was given first in England by Stats. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. The recovery was not, however, allowed by that statute as matter of right, but in the discretion of the jury. The earlier cases in this state followed the rule thus established in England, and permitted the jury, in their discretion, to allow interest in such cases. Beals v. Guern- neglect to replace them. Allegheny v. Campbell, 107 Pa. 530, 52 Am. Rep. 478.

In Hogg v. Zanesville C. & Mfg. Co., 5 Ohio, 410, it was held that interest might be allowed on the value of a boat and its loading, lost by reason of a dam constructed across a river, although Hitchcock, J., who delivered the opinion, considered that the law did not allow the giving of interest as such in the case.

In Coburn v. Muskegon Boom Co., 72 Mich. 134, it was held, two of the five judges dissenting, that interest could not be allowed on expenses caused by a booming company's so jamming a river with logs that the plaintiff could not float his logs.

Interest may be added to the damages caused to a tannery by diverting water from it, from the date of such diversion. Bare v. Hoffman, 79 Pa. 71, 21 Am. Rep. 42.

It is not improper for the jury to add interest to the value of a slave killed while assisting another person in a hazardous occupation, for which he was not employed. Collier v. Lyons, 18 Ga. 648.

The owner of a slave negligently carried off by a railroad without his permit may recover as damages the hire of the slave while gone, with interest, and the cost of recovering him. Brown v. Southwestern R. Co., 36 Ga. 377.

In an action for trespass for causing the death of a slave interest is allowed from the time of trespass. Fall v. Presley, 50 Ala. 342.

Interest is not allowable on a sum assessed by the jury for damages done by trespassing cattle. Jean v. Sandford, 39 Ala. 317; Glidden v. Street, 68 Ala. 600.

Interest may be added to the amount found as damages resulting from negligence in the conduct of a ferry. Borden v. Bradshaw, 68 Ala. 362.

Interest should not be allowed on the damages sustained by a lessor's failure to rebuild a mill and elevator destroyed by fire under a contract that in case of fire it should be rebuilt with all reasonable promptness. Chamberlain v. Dunlop, 23 N. Y. S. R. 376.

Interest will not be allowed against a stakeholder on money retained by him after a wager has been revoked, when the record shows nothing more than a mere delay on his part to pay over the money. Corson v. Neatheny, 9 Colo. 212.

One whose property has been destroyed by the negligence of another, and who has made a demand for his claim, without stating the amount of his loss, but delays instituting suit, from its novel character, until the determination of another similar suit, is entitled to interest in the discretion of the jury. Frazer v. Bigelow Carpet Co., 141 Mass. 128.

Against agents and officers.

An agent who has departed from positive instructions of the principal in leaving unsold certain goods is liable for their loss, but interest thereon as such cannot be awarded, though the jury might include it in the total amount of damages. Survivor of Holmes & Co. v. Misroon, 8 Brev. 200.

Interest should be allowed as a matter of right on the loss sustained by the owners of flour through the consignee's negligently selling it before they were authorized to do so. Milbank v. Dennistoun, 1 Bosw. 246.

An agent who, on the positive instructions of his principal, fails to convert money into certificates, is liable to pay legal interest on all sums not so converted. Short v. Skipwith, 1 Brock. 108.

Bankers who have gratuitously accepted charge of bonds under an agreement to return them on demand or pay their full value including gold interest, are liable for the full interest, if the bonds are lost through their failure to use common prudence. Maury v. Coyle, 84 Md. 236.

In an action against an executor for waste in allowing an execution to be levied on shares of stock, and the shares to be sold at an amount much below their value, interest on such reduction should be allowed, only from the purchase of the writ. Dawes v. Winship, cited in 5 Pick. 97, note.

The allowance of interest on the value of property unlawfully retained by a sheriff after the vacation of an attachment, is unauthorized by law. Green v. Garcia, 3 La. Ann. 702.

Interest is not allowable in an action against a sheriff for failure or refusal to issue a writ of restitution in an ejectment suit, under Mo. Rev. Stat., sey, 8 Johns. 446; Hyde v. Stone, 7 Wend. 354, 23 Am. Dec. 583; Bissell v. Hopkins, 4 Cow. 58; Rowley v. Gibbs, 14 Johns. 385. The principle that the right to interest in such cases was in the discretion of the jury, was, however, gradually abandoned, and now the rule is that the plaintiff is entitled to interest on the value of the property converted or lost to the owner by a trespass as matter of law. The reason given for this rule is that interest is as necessary a part of a complete indemnity to the owner of the property as the value itself, and in fixing the damages is not any more in the discretion of the jury than the value. Andrews v. Durant, 18 N. Y. 496; McCormick v. Pennsylvania Cent. R. Co. 49 N. Y. 815; Buffalo & H. Turnp. Co. v. Buffalo, 58 N. Y. 639; Parrott v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 16 N. Y. 369. It is difficult to perceive any sound distinction between a case where the defendant converts or carries away the plaintiff's horse and a case where, through negligence on his part, the horse is injured so as to be valueless. There is no reason apparent for a different rule of damages in the one case than in the other. In an early case in this state the principle was recognized that interest might be allowed, by way of damages, upon the sum lost by the plaintiff in consequence of defendant's negligence. Thomas v. Weed, 14 Johns. 255. We think the rule is now settled in this state that, where the value of property is diminished by an injury wrongfully inflicted, the jury may, in their discretion, give interest on the amount by which the value is diminished from the time of the injury. That is the rule laid down in the elementary books and sustained by the adjudged cases. 1 Sedgw. Damages, 8th ed. §§ 817, 820; Walrath v. Redfield, 18 N. Y. 457, 462; Mairs v. Manhattan Real Estate Assn. 89 N. Y. 498; Durys v. New York, 96 N. Y. 477, 499; Homa Ins. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 11 Hun, 182, 188; Moore v. New York Elev. R. Co. 126 N. Y. 671; Pennsylvania S. V. R. Co. v. Ziemer, 124 Pa. 560.

There is a class of actions sounding in tort, in which interest is not allowable at all, such as assault and battery, slander, libel, seduction, false imprisonment, etc. There is another class in which the law gives interest on the loss as part of the damages, such as trover, trespass, replevin, etc.; and still a third class in which interest cannot be recovered as of right, but may be allowed § 4430, permitting the jury in actions of tort, if they shall think fit, to give damages in the nature of interest over and above the value of the property at the time of the conversion or seizure. State v. Harrington, 44 Mo. App. 297.

An attorney should not be charged with interest on a debt given him for collection, which is lost through his negligence. Rootes v. Stone, 2 Leigh, 650.

An attorney is not liable for interest on money collected by him until demand made by the party entitled to receive it, or until a wrongful conversion. Walpole v. Bishop, 81 Ind. 156.

An attorney is liable for interest on money collected for a client from the time of judicial demand, when the entire means of ascertaining the balance due his client is in his hands. Dwight v. Simon, 4 La. Ann. 490.

An attorney is liable for interest on money which he neglects to turn over to his client for an unreasonable time, even though no demand had been made for it. Chapman v. Surt, 77 Ill. 337.

An attorney who uses money collected for a client as his own, is liable for interest while he so used it. Manafield v. Wilkerson, 26 Iowa, 468.

On exemplary damages.

In a case of tort, where the law allows the jury in its discretion to award exemplary damages, interest cannot be allowed. Batteree v. Chapman, 79 Ga. 574.

In Wade v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 78 Mo. 362, an instruction that the jury might allow interest if they saw fit, on double the value of a bull killed on a railway track, through the company's neglect to erect and maintain proper fences and guards, was said to be erroneous, but that it was harmless, as the jury had not allowed interest.

Interest cannot be allowed on damages double the value of the stock killed on a railroad track through the company's neglect to provide a fence since the statute, (McCain's Stat. § 1289,) in fixing the damages, makes no provision for interest. Brentner v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 68 Iowa, 530.

Rate of interest.

In admiralty cases in the United States courts, the rate of interest allowed by the different states 18 L. R. A.

is not taken into consideration where interest is allowed, and no rule fixing a certain amount of interest upon a decree if affirmed in the supreme court can be adopted. Hemmenway v. Fisher, 61 U. S. 20 How. 255, 15 L. ed. 799.

In The Scotland, 105 U. S. 24, 28 L. ed. 1001, an action for causing the loss of a ship by collision on the high seas, six per cent was held to be the proper rate of interest.

In The Amiable Nancy, 16 U. S. 3 Wheat. 546, 4 L. ed. 456, an action for the unlawful seizure of a vessel as a prize, the district court allowed six per cent, and on appeal to the circuit court the judgment was reduced, interest allowed at the rate of ten per cent on damages allowed, and on appeal to the supreme court certain other items were added on which six per cent interest was allowed, nothing being said as to the rate allowed by the circuit court.

Interest at six, not seven, per cent, should be allowed on the value of barley shipped from Canada to New York city, and lost on the Hudson River by a collision. The Mary J. Vaughan, 2 Ben. 47.

In Mobile & M. R. Co. v. Jurey, 111 U. S. 584, 28 L. ed. 527, the defendant contended that the legal rate of interest in Louisiana, where a contract for the shipment of cotton destroyed by fire was to be performed, was the proper rate, instead of the rate in Alabama, where the contract was made, but as no proper exception had been taken the point was not decided.

In Erwin v. Neversink S. B. Co., 23 Hun, 578, it was held that interest at seven per cent, the legal rate of interest in New York at the time of an accident causing the death of the plaintiff's intestate, instead of at six per cent, the legal rate at the time of the verdict, was proper.

But in Salter v. Utica & B. R. R. Co., 86 N. Y. 401, six per cent was held to be the proper rate.

The holder of a note bearing interest at the rate of four per cent per month, secured by a mortgage, who, after assigning both note and mortgage, satisfies the mortgage of record and thus destroys the assignee's security, is liable for interest at the rate of seven per cent per annum not at the rate of four per cent per month. Sanborn v. Webster, 2 Minn. 823.

J. H. H.

in the discretion of the jury, according to the circumstances of the case. This action belongs to the latter class, and, as we have construed the charge as a direction that the jury might, in their discretion, allow interest on the diminished value of the horse, it was not erroneous.

Our attention has been called to the case of Sayre v. State, 128 N. Y. 291, and it is urged, upon the authority of that case, that interest cannot be allowed in any case for the recovery of unliquidated damages arising from negligence. We think that the case, when correctly understood, does not sustain the contention, but, in effect, holds the contrary. In that case a party appealed from the decision of the board of claims upon an award in his own favor, and the only question was whether, upon the evidence and findings the claimant had been allowed all the damages that he was entitled to, and this court not only affirmed his right to all the damages that the board had awarded him, but increased the award from $3,000 to $8,186. The claim was based upon the negligent act of the state in overflowing the lands of the claimant, from which the damages claimed resulted. The board of claims allowed no interest, nor did this court. In adding to the award a sum of over $5,000, this court acted, in some sense, as a court of original jurisdiction, and in making up the sum which was to constitute the final award it refused to allow an item of interest claimed. Now, it is admitted that a court or jury, charged with the duty of making up the amount of damages in such cases, may refuse to allow interest, and that is precisely what this court did, and nothing more, and therefore the case is in harmony with the rule above stated, and with the cases from which we have deduced it. It is far from holding that it is error when, in such a case, the jury, or the original court, after considering all the facts and circumstances bearing upon the loss, allows interest, in the exercise of discretion, as part of the indemnity to which the party is entitled. It simply recognized the rule that interest in such cases was not a matter of right, but of sound discretion, and held that the claimant was fully indemnified for his loss without adding interest. It is true that the learned judge who gave the opinion cited the cases arising upon contract in which it has been held that interest is not allowable, and remarked that he found no case justifying an allowance of interest. That was probably an inadvertence, but the decision refusing interest was right, though the reasons may have been based upon a principle applicable to another class of actions. It must be remembered that the court was not reviewing any question decided below in regard to interest, but seeking to make up for itself a new award from the items of the claim appearing in the record, and whatever was said by way of argument, and as the reason for throwing out an item of interest on a sum claimed to have been expended in restoring or reclaiming the land, cannot be considered as the judgment of the court on the question now under consideration. That question was not noticed in the 18 L. R. A.

argument, and was not involved in the case, except, perhaps, as a matter of discretion.

For these reasons the judgment should be affirmed.

All concur, except Earl, Ch. J., and Finch and Gray, JJ., dissenting.

v.

William A. BREWER et al., Exrs., etc., of Thomas Hope, Deceased, et al., Respts.

(.....N. Y.....)

1. Real estate is converted into personality by a provision of a will that the executors shall as soon as may be conveniently done after testator's death sell and convert into money all the real estate.
2. An unlawful perpetuity is not created by a provision that executors shall sell all the real estate as soon as may be conveniently done after testator's death.
3. A gift in trust to a charity in a foreign country in which the trustees are competent to take and hold and the trust is capable of being executed and enforced is not invalid because such a trust would contravene the law of the testator's domicile in respect to the creation of trusts and perpetuities.

(November 20, 1902.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for New York County in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to establish the invalidity of a certain clause in the will of Thomas Hope, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Delos McCurdy, with Messrs. Vanderpoel, Cuming & Goodwin, for appellant:

The validity of the gift of the residuary estate must be determined by the laws of this state.

A gift in futuro to an institution to be created and enabled to take after the death of the testator, has never been held to be a valid gift by the courts of this state unless such gift was, by its express terms, limited to take effect and

NOTE.—The oft-quoted rule that the validity of a testamentary gift of personal property is to be determined by the law of the testator's domicile is shown by the above case to be subject to a very important exception.

In Kerr v. Dougherty, 79 N. Y. 327, the bequest was a present unconditional gift to an existing corporation authorized to take, except in cases where the will was executed within one month before the death of the testator.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The general question presented by this appeal is the validity of the twenty-sixth or residuary clause of the will of Thomas Hope, who died on March 3, 1890, without issue. The will contains numerous bequests to collateral relatives, and to institutions and corporations for charitable purposes. By the residuary clause, all the rest, residue, and remainder of the testator's estate was devised and bequeathed to his executors and their survivors, in trust for the purpose of founding and endowing an infirmary for the care and relief of sick and infirm persons, to be established at the testator's native place of Langholm, in Dumfriesshire, Scotland. The testator directed his executors, as trustees, to promptly take all necessary and proper steps for procuring the incorporation and organization of this infirmary. He further directed that if within three years from his decease, and during the lives of the two executors and trustees named, or within the three years, and during the life of either of them, such infirmary was incorporated and organized, so as to be able to take the bequest, and should, in respect to its organization, purposes, and plan of management, be accepted as satisfactory by the trustees, or the survivor of them, then the trustees, or the survivor of them, should forthwith, or as soon as practicable, sell and convert into money all of the said property remaining unsold, and pay over the whole of said trust fund or estate to such infirmary, to have and to hold forever for its uses and purposes; but if an infirmary, in accordance with these provisions, should not be incorporated and organized and be accepted as satisfactory by the trustees, within three years after the testator's death, and during the life of the trustees, then the trustees, or the survivor, and his or their successor or successors, were directed to divide the whole of the said trust fund and estate among, and to pay it over to, such charitable institutions, then established and existing at Langholm, and competent to take the same, as the trustees should decide, and in such proportions as they or the survivor of them might think proper. The testator left both real and personal estate, and in a subsequent clause of the will the executors were directed to sell the real estate, and convert the same into money, as soon after the testator's death as convenient. The will bears date June 12, 1886, but the residuary clause was materially changed and modified by subsequent codicils. The first codicil, bearing date November 24, 1886, directed that, in case the trustees should meet with any difficulties or cause of delay in incorporating and organizing the infirmary, provided for in the will, they were authorized and directed, if lawful so to do, to realize the whole of the residuary estate, and pay the same over to three trustees in Scotland, named in the codicil, for the purpose of establishing and maintaining such infirmary, and the testator gives directions for the government of the institution and the investment of the fund. It is not necessary to make further reference to this codicil as it was substantially abrogated by another, bearing date October 24, 1888, and which furnishes the principal ground for this controversy.

The twenty-sixth or residuary clause of the will, as well as the first codicil, in so far as they relate to the founding and endowment of the infirmary in Scotland, were also changed and modified by this second codicil by substituting the following provision: "Instead of said institution being founded and endowed by said trustees in the manner therein mentioned, I direct them, as soon after my decease as they can conveniently do so, to realize all the rest, residue, and remainder of my said property and estate so bequeathed to them, and to pay, assign, and make over the whole proceeds thereof, when and as realized, to and in favor of William Elphinstone Malcolm, . . . George Maxwell, . . . and Robert Smellie, residing in Langholm aforesaid, . . . as trustees and in trust, to the end that they may apply the same in founding, endowing, and maintaining an institution for the care or relief of sick or infirm persons to be established and located at Langholm, my native place, . . . and to be called 'The Thomas Hope Hospital.'" These Scotch trustees and their successors are made perpetual governors of the hospital, and are directed and empowered to apply the funds to be received by them from the executors to the erection, completion, and organization of the hospital, and provision is made in great detail with respect to the investment of the fund and the application of the income. Power is also expressly conferred upon the governors of the institution to enact statutes and by-laws for its government, and to change or modify them, at their pleasure whenever in their judgment the object of the charity would be promoted thereby.

The particular beneficiaries of the trust, or the persons to be received and cared for in the hospital, are described by the testator in the codicil in the following language: "And I recommend and appoint the preferences of admission to the said hospital to be as follows, viz.: First, sick or infirm persons natives of and resident in the said town of Langholm, or the parish of Langholm, or such other parishes in the county of Dumfries as the said governors and trustees in Scotland may from time to time select and determine; second, sick or infirm persons, natives of or resident in said town or parishes as aforesaid; and I declare that the said governors and trustees in Scotland shall be the sole judges as to the eligibility of the persons to be admitted to the said hospital and benefits thereof, or to participate in this endowment, and shall likewise be the sole judges when any such sick or infirm person shall cease to be an inmate of said hospital, or be recipient of the funds of the endowment; and I empower the said governors and trustees in Scotland, at their discretion, and if the funds will admit thereof, to give and afford out of said revenues such assistance as they may think suitable to such sick, infirm, or aged persons in reduced circumstances, natives of or resident in the said town of Langholm, or parishes as aforesaid, as they may judge to be proper objects of this endowment, without the necessity of their being admitted to the said hospital."

The scheme of the original will contemplated the foundation, endowment, and management of the hospital by the executors as trustees. The codicil required the executors to convert the residuary estate into money, and pay the same over to the Scotch trustees, who were empowered to establish the institution and administer the charity. It has been found as a fact by the trial court, and is not now disputed, that this disposition of the residuary estate contained in the residuary clause of the will, and in the second codicil, is perfectly valid under the laws of Scotland. The foreign trustees are competent to take the fund and to administer the trust under Scotch law. The power and duty of the executors to convert the estate into money is thus expressed by the testator immediately following the residuary clause: "It is my will that my executors hereinafter named, as soon as may be conveniently done after my death, shall sell and convert into money all the real estate, of every name or nature, and wheresoever situated, of which I shall die seised, possessed, or entitled unto; and I hereby authorize and empower my said executors, and the survivor of them, to sell and dispose of said real estate at public or private sale at such time or times, and in such parcels, and upon such terms, and in such manner, as to them shall seem meet." This provision of the will operates to convert the real estate, of which Thomas Hope died seised, into personalty, and subjects it to the operation of the rules of law governing the devolution of personal property. Moncrief v. Ross, 50 N. Y. 431; Pouer v. Cassidy, 79 N. Y. 602, 35 Am. Rep. 550; Vincent v. Newhouse, 88 N. Y. 505; Asche v. Asche, 118 N. Y. 232; Fraser v. United Presby. Church Trustees, 124 N. Y. 479; Underwood v. Curtis, 127 N. Y. 523; Lent v. Howard, 89 N. Y. 169; Bispham, Eq. §§ 311, 312.

The plaintiff is the nephew of the testator, and one of the legatees under the will, and he brings this action to set aside as void the disposition of the residuary estate, contained in the twenty-sixth clause and the codicils, on the ground that the several provisions for the establishment of the infirmary or hospital are too indefinite and uncertain in their subjects and objects, and unlawfully suspend the power of alienation of real estate and the absolute ownership of personal property. The courts below have, in all respects, sustained the validity of the will and codicils, and the plaintiff alone appeals from the judgment. Although it appears that when the testator made the final provision contained in the second codicil for the establishment of a charity in his native place, he was temporarily residing at that place in Scotland, yet it is found that, at the time that the will and codicils were executed, he was domiciled in this state, and the will has been proved and established here. The scheme of the testator, as outlined in the residuary clause of the will, contemplated the creation of a corporation to hold the property and administer the charity, but in the second codicil the execution of the trust through a corporation to be created in the future seems to have been abandoned. The testator there finally provided that the Scotch trustees named should take and hold the fund, and apply it as trustees to the erection of proper buildings, upon land already purchased by the testator and conveyed to them as trustees, and to the furnishing of the same in a manner suitable for the purposes of the institution, and the income of the balance to be applied to the maintenance of the same. The three trustees and their successors in perpetuity were to be the governors and managers, and as such they were to hold and own the property for the purposes of the trust. The functions of the two executors with respect to the fund were administrative merely. They were to pay the debts and legacies and pay the residuary fund over to the Scotch trustees, and then their powers and duties terminated. Henceforth both the title and management of the fund was conferred by the will and codicil upon the foreign trustees. I am unable to see how the vesting of the estate was postponed, or the absolute ownership suspended, in consequence of any power or duty conferred upon the executor for any period of time whatever. The payment of the bequest of the residuary estate to the trustees in Scotland was to be made by the executors as soon and when the same was converted into money. The fact that such conversion might require a period of time, not measured by lives, does not create an unlawful perpetuity. It was said in Robert v. Corning, 89 N. Y. 225, that such result is accomplished only when there are no persons in being by whom an absolute fee in possession can be conveyed, and that a discretionary power conferred upon executors, with respect to the time of sale, did not suspend the power of sale or the absolute ownership. It was within the legal power of the executors to convert the whole estate into money the day after their appointment and qualification, and to pay over the residuary fund to the foreign trustees, and this fact would seem to constitute a sufficient answer to the contention that the absolute ownership was suspended, by reason of any power or duty conferred upon the executors.

Reference has already been made to the language of the will and codicil, wherein the testator undertook to specify and define the persons who were to be the recipients of his charity or the beneficiaries of the trust. There is no defined beneficiary either named or capable of being ascertained within the rules of law applicable to such cases in order to constitute a valid testamentary trust under the law of this state. The words, "sick, infirm, or aged persons in reduced circumstances," within a certain town or parish, or within such other towns and parishes, in a certain county as the governors of the institution might from time to time select and determine, are entirely too vague and indefinite to satisfy the rule, with respect to the beneficiaries of a trust, which prevails in this state. Fordick v. Hempstead, 125 N. Y. 581, 11 L. R. A. 715; Holland v. Alcock, 108 N. Y. 312. The principle upon which this rule is founded, or at least one of the reasons for the rule, is that such a trust is incapable of enforcement, and in some of the cases there was no trustee competent to take. Here, however, the trustees are competent to take and hold the fund, and the execution of the trust does not depend upon the will of the trustees, but upon the law of the country where the testator directed the fund to be used, and the power of its courts over the trustees in the application and management of the property. The fund can lawfully be held, and the will of the donor fully carried out, at the place where he intended to found the charity, and in the manner prescribed by him.

This brings us to the important question in this case, whether the courts of this state are required in such a case to interpose our own laws with respect to the requisites of valid testamentary trust in order to defeat the disposition which the testator has made of his property, and which is perfectly valid where he intended the gift to take effect. In the great variety of cases bearing upon the validity of trusts of this character, and in the manifold aspects in which questions growing out of such dispositions of property have arisen and been presented to the courts, it is not, perhaps, surprising that, in some of the opinions of the courts, dicta, expressed in general language, may be found giving support to the plaintiff's contention. But I have not been able to find any well-considered case, in which the question was directly involved, where a gift to a foreign charity in trust, contained in a valid testamentary instrument, has been held void, where there was a trustee competent to take and hold, and the trust was capable of being executed and enforced, according to the law of the place to which the property was to be transmitted under the will of the donor. The law of this state inhibiting the creation of trusts not expressly authorized by statute, and the suspension of the power of alienation of real estate, and the absolute ownership of personal property, is founded upon a public policy of our own. It was said of the English Statute of Mortmain that its object was political, and intended to have but a local operation. It was enacted to prevent what was deemed a public mischief, and not to regulate, as between ancestor and heir, the power of disposing by will, or to prescribe, as between grantor and grantee, the forms of alienation. It is an incident only, and with reference to a particular object, that the exercise of the owner's dominion over the property is abridged. The restraints which the statutes imposed upon owners of property had reference to a mischief existing in England only. Atty-Gen. v. Stewart, 2 Meriv. 143. Statutes of a kindred nature, enacted in this state and in the various states of the Union, whatever their form, were intended to operate within and promote the welfare of the people of each particular state, and it was not contemplated that they should have any extraterritorial effect. It is not a matter of any public concern whatever to this state whether the personal property of a person domiciled here shall pass to his heirs or next of kin in a foreign country, or to trustees in trust for charity residing there, or even to a foreign corporation for purposes of charity. Vansant v. Roberts, 8 Md. 119.

Our law with respect to the creation of trusts, the suspension of the power of alienation of real estate and the absolute ownership of personal, was designed only to regulate the holding of property under our laws and in our state, and a trust intended to take effect in another state, or in a foreign country, would not seem to be within either its letter or spirit. When a citizen of this state, or a person domiciled here, makes a gift of personal estate to foreign trustees for the purpose of a foreign charity, our courts will not interpose our local laws with respect to trusts and accumulations to arrest the disposition made by the owner of his property but will inquire as to two things: First, whether all the forms and requisites necessary to constitute a valid testamentary instrument, under our law, have been complied with; and, second, whether the foreign trustees are competent to take the gift, for the purposes expressed, and to administer the trust under the law of the country where the gift was to take effect; or, as Judge Rapallo stated the rule with respect to gifts to charity generally, the inquiry is "whether the grantor or deviser of a fund designed for charity is competent to give, and whether the organized body is endowed by law with capacity to receive and to hold and administer the gift." Holland v. Alcock, 108 N. Y. 337. In this case the testator was unquestionably competent to give, and did make the gift under all the forms and requisites necessary to constitute a valid testamentary disposition. So were the trustees to whom the gift was made, competent to take and administer it, under Scotch law, and the only question is whether we must defeat the gift and frustrate the intentions of the testator because he neglected to observe, in all respects, the rules of our local law with regard to the creation of trusts and perpetuities.

Unless we are concluded upon this question by established principles of law, there is no reason growing out of the facts surrounding the case, or founded upon public policy, for diverting the property into channels not contemplated by the testator. It is no doubt true that the validity of a disposition of personal property at the domicile of the owner is generally the test of its validity in other jurisdictions. But this rule, I apprehend, only requires compliance with forms and with principles of law generally or universally recognized as essential to the transfer or transmission of property. If personal property is disposed of by will, and in trust for charity, to take effect in another country, no good reason is apparent for insisting that a full compliance with the local law of the domicile, with respect to the form or duration of the trust, or the definition of the beneficiaries, is necessary to the validity of the disposition. Such laws are not generally regarded as limitations upon the power of the owner to transfer or transmit the property, but regulations applicable to the holding of property in the particular community, founded upon political or social considerations. In Cross v. United States Trust Co., 131 N. Y. 330, 15 L. R. A. 606, we held that a disposition of personal property by will and in the form of a trust, to be executed in this state, made by a person domiciled in another state, valid at the place of the domicile, was valid here, though the absolute ownership of the property was suspended for a period longer than is permitted by our statute. The principal ground of that decision was that our courts were required, under the doctrine of comity, to recognize a disposition of personal property made in another state as valid, if valid there, and not in its nature unlawful, or against public policy. In the creation of the trust our statute in regard to perpetuities was disregarded, but we held that it did not apply to a will made by a person who was domiciled in another state. In order to sustain this will, we must go a step further, and hold another, but a kindred, proposition, namely, that a disposition of personal property made in this state, by a competent testator, in a valid testamentary instrument, to trustees in a foreign country, for the purposes of a charity to be established in that country, is valid, although not in compliance with our statute or the rules of law in force here in regard to trusts and perpetuities, providing it is valid by the law of the place where the gift is to take effect, and which governs the trustees and the property when transmitted there. If our statute, as I have attempted to show, does not apply to such a case, then there is nothing in the way of the validity of such a disposition of property. The question has been often referred to in this court, and though the precise question was not involved, the expressions of opinion are in favor of sustaining this will. In the leading case of Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 48 N. Y. 424, Allen, J., discussing the question, said: "The courts of this state will not administer a foreign charity, but they will direct money devoted to it to be paid over to the proper parties, leaving it to the courts of the state within which the charity is to be established, to provide for its due administration and for the proper application of the legacy. Hill, Trustees, 468; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 480; Edinburgh v. Aubery, Amb. 236; Burbank v. Whitney, 24 Pick. 154, 35 Am. Dec. 812; Atty-Gen. v. Lepine, 2 Swanst. 181. . . . A gift by will of a citizen of this state to a charity or upon a trust to be administered in a sister state which would be lawful in this state, the domicile of the donor, would not be sustained, if it was not in accordance with the laws of the state in which the fund was to be administered. Bequests in aid of foreign charities, valid and legal in the place of their existence, will be supported by the courts of the state in which the bequests are made. Hill, Trustees, 457. If the legatee, whether a natural or artificial person, and whether he takes in his own right or in trust, is capable, by the law of his domicile, to take the legacy in the capacity and for the purposes for which it is given, and the bequest is in other respects valid, it will be sustained irrespective of the law of the testator's domicile. . . . It is no part of the policy of the state of New York to interdict perpetuities or gifts in mortmain in Pennsylvania or California. Each state determines these matters according to its own views of policy or right, and no other state has any interest in the question, and there is no reason why the courts of this state should follow the funds bequeathed to the Centenary Fund Society to Pennsylvania to see whether they will be there administered in all respects in strict harmony with our policy and our laws. The question was before the court in Fordyce v. Bridges, 2 Phil. Ch. 497, upon the bequest of a fund in England to be invested in a Scotch entail. Lord Cottenham says: 'An objection was made that the bequest of a fund, to be invested in a regular Scotch entail, was void as a perpetuity. The rules acted upon by the courts of this country, with respect to testamentary disposition tending to perpetuities, relate to this country only. What the law of Scotland may be upon such a subject the courts of this country have no judicial knowledge, nor will they, I apprehend, inquire. The fund being to be administered in a foreign country is payable here, though the purposes to which it is to be applied would have been illegal, if the administration of the fund had been to take place in this country. This is exemplified by the well-established rule in cases of bequests within the Statute of Mortmain. A charity legacy void in this country under the Statute of Mortmain is good and payable here, if for a charity in Scotland.' To the same effect is Vansant v. Roberts, 8 Md. 119.

In the case of Manice v. Manice, 43 N. Y. 303, Judge Rapallo, discussing the validity of a bequest by a person domiciled in this state to Yale College, said: "The direction to pay to the treasurer is a good gift to the college, the college having been shown to be capable of taking. Emery v. Hill, 1 Russ. 112; De Witt v. Chandler, 11 Abb. Pr. 459; Hornbeck v. American Bible Soc. 2 Sandf. Ch. 133, 7 L. R. A. 587. The college is a foreign corporation, it being authorized by the laws of its own state to take. . . ." After discussing the question whether the words of the will were sufficient to create a trust, the learned judge continued: "These are questions, however, which must necessarily be determined by the courts of the state in which the corporation legatee is situated. The fund is to go there, and be there administered. The will of the testator, so far as the courts of this state can act upon it, it fully executed when the money is paid to the proper officer of the foreign corporation; and there is no law of this state prohibiting gifts to such foreign corporation. Though the laws of the state of that corporation may permit it to hold and administer property in perpetuity, or to accumulate it, the local policy of this state upon that subject is not interfered with by allowing property of our citizens to pass to such foreign corporation, and be administered by it in such foreign state according to its own laws. Fordyce v. Bridges, 10 Beav. 105, 2 Phil. Ch. 497; Vansant v. Roberts, 3 Md. 119; Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, 43 N. Y. 424.

The same doctrine was approved in the subsequent case of Despard v. Churchill, 53 N. Y. 192, and property in this state of a testator in California was remitted to that state, to be administered under the will, notwithstanding it was devoted to the purposes of a trust which would have been unlawful in this state, though valid there. We have recently held that a bequest of the residuary estate of a testator domiciled here to a municipality in the German empire was valid, it appearing that the municipality had capacity by the law of the place to take and hold the gift. Re Huss, 126 N. Y. 537, 12 L. R. A. 620. See also Kerr v. Dougherty, 79 N. Y. 827; Hollis v. Drew Theological Seminary, 95 N. Y. 166.

We have examined the cases cited by the learned counsel for the plaintiff in support of his contention. They contain general expressions of the rule that a testamentary disposition of property invalid at the domicile of the owner is invalid everywhere, and indeed, this rule is stated in some of the cases to which I have referred, and, as a general principle, cannot be questioned. But when it is said that such a disposition is invalid everywhere if invalid at the domicile, the rule refers to some defect in the execution of the instrument, the capacity of the testator, the legal construction of the instrument, the form or object of the disposition, and not to the noncompliance, in framing the terms of the trust, with a local statute or rule of law regulating the holding of property by the citizens of the state or country where the will was made, and which had no extraterritorial force. Perhaps the strongest case in support of the plaintiff's view is that of Bascom v. Albertson, 34 N. Y. 587. In that case there was a bequest of the residuary estate by a testator in this state to five unnamed persons as trustees, to be appointed by the Supreme Court of the state of Vermont, to found and establish an institution in that state for the education of females. This bequest was held to be void. The discussion in this court proceeded almost entirely upon the question whether it could be sustained under the English doctrine of charitable uses sanctioned by a majority of the court in Williams v. Williams, 8 N. Y.

525, and it was held that it could not. The case differs from the one at bar in, at least, one important particular. The testator failed to appoint trustees competent to take, and it did not appear that those appointed by the action of the judges of the Supreme Court of Vermont could take or hold, or that the trust could be administered, under the laws of that state. Besides, the views expressed in the prevailing opinion, in so far as they are in conflict with the judgment now under review, must be deemed to be modified by the subsequent cases of Chamberlain v. Chamberlain, Manice v. Manice, and Despard v. Churchill, supra. Our conclusion is that, even if it be assumed that the bequest of the residuary estate to the Scotch trustees, in trust for the purpose of founding and maintaining the hospital, should be held void under our law for the reason that the absolute ownership of personal property is unlawfully suspended, or that the beneficiaries of the trust are not sufficiently specified or defined, still that does not render the disposition invalid, as these objections do not apply to a gift in trust to be administered in Scotland, and perfectly valid there. This result, I think, is in harmony with the general tendency of courts to sustain testamentary dispositions of property when it fairly can be done under the rules of law, and in accordance with principles of enlightened justice.

The judgment should therefore be affirmed, with costs to the executors, the foreign trustees, and the plaintiff, payable out of the estate.

All concur.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

SAN GABRIEL VALLEY LAND & WATER CO., Respt.,

v.

WITMER BROTHERS CO., Appt.

(.....Cal..... ..)

1. The validity of a tax upon a mortgage interest in land cannot be questioned by the mortgagee on the ground that the description in the assessment varies from that in the mortgage, where the land has been divided into lots and blocks and the assessment description complies substantially with the statutory requirements as to the assessment of a mortgage interest in such property and is sufficiently particular and certain to afford the mortgagee the means of identification without being misled although the mortgage describes the property with reference to the government survey.
2. Statutory permission to the mortgagor to pay the taxes levied on the mortgage interest and deduct the amount from the mortgage debt does not make that remedy exclusive, but in case he pays the mortgage debt in full and is afterwards compelled to pay such taxes to relieve his property from their lien he may recover their amount from the mortgagee.

3. The assessment book is prima facie evidence not only of the assessment of all taxes required by statute to be levied by the supervisors and to appear therein including road and school taxes, and of their amount, but also of the fact that all forms of law in relation to the assessment and levy have been complied with and consequently of their validity, under Pol. Code, § 3739.

4. Mere assignment of a mortgage before the levy of the tax upon the mortgage interest will not discharge the obligation of the assignor to pay the tax if the assignment was made after the date which the statute fixes for its assessment.

der denying motion for new trial, in an action brought to recover taxes which had been assessed to defendant but paid by plaintiff in order to relieve his property from their lien. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. P. W. Dooner, for appellant:

Describing the property assessed as "blocks 1 to 44 of the town of East San Gabriel" while the mortgage description was the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of S. 18, T. 1 S., R. 12 W., S. B. M. was not sufficient.

People v. Mahoney, 55 Cal. 286; People v. Cons, 48 Cal. 427; People v. Flint, 39 Cal. 670; Keane v. Cannovan, 21 Cal. 802; Lachman v. Clark, 14 Cal. 181; People v. Empire G. & S. Min. Co. 33 Cal. 171; People v. Pearis, 37 Cal. 259.

The assessment roll is simply prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein and it is properly in evidence for what it is worth with that limitation.

Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1920.

It is not to the form, as provided by the Code, that appellant objects, but it is to the substantial matter supplied by the assessor.

Cal. Pol. Code, § 8651; People v. San Francisco Soc. Union, 81 Cal. 182.

There is no evidence, by stipulation or otherwise, either of equalization or levy under the assumed assessment, but the burden is on the plaintiff to show a complete case, and upon the authority of People v. Castro, 39 Cal. 65, plaintiff might have been nonsuited.

Pierce v. Law, 51 Cal. 580; People v. Hastings, 29 Cal. 449; People v. Waterman, 31 Cal. 412.

Of course the validity of special school or road tax is not determinable by the assessment roll.

Section 8789 expressly limits the sufficiency of an assessment roll as prima facie evidence to the roll "showing unpaid taxes." It is the "delinquent" roll to which the section refers, and we are not dealing with that. Hence the assessment roll as evidence, in any other than a delinquent tax suit, must be interpreted under the rules as laid down by section 1920, Cal. Code Civ. Proc. Such interpretation, it will be observed, would not countenance the inference that an assessment is constructively correct in a case where its sufficiency does not appear.

People v. Castro, supra; Cal. Pol. Code, §§ 1830-1839, 2651-2655, 3789.

There is no evidence at all that any of the provisions of the statute authorizing the assessment or levy of school or of road tax have been complied with.

People v. Castro, supra; People v. Seale, 52 Cal. 71, 620; People v. San Luis Obispo County Supra, 50 Cal. 561.

In certain actions the assessment roll is expressly made prima facie evidence of due assessment, but it is plain that the creation of such exceptional instances confirms the contrary as the rule.

The power of taxation must be exercised by the Legislature within the limitations of the Constitution. The taking of other property than that assessed to satisfy a personal liability is no part of the mode.

If the Act merely imposes a tax upon property and provides a particular process for enforcement, as a sale of the property, no suit can be brought against the person to collect the tax.

Reeve v. Kennedy, 43 Cal. 643.

If the plaintiff upon paying the mortgage debt desired to avail itself of the statutory remedy (Cal. Pol. Code, § 8627), it could only do so against the State Loan & Trust Company, the owner and holder of the security, not against parties no longer entitled to receive the debts or discharge the mortgage.

The assignment to the trust company carried the security.

Cal. Civ. Code, 2986.

The trust company became the owner by the assignment.

Id. § 3124; Reeve v. Kennedy, supra.

The plaintiff paid over to the trust company on the 24th day of July, 1890, money in excess of what the trust company was entitled to demand or receive, and which was then the money of plaintiff and in its possession and under its control, not due owing to the trust company and need not have been paid.

The Code further provides that every tax has the effect of a judgment against the person, and the force and effect of an execution duly levied against all property of the delinquent. And this judgment is not satisfied until the taxes are paid, and the lien upon the property is not removed until payment of the taxes, or sale of property for such payment.

The owner of the property to whom the same has been assessed for taxation is personally liable for the payment of the taxes levied thereon, and a personal action may be maintained against him for the recovery of such taxes.

People v. Seymour, 16 Cal. 841, 76 Am. Dec. 521; Guy v. Washburn, 28 Cal. 116; People v. Todd, 28 Cal. 182; Oakland v. Whipple, 89 Cal. 114; San Francisco Gas Co. v. Brickwedel, 63 Cal. 645; San Luis Obispo County v. Hendricks, 71 Cal. 245.

There is no provision in the statute that the payment of the mortgage debt shall release the person to whom such mortgage interest is taxed from this personal liability, or from the effect of this personal judgment, or free any of the property from the lien of the tax levied.

Appellant was legally bound to pay this tax. The tax was a lien on respondent's land; and, if respondent had not paid it, it would have become delinquent, the charges upon the land would have been increased, and the land would have been liable to be sold under legal process for the payment of the delinquent tax.

Respondent had no alternative but to lose its land or pay the tax.

Where the plaintiff is compelled to pay the defendant's debt in consequence of his neglect or omission to do so, the law implies that the defendant requested the plaintiff to make the payment for him, and gives him the action for money paid.

Chitty, Cont. 8th Am. ed. 518; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 108; Bailey v. Buasing, 28 Conn. 455; Nichols v. Bucknam, 117 Mass. 491; Hogg v. Longstreth, 97 Pa. 255.

In order to save its property from being sold on legal process, it was compelled to pay money which the appellant ought to have paid. The common law, as we have shown, gave in such a case a right of action in assumption. When the right existed at the common law, the plaintiff might pursue either remedy, the statutory one being regarded merely as cumulative.

Per Curiam:

When this case was pending in department, an opinion was prepared by Commissioner Vanclef. After full consideration in bank, we adopt that opinion, and the conclusion therein reached; and for the reasons therein given the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed. The said opinion is as follows:

"The plaintiff having paid the taxes, amounting to $185.12, assessed to the defendant on its mortgage interest in land, brought this action in a justice's court to recover the sum so paid from the defendant. The cause was properly transferred to the superior court for trial, and judgment passed for plaintiff. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The material facts found by the court and stipulated by the parties are as follows: One Sanborn, being the owner of two hundred and forty acres of land, situate in Los Angeles county, mortgaged the same on the 14th day of March, 1887, to Hall and Stilson to secure the payment of $20,000, and the mortgage was duly recorded. On May 7, 1888, Hall and Stilson assigned the mortgage and debt thereby secured to the defendant, and defendant continued to own them until June 7, 1889, when it assigned them to the State Loan & Trust Company, a corporation. Before the taxes were assessed upon the land or mortgage for the year 1889, the plaintiff became the owner of the land subject to the mortgage, and divided it into blocks and lots. While the defendant was the owner of the mortgage, to wit, on March 4, 1889, the taxes in question were assessed to defendant on its mortgage interest. On July 24, 1889, the plaintiff, as successor in interest of the mortgagor, paid the mortgage debt in full to the State Loan & Trust Company, without any deduction or provision on account of the taxes on the mortgage interest assessed to defendant. On December 19, 1889, the tax collector demanded the taxes ($185.12) of the defendant by sending it a bill for the amount. On the following day the defendant inclosed the bill in a letter to the plaintiff, stating that it (defendant) had no interest in the mortgaged premises. Thereupon the plaintiff requested the defendant to pay the taxes assessed to it, but defendant refused, and failed to pay the same or any part thereof. On December 30, 1889, the plaintiff, to prevent the taxes from becoming delinquent, and to remove the lien thereof from its land, paid them.

"1. The validity of the tax is questioned upon the ground that the description of the mortgaged land varies essentially from that contained in the mortgage. The mortgage describes it as 'the northwest quarter, and the west half of the northeast quarter, of section thirteen, (13,) township one (1) south, of range twelve (12) west, of the San Bernardino meridian, containing two hundred and forty (240) acres.' As the land had been divided by plaintiff into blocks and town lots before the assessment of the taxes for 1889, it is so described in the assessment book. It is agreed, however, that the blocks and lots assessed to the defendant constitute the identical land described in the mortgage, and no more; and that the assessment was in substantial conformity with the requirements of section 8651 of the Political Code, and in proper form for the assessment of a mortgage interest in town lots. As the taxes were paid before they became delinquent, they were not increased by costs of advertisement or sale in lots. I think the assessment described the mortgaged land in accordance with the statute, and with such particularity and certainty as to afford the defendant the means of identification, and so as not to mislead him. This was sufficient. Cooley, Taxn. 282-286.

"2. It is claimed that respondent's exclusive remedy was to deduct the amount of the taxes from the mortgage at the time of payment, on the basis of the levy of the preceding year, in pursuance of section 3627 of the Political Code. But the statute giving that privilege is permissive, and not mandatory, in its terms. It has been expressly decided by the circuit court of the United States for the district of California that, under section 4, art. 13, of the Constitution of California of 1879, it is the duty of the mortgagee, and not of the mortgagor, to pay the taxes levied on the mortgage interest; that the Constitution and statute give the mortgagor the right to pay the tax, and deduct it from the debt; but that he is not bound to do so; and that if the mortgagee dispute the tax, and decline to allow it, and the whole mortgage debt is paid by the mortgagor, without deduction of the tax, the mortgagor, if afterwards compelled to pay it to relieve his property of the lien, may recover the amount paid from the mortgagee, whose debt it is. Blythe v. Luning, 7 Sawy. 506, 507, 14 Fed. Rep. 281. The principle of this decision is in accordance with the well-settled rule, that, 'where the plaintiff, either by compulsion of law, or to relieve himself from liability, or to save himself from damage, has paid money, not officiously, which the defendant ought to have paid, a count in assumpsit for money paid will be supported.' Bailey v. Bussing, 28 Conn. 462; Exall v. Partridge, 8 T. R. 310. In such case, 'the law implies a request on the defendant's part, and a promise to repay, and the plaintiff has the same right of action as if he had paid the money at the defendant's express request.' Nichols v. Bucknam, 117 Mass. 491; Nutter v. Sydenstricker, 11 W. Va. 535. The right of contribution or reimbursement for money necessarily paid for another's benefit does not necessarily depend upon contract, but may arise from the equity of the case. Freem. Co-ten. § 322. See also Hay v. Hill, 65 Cal. 383.

"3. It is also insisted that there is no proof of the validity of the 'road-tax' or of the 'special school-tax' which were included in the sum sued for. Each of these is required to be levied by the supervisors and to appear upon the assessment book, (Pol. Code, §§ 1887, 2654;) and the assessment book itself is prima facie evidence, not only of the assessment and of the amount of the unpaid taxes but of also the fact that all the forms of law in relation to the assessment and levy have been complied with, (Pol. Code, § 3789; Modoc County v. Churchill, 75 Cal. 172.) The assessment book in due form was in evidence, and there was no evidence tending to overcome the prima facie case proved by it.

"4. It is further claimed that the liability of the defendant to pay the tax was discharged by his assignment of the mortgage before the levy of the tax. But the law required the mortgage to be assessed to the person who owned it on the first Monday of March, (Pol. Code, §§ 3627, 3628;) and such person could not escape the obligation to pay the tax by mere assignment of the mortgage. The personal obligation to pay taxes does not depend upon the continued ownership of the property assessed until after the levy of the tax, or until the time for payment arrives.

"I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

"We concur: Belcher, C.; Fitzgerald, C."

Harrison, J., dissenting:

1. Although the interest in the land represented by the mortgage was assessed as of the first Monday of March, 1889, and the tax which was afterwards levied upon that interest became by relation a lien upon the land as of that date, yet until the tax was levied there was no liability or obligation for its payment created against either the property or its owner. This tax was levied on the first Monday in October of that year, (Pol. Code, § 3714;) but prior to that date the plaintiff had paid the mortgage debt and caused the mortgage to be canceled. The Constitution, (article 13, § 4,) and the statute passed in pursuance thereof, (Pol. Code, § 3827,) authorizing the assessment of a tax upon the mortgage, provide that, "if the owner of the property shall pay the tax so levied on such security, it shall constitute a payment thereon, and to the extent of such payment a free discharge thereof; provided that, if any such security or indebtedness shall be paid by any such debtor or debtors after assessment and before the tax levy, the amount of such levy may likewise be retained by such debtor or debtors, and shall be computed according to the tax levy for the preceding year." There is no provision in the Constitution or statute which gives to the mortgagor the right to be reimbursed for this payment in any other mode, and under the familiar rule that, when the right and the remedy are purely statutory, the remedy provided by the statute is the only mode of preserving the right, if the plaintiff would insist upon this right he should have deducted the amount of the tax from the debt at the time that he paid the debt. In the absence of the constitutional provision there would be no obligation upon the mortgagee, as between him and the owner of the land, to pay the tax upon the mortgage, and the owner of the land would not be able to compel such payment by him. The obligation created by such tax exists only in favor of the state, and the tax is a charge upon the property against which it is assessed, and not a personal obligation against the mortgagor. With the exception of poll-taxes, taxes are always levied upon property, and not against individuals, and the mortgage tax is a tax upon the security, and not against the mortgagee. The mortgage is made by the Constitution "an interest in the property affected thereby," and the entire tax against the property is divided between the mortgagee and the owner. The provision that the value of the security shall be assessed and taxed to the "owner thereof" creates no different obligation upon the mortgagee from that which is created upon the owner of the property by the provision requiring the value of the property to be taxed to the "owner of the property." The tax is not a debt, and there is no personal obligation created by it. It is a burden imposed by the state upon property within its limits; but that burden is a charge against the property, and not against the individuals who own the property, and follows the property through all changes in its ownership, and is eventually paid by the individual who is the owner when the tax is collected. "A debt is a sum of money due by contract, express or implied. A tax is a charge upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes; it is not founded upon contract; it does not establish the relation of debtor and creditor between the tax-payer and the state; it does not draw interest; it is not the subject of attachment, and it is not liable to set-off. It owes its existence to the action of the legislative power, and does not depend for its validity or enforcement upon the individual assent of the tax-payer. It operates in invitum." Perry v. Washburn, 20 Cal. 350. Nor is its character affected by the fact that the statute authorizes a personal action to be brought for its recovery. Such procedure is merely the statutory method prescribed for its collection, and does not create a debt or personal obligation against the individual to whom it is assessed. Meriwether v. Garrett, 103 U. S. 514, 26 L. ed. 205. In the absence of statutory authority, an action for the recovery of a tax cannot be maintained; (Camden v. Allen, 26 N. J. L. 393;) whereas, if the tax was a debt or personal obligation, its collection could be enforced by suit without statutory authority. See also Augusta v. North, 57 Me. 392; Shaw v. Peckett, 26 Vt. 482; Peirce v. Boston, 8 Met. 520.

2. The taxes levied against the property are divided between the mortgagee and the owner, and become a lien upon both the land and the security as of the first Monday in March, and remain a lien thereon until paid. If the owner of the land parts with the property during that period, he is exonerated from any liability to the state for the payment of this tax, and the individual who is the owner of the land when the tax becomes payable must discharge the lien, if he would save it from sale by the collector. The purchaser may protect himself against this lien by proper covenants in the deed from his grantor, as he would against any other lien or incumbrance; but if his conveyance is a naked quitclaim, he cannot call upon his vendor for remuneration for the amount of the tax so paid, any more than for the payment of any other incumbrance which was not a personal obligation against the vendor. The tax against the mortgage is in all respects identical in character with the tax against the land. It is levied and assessed in the same manner and at the same time, is a lien upon the same property, and collected by the same means. The same results, therefore, must follow the transfer of the security as follow the transfer of the land. The vendor is thereby absolved from all obligations for the tax previously levied thereon, and when the tax is payable it must be paid by the individual who is at the time the owner of the security. By the transfer all relations between the mortgagee and the owner of the land terminate, and the assignee of the mortgage is substituted in the place of the mortgagee, with all the rights and obligations previously resting upon the mortgagee. The provision in the Constitution that "the taxes so levied may be paid by either party to such security" refers to this assignee, and not to the original mortgagee.

It is only the "owner" of the security that is permitted to pay the tax levied upon the property, and have the amount so paid become a part of the debt secured, but, if the original mortgagee to whom the mortgage has been assessed has assigned the mortgage, he is not the "owner" of the security, or of any debt to be increased by the payment of such tax, and consequently is not the "party" to the security referred to in the above provision of the Constitution. For the same reasons the provision in the Constitution that a payment by the owner of the property of the tax levied on the security shall constitute a payment thereon, and to the extent of such payment a full discharge thereof, is applicable only to the holder of the mortgage in case of an assignment, and not to the original mortgagee. Consequently, if such payment be made by the owner of the property after assessment and before the tax levy, his right to reimbursement can be enforced only against the holder of the mortgage, and not against the original mortgagee, and only in the mode pointed out in the Constitution.

8. If it can be maintained that, by virtue of his relations to the land, there was an implied obligation upon the mortgagee to discharge the lien thereon created by the tax upon his security, that obligation by the transfer of the security became only a secondary obligation upon him. The primary obligation for the tax is upon the security itself, and the owner of that security is the individual to whom the owner of the land must look primarily for the discharge of the lien. The Constitution refers to him alone, and the provision that, if the debtor pays the indebtedness "after assessment and before the tax levy," the amount of the tax may be "retained" by him, implies that he must "retain" it from the holder of the security, or lose the right to proceed against any other person for reimbursement. The owner of the land, having in his custody this fund—the mortgage debt—out of which to discharge the lien of the tax, must, in equity, apply it to that purpose, or lose any right he may have to resort to other securities. The most favorable position which the owner can claim that the original mortgagee holds towards him in reference to this mortgage tax is that he is under some obligation to ultimately discharge this lien, but this is only the position of a surety, and as a surety he is entitled to have this fund applied to the payment of the tax, or be discharged therefrom. Civ. Code, §§ 2840, 2849. The payment by the plaintiff of the mortgage debt, without making any deduction for the mortgage tax, was a voluntary surrender by him of a security which he held for the purpose of protecting himself and his property against the burden of the tax, and such payment must be regarded as a release by him of any liability which he would claim against the defendant. In Blythe v. Luning, 7 Sawy. 506, 14 Fed. Rep. 281, the mortgagor sought to avail himself of the very remedy pointed out by the Constitution, by deducting the estimated amount of the mortgage tax, but the mortgagee refused to cancel the mortgage, except upon payment of the full amount of the mortgage debt. In that case the mortgagor and mortgagee were the respective owners of the land and of the security at the time of the assessment, as well as at the time of the payment, and there was no question presented involving the right or liability of any other person than the mortgagor and mortgagee, and the court held that the payment of the tax by the mortgagor, under the circumstances of that case, was made under duress, and could be recovered in an action therefor. In my opinion, the judgment and order should be reversed.

Paterson, J.:

I concur in the views expressed by Harrison, J.

There having been a rehearing, on December 2, 1892, the following opinions were handed down:

Per Curiam:

After further consideration, we adhere to the opinion heretofore prepared by Commissioner Vanciel, and adopted by the court at the former hearing, (29 Pac. Rep. 500,) and for the reasons stated in that opinion the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Harrison, J.:

I dissent upon the reasons stated by me at the former decision of the case.

Beatty, Ch. J.:

I dissent. The case turns altogether upon the meaning of section 4, art. 13, of the Constitution, which reads as follows: "Sec. 4. A mortgage, deed of trust, contract, or other obligation by which a debt is secured, shall, for the purposes of assessment and taxation, be deemed and treated as an interest in the property affected thereby. Except as to railroad and other quasi corporations, in case of debts so secured, the value of the property affected by such mortgage, deed of trust, contract, or obligation, less the value of such security shall be assessed and taxed to the owner of the property, and the value of such security shall be assessed and taxed to the owner thereof, in the county, city, or district in which the property affected is situated. The taxes so levied shall be a lien upon the property and security, and may be paid by either party to such security. If paid by the owner of the security, the tax so levied upon the property affected thereby shall become a part of the debt so secured; if the owner of the property shall pay the tax so levied on such security, it shall constitute a payment thereon, and, to the extent of such payment, a full discharge thereof: provided, that, if any such security or indebtedness shall be paid by any such debtor or debtors, after assessment and before the tax levy, the amount of such levy may likewise be retained by such debtor or debtors, and shall be computed according to the tax levy for the preceding year." This section of the Constitution not only defines the reciprocal rights and obligations of mortgagor and mortgagee with respect to the payment of the taxes assessed or assessable against their respective interests in the mortgaged premises, but was evidently intended to provide a simple and effective remedy for their enforcement. As security for the collection of the whole tax on both interests, the state reserves to itself a first lien upon the land, — a lien superior to the mortgage lien. To secure the mortgagee for taxes paid on the mortgagor's interest, the effect of these provisions is a virtual transfer to him of the claim and lien of the state by tacking it to the mortgage. But, the whole section being intended mainly for the benefit of the mortgagor, we find, as we should naturally expect to find, that especial pains have been taken to secure the enforcement of his right. His land being subjected to a lien in favor of the state, not only for the tax which it is his duty to pay, but also for the tax which it is the duty of the mortgagee to pay, he must, for his own protection, see that both are discharged. It is therefore provided that he may pay the tax on the mortgagee's interest, and that such payment shall count as a payment on, and as a full discharge pro tanto of, the mortgage debt. This is an ample and perfect remedy and protection to the mortgagor when he desires to pay off his mortgage at any time after the accrued taxes have become payable. He has only to pay the tax assessed to the mortgagee, and deduct the sum so paid from the amount of his debt. But there was another case to be provided for. It was foreseen that payment of mortgages would frequently be made after the taxes had accrued and become a lien, and before they were payable, or their amount ascertained by the order establishing the rate and making the levy. The taxes for each fiscal year accrue on the first Monday of March, preceding (Const. art. 18, § 8,) and, when assessed, take effect and become a lien from that date. (Pol. Code, § 8718;) but, the rate to be levied being dependent upon the amount of the assessment, the levy cannot be made until assessments have been equalized, and the roll completed. The statute accordingly designates the first Monday of October as the date for making the levy. Pol. Code, § 8714. In other words, there is an interval of at least seven months in each year, as the law stands, after the mortgagee's tax has accrued, and before it is payable. And this case, as I have said, was foreseen by the framers of the Constitution, and express provision made in the last clause of the section above quoted for the protection of the mortgagor who pays off his mortgage during such interval. Without this provision, he would, no doubt, have had another remedy in case of neglect by the mortgagee to pay the tax assessed upon the security; that is, he could have paid the tax himself, and have recovered it back in an action against the mortgagee for money paid. The authorities cited in the commissioner's opinion fully sustain this proposition. But this remedy would always be expensive and vexatious, and often ineffectual, by reason of the insolvency of the mortgagee, and therefore the Constitution gave a simpler, an entirely inexpensive, and perfectly efficacious, remedy, by allowing the mortgagor in such case to retain out of the amount due on the mortgage the amount of the accrued taxes, computed according to the tax levy of the previous year.

The question is whether this remedy is exclusive; whether, in other words, the new remedy so given has the effect of abrogating the remedy which the law would have afforded in the absence of any such constitutional or statutory provision; and this, in my opinion, depends upon whether the change of remedy also involves a change of right. If a remedy exists for the enforcement of a right, the provision of a new remedy for the enforcement of the same right by a statute permissive in its terms does not abrogate the existing remedy. But if the statute changes the right, — if it gives a new and different right in place of the old one, and at the same time provides a new remedy, perfectly adapted to the complete enforcement of such new right, — the statutory remedy then becomes exclusive. What, then, is the effect upon the rights of the parties to a mortgage of the proviso at the end of section 4, art. 18, of the Constitution? Does it or does it not change the right of the mortgagor? It is clear, in my opinion, that it does. Without it a mortgagor paying his debt after assessment and before levy would, in case of the failure or refusal of the mortgagee to pay the tax subsequently levied on his security, have the right to free his land of the lien by paying such tax himself, and then to recover the sum so paid in an action against the mortgagee. In other words, the measure of the reciprocal right and obligation of the parties would be the tax levy for the current year. But the proviso under consideration creates a different right, and necessarily a different obligation. It empowers the mortgagor to retain the amount of the mortgagee's assessment, computed according to the rate levied the previous year. This may be more or may be less than the actual levy for the current year. It will seldom be the same, and may sometimes be very considerably greater or less. Whatever it is, however, the mortgagor may retain it, and the mortgagee must submit to the deduction. Though both parties may have the best reason to believe that the rate of levy for the current year will not be half that of the previous year, the mortgagor may nevertheless retain an amount computed according to the old rate, and it is not pretended that the mortgagee can, after the new levy, recover the difference. If this is so, — if the mortgagee must submit without redress to all the burdens of a rule enacted for the advantage of the mortgagor, — it would seem that he ought also to enjoy its benefit. The mortgagor, if he can always take according to the previous year's levy when he finds his advantage in so doing, ought not to be allowed to take according to the levy for the current year when that happens to be to his advantage. The rule, to be fair, ought to be invariable, and, in my opinion, it is. What the mortgagee must give the mortgagor must take. It was never intended to establish two standards of compensation, to either of which the mortgagor may resort, as his interest may dictate. On the contrary, it is much more reasonable to hold that the Constitution fixes one exact measure of the rights and obligations of the parties, which is equally binding upon both.

If this conclusion is well founded it follows that the question first above stated must be answered in the negative for two reasons: The mortgagor paying his debt after assessment and before levy cannot neglect to retain the taxes computed according to the levy of the previous year, and afterwards maintain an action to recover the taxes subsequently assessed and paid—First, because such subsequently assessed tax is not the sum which he is entitled to receive; and, second, because the Constitution has given him an exclusive remedy for the enforcement of the right (to retain an amount computed according to the previous year's levy) which it has substituted for that which he would otherwise have had. The reasons for this conclusion are greatly strengthened by its expediency. It is not only advantageous to the parties; it is emphatically to the interest of the public to avoid and discourage unnecessary litigation. The mortgagor, having in his own hands the absolute power to protect himself, should not be allowed to deliberately disregard the constitutional provisions for his security in order to vex the public tribunals with a gratuitous lawsuit. The mortgagor who purposely neglects to avail himself of the proviso under consideration is entitled to no more favor than one who has actually paid taxes on the mortgagee's interest before he pays his debt, and yet deliberately omits to deduct the amount so paid for the purpose of suing to recover it back. Each case in fact stands upon precisely the same footing. In each the mortgagor at the time of paying his debt knows that there is a certain fixed sum which he is entitled to deduct from the total amount secured,—a sum in no way dependent as to its amount upon future contingencies. Why should he be allowed in one case any more than in the other, after making a purely voluntary payment of such sum, to maintain an action to recover it back? It will be observed that I speak of a voluntary and deliberate payment, and I do so for the reason that such is the case before us. If the payment of the whole amount of the debt without deduction of the taxes had been induced by any fraud or duress or mistake, or if the deduction had been waived in consideration of a promise by the appellant to pay the tax subsequently levied, the case would have been essentially different.

In the case of Blythe v. Luning, 7 Sawy. 504, 14 Fed. Rep. 281, the mortgagor paid the whole debt under protest, and under what seems to have been regarded as a species of duress, the mortgagee refusing to satisfy the mortgage upon any other terms, and thereby preventing the mortgagor from making use of his property. The conduct of the mortgagee in that case may well have justified the decision, and I should myself be disposed to uphold an action based upon the same or analogous grounds. If the mortgagor is forced to pay by duress; if he pays in ignorance of his rights, or is induced by any fraud or promise to pay without making the deduction,—I should say that he was entitled to recover, not the sum which he afterwards actually pays on account of the mortgagee's taxes, but the sum which he overpaid by the mistake, etc., or the sum which the mortgagee has agreed to pay in consideration of his forbearance. I cannot, however, bring myself to the view that the Constitution gives a double right to the mortgagor, by which he is enabled to take out a sum computed according to the levy of the previous year if he so desires, or, if it appears more profitable, waive his right of deduction for the chance of recovering a larger sum by action. The Constitution was not designed to encourage that kind of speculation.

These views, if correct, are decisive of the present appeal, and a discussion of the second question above stated might be dispensed with. But it will throw some additional light upon the meaning of the Constitution to consider the effect of its provisions upon the rights and duties of an assignee of the mortgage who holds it at the time of payment by assignment made subsequent to the assessment. It is plain that in such case the assignment does not impair the right of the mortgagor to deduct the tax at the time of paying his debt, and the parties to the assignment necessarily treat with reference to the known right of the mortgagor and the corresponding liability of the holder of the mortgage. The assignee will not pay, and the assignor cannot expect to receive, more than the amount of the debt, less the amount which the mortgagor has the right to deduct. The necessary effect of the Constitution, therefore, is not only to compel the person who holds the mortgage at the time of payment to submit to a deduction of his accrued tax, but also to compel each successive owner of the security to pay such tax to his assignee at the time of the transfer. This being so, it would be a manifest injustice to compel him to pay it a second time, but this is precisely what the respondent is seeking to do if the fact is such as, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it must be presumed to be. The appellant has already paid its tax to its assignee. The assignee necessarily assumed the duty of paying it to respondent, and respondent had the absolute right and power to compel it to pay. Instead of standing on its right, it releases the assignee, and seeks to compel the appellant to pay twice. Thus, upon the theory that the mortgagor may at his option deduct the mortgagee's tax computed according to the levy of the previous year, or sue for the actual amount subsequently levied, a rule sufficiently unequal and unfair between the original parties to the mortgage is made to operate with still greater injustice between parties by assignment. The only answer to this proposition is that the assignor can protect himself by exacting a special agreement on the part of the assignee to refund the amount of the accrued tax in case the mortgagor shall not elect to deduct it at the time of payment. It is true that he might protect himself in this way, but to hold that he must do so is to assume that the framers of the Constitution intended to plant in every assignment of a mortgage the seeds of future litigation. In the face of a provision evidently designed to secure absolutely the rights of the parties without litigation, it ought not to be held that a part of the scheme was to make a transaction so usual, so legitimate, and often so necessary, as the assignment of a mortgage, impossible, except upon conditions involving a new subject of contention.

A great part of the argument of the respondent to sustain his claim against the assignor of the mortgage is devoted to the proposition that the tax levied upon the mortgagee's interest becomes and remains a personal liability to the state. The question whether a tax is a debt or personal liability of the person assessed depends altogether upon the statutory provisions for the time being; but the question here is not as to the construction of our revenue laws, but wholly as to the meaning of a clause of the Constitution. It is plain that the Constitution compels the holder of the mortgage to pay the accrued tax, or what is treated as its equivalent, to the mortgagor at the time the mortgage debt is paid. He is at the same time compelled to satisfy and discharge the mortgage. Can it be supposed that the framers of the Constitution, while making it compulsory upon him to pay his tax to the mortgagor, and surrender his security, intended still to hold him personally liable to the state for the same tax? Such a conclusion is little short of absurd, and it seems equally so to suppose that such personal liability was intended to be contingent upon the choice of the mortgagor to deduct or not to deduct the accrued tax at the time of paying his debt. On the contrary it seems to me clear that, as to this particular tax at least, the Constitution intends that the state shall rely for its enforcement upon its lien on the mortgaged premises,—a security which is more than sufficient in every case. Upon this view of the Constitution, the rights of all parties, including the state, are amply secured without the necessity of any legal proceedings. Upon the opposite view,—the view that the mortgagor has an option as to the amount he shall take, and the time when any person from whom he shall take it,—all is uncertainty and confusion. There should be no hesitation in adopting the view which leads to certainty, security, and substantial justice in preference to that which involves uncertainty, insecurity, and inevitable injustice. My conclusion is that, if a mortgagor intentionally and deliberately omits to deduct the tax accrued upon the mortgagee's interest at the time of payment, he cannot afterwards maintain an action to recover it. If he pays his debt without deduction of the tax by mistake or fraud or under duress, he may have an action to recover back the overpayment, but in such case his right of action is against the party to whom the overpayment was made,—in this case the State Loan & Trust Company. The judgment and order of the superior court should be reversed.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Mary JEWELL

v.

George F. JEWELL.

(84 Me. 304.)

A right to a new trial as matter of law is not lost by failure to take the statutory course to remove from the panel a juror who is related to the parties within such a degree as to be by statute disqualified to sit, if knowledge of the relationship is not obtained until after the trial.

(February 11, 1892.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Somerset County of a motion for new NOTE.—Disqualification of juror as ground for new trial.

1. General statement of the law.

It is said that it has been long settled in England that after a juror is once sworn he cannot be challenged for any pre-existing cause. Mr. Justice Catron in McClure v. State, 1 Yerg. 208, citing 1 Inst. 188a; 3 Vin. Abr. B. 11, p. 764; Hawk. P. C. chap. 43. In this case it was objected after verdict that one of the jurors was an atheist, but it was held that the objection came too late.

State v. Davis, 80 N. C. 412, was almost identical in facts with McClure v. State, supra.

Lord Tenterden, Ch. J., in Rex v. Sutton, 8 Barn. & C. 417, said that he "was not aware that a new trial had ever been granted, on the ground that a juror was liable to be challenged, if the party had an opportunity of making the challenge."

In United States v. Baker, 3 Ben. 68, it was found after verdict that one of the jurors was deaf, and a motion was made to set aside the verdict. In denying the motion, Blatchford, J., said: "On principle, as well as on authority, nothing that is a cause of challenge to a juror before verdict can be used to set aside a verdict, as for a mistake, 18 L. R. A.

even though the cause of challenge was unknown to the party when the jury was sworn." To the same effect, see Selleck v. Sugar Hollow Turnp. Co. 18 Conn. 453.

A new trial will not be granted on account of the disqualification of a juror for matter that is a principal cause of challenge, which existed before he was elected and sworn, unless it appears from the whole case that the party suffered injustice from the fact that such juror served on the trial. Simmons v. McConnell, 86 Va. 494. And to the same effect, see Com. v. Hughes, 5 Rand. (Va.) 666; Smith v. Com. 2 Va. Cas. 8; Poore v. Com. Id. 474; Com. v. Jones, 1 Leigh, 598; Bristow v. Com. 15 Gratt. 646; Com. v. Hallett, 3 Gratt. 564; Curran's Case, 7 Gratt. 622; Polindexter v. Com. 38 Gratt. 732; State v. McDonald, 9 W. Va. 456; Beck v. Thompson, 31 W. Va. 459; State v. Howard, 17 N. H. 171.

In Beck v. Thompson, supra, the juror was disqualified by reason of his interest in a similar case set for trial in the same court.

The fact that an incompetent juror sat at the trial of a cause does not vitiate the verdict. State v. White, 68 N. C. 159; Briggs v. Byrd, 34 N. C. 377; trial in an action brought to compel defendant to comply with his contract to support plaintiff which resulted in a verdict in defendant's favor, which motion was based upon the ground that one of the jurors was related to the parties to the action within such a degree as to be disqualified by statute from sitting as juror in the case. New trial granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. Wright for plaintiff.

Messrs. Walton & Walton for defendant.

Whitehouse, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In an action against her son for the alleged failure to perform his contract for her support, the plaintiff had a verdict against her, and moved to set it aside on the ground that one of the jurors who rendered the verdict was disqualified by his relationship to the parties.

It appears that the juror's mother and the plaintiff's mother were sisters. The juror was therefore related to the plaintiff within the State v. Patrick 48 N. C. 422; State v. Douglass, 68 N. C. 500.

Though one of the jurors who tried the cause was related to the plaintiff, yet, if he was not challenged at the trial, the objection cannot be afterwards made, there appearing to be no unfairness in the trial. Eggleston v. Smiley, 17 Johns. 122; Cole v. Van Keuren, 61 How. Pr. 451; Hayes v. Thompson, 15 Abb. Pr. N. S. 220, citing People v. Jewett, 6 Wend. 896.

The fact that one of the parties was a member of the county court which selected the panel from which a jury was drawn is not ground for setting aside a verdict, although the complaining party then learned the fact for the first time, unless substantial injustice has been done. Boteler v. Roy, 40 Mo. App. 284; Samuels v. State, 8 Mo. 63; Vierling v. Stifel Brew. Co. 15 Mo. App. 125.

In Amherst v. Hadley, 1 Pick. 38, a motion to set aside a verdict because a juror had been irregularly returned was not sustained, the party having suffered no injury.

In Brill v. State, 1 Tex. App. 572, a new trial asked for because one of the jurors had served in a former trial, was refused because no partiality was shown, and it did not appear that injury resulted to the objecting party.

In a civil case, a verdict should not be disturbed for the mere technical reason that one juror was incompetent, unless the moving party was injured thereby. United States v. Angney, 5 Mackey, 66.

In a criminal case it is good cause for a new trial that one juror was incompetent, whether the moving party was injured thereby or not. Id.

Proof that a juror was not qualified to serve as such by reason of his not being a householder in the county, a freeholder in the state, or a resident in the county, is sufficient to support a motion for a new trial, although upon being interrogated he had claimed such qualification under oath, and although Code Crim. Proc., art. 681, provides that if a juror makes such claim "he shall be held qualified until the contrary be shown, etc." Brackenridge v. State, 4 L. R. A. 360, 27 Tex. App. 513; Henrie v. State, 41 Tex. 573. And see Read v. State and Boren v. State, infra.

Mere disqualification of a juror is not, under Tex. Code Crim. Proc., art. 777, ground for a new trial; it must further appear that probable injury resulted to the defendant by reason of such juror having served. Lane v. State, 29 Tex. App. 310; Leeper v. State, 29 Tex. App. 63; O'Mealy v. State, 1 Tex. App. 180; People v. Scott, 56 Mich. 154, 6 Crim. L. Mag. 384.

Leeper v. State, supra, expressly overruled Leeper v. State, 2 Tex. App. 422; Armendarces v. State, 10 Tex. App. 44; Boren v. State, 23 Tex. App. 28; Brackenridge v. State, supra,—as not being consistent with the statute.

A new trial on the ground that the service of a disqualified juror injured defendant's rights because he advocated a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree, while other jurors were in favor of finding lower degrees, is properly denied, where the character of the information and its source are not set forth in the affidavits. Lane v. State, supra.

In South Carolina the courts recognize no exception to the general rule that that which furnishes a cause for challenge shall form no ground for a new trial. State v. Cooler, 3 L. R. A. 181, 30 S. C. 105, citing State v. Quarrel, 2 Bay, 150; State v. O'Driscoll, 2 Bay, 152.

In Boland v. Greenville & C. R. Co., 12 Rich. L. 363, the fact of the interest of a juror in the cause was held no ground for a new trial although unknown to the party in time to challenge.

In Josey v. Wilmington & M. R. Co., 12 Rich. L. 134, a cause of challenge going to the impartiality of a juror was held insufficient ground for a new trial.

The fact that a juror who sat in a criminal case was also a member of the grand jury by which the bill was found will not sustain a motion to arrest judgment, where no objection to the juror was made on the trial. State v. Cooler, supra.

a. Party knowing of disqualification waives objection by silence.

In Fox v. Hazelton, 10 Pick. 275, Shaw, Ch. J., in the course of his opinion said if an objection to a juror was known, and no exception taken when the jury was impaneled, the party must be held to waive all objection.

This was expressly held in Com. v. Dailey, 12 Cush. 82; Kent v. Charlestown, 2 Gray, 251; Russell v. Quinn, 114 Mass. 103; Brown v. Webster, 6 Cush. 563; Davis v. Allen, 11 Pick. 466, 23 Am. Dec. 386; Hallock v. Franklin County, 2 Met. 553, citing Howland v. Gifford, 1 Pick. 43, cited in note; Merrill v. Berkshire, 11 Pick. 200; People v. Stonecipher, 6 Cal. 405; People v. Sanford, 43 Cal. 29; Brown v. Autrey, 78 Ga. 753; Parmelee v. Guthery, 3 Root, 135, 1 Am. Dec. 65; Rollins v. Ames, 2 N. H. 349, 9 Am. Dec. 79; Quinebaug Bank v. Leavens, 20 Conn. 87, 50 Am. Dec. 272.

In Widder v. Buffalo & L. H. R. Co., 24 U. C. Q. B. 222, 520, the court declined to relieve a party from a verdict returned by a jury one of whom was objectionable by reason of prejudice, when the party had been at the trial aware of the objection but had taken his chance of a verdict in his favor.

The same principle was asserted in Lafayette Pl. Road Co. v. New Albany & S. R. Co., 13 Ind. 90. But in this case a new trial was granted because of the inability of one of the jurors to understand the English language, where the defendants were not aware of the fact until after the trial.

Acquiescence in the continuance of a trial after a juror has, in response to questions, proclaimed his part in a former trial of the same cause precludes objection to the verdict for the incompetency of the juror. Re Lindsey, 46 N. J. Eq. 353.

Facts coming to the knowledge of counsel as to incompetency of a juror, after the jury is sworn but before further steps are taken, should be then presented and not withheld until after conviction, and then used as a ground for setting the verdict aside. Lampkin v. State, 87 Ga. 516; Keener v. State, 18 Ga. 194, 63 Am. Dec. 200.

If a party or his counsel knows of an objection fourth degree, and to the defendant within the fifth degree, according to the rules of the civil law.

In his classification of challenges to the polls Lord Coke says of the challenge propter affectum that the right exists, "if the juror be of blood or kindred to either partie, consanguineus, which is compounded ex con and sanguine, quasi eodem sanguine natus, as it were issued from the same blood; and this is a principal challenge, for that the law presumeth that one kinsman doth favor another before a stranger, and how far remote soever he is of kindred, yet the challenge is good. And if the plaintiff challenge a juror for kindred to the defendant, it is no counter-plea to say that he is of kindred also to the plaintiff, though he be in nearer degree; for the words of the entire facias forbideth the juror to be of kindred to either partie." Co. Litt. 157, (a.)

But there are several provisions of our statute touching this subject. Rule 22, § 6, chap.

before verdict and in time to obtain a rehearing before another jury and allows the opportunity to pass he will be held to have waived objection. State v. Tuller, 34 Conn. 295.

Where the intoxication of a juror, which a party to an action or prosecution avers commenced at the beginning of the trial and continued to its close, was patent or apparent to all the parties, such party cannot keep quiet on the subject, and, after taking the chances of a favorable verdict, avail himself of it for the first time after defeat. Ipwitich v. Fernandez, 84 Cal. 689.

In State v. Coleman, 8 S. C. 237, it was not known to the defendant till after the jury was formed that a juror had expressed an opinion. The defendant's counsel then refused to move for the removal of the juror, but moved after verdict for a new trial because the judge had not dismissed the juror of his own accord, and the motion was denied.

b. Petitioner must show ignorance of the disqualification.

In State v. Browne, 10 Iowa, 149, it was held that it must appear that the defendant had knowledge of the disqualification of a juror before it can be held that he waived objection.

In other cases it is held that the petitioner must show that he was ignorant of the disqualification.

In Powell v. Haley, 28 Tex. 52, one of the jurors was not sworn but a new trial was refused because the affidavit did not show that the petitioner's counsel was ignorant of the fact.

In Roseborough v. State, 43 Tex. 570, a new trial was refused because it was not shown that the disqualification was unknown to the party and his counsel. See, to the same effect, State v. Tuller, 34 Conn. 295; Morrison v. McKinnon, 12 Fla. 552.

A juror's false statement that he had not served in a former trial is not cause for a new trial, where the defeated party did not object to him before the trial and it is not shown that she did not know that he served at the former trial. Buok v. Hughes, 127 Ind. 46.

It is not ground for a new trial that a juror has served, within a year, in the same court, in another case where the objection is first raised after verdict, and it is not shown that the fact was unknown when he was accepted, or that prejudice resulted from his retention. State v. Ready, 44 Kan. 607; State v. Jackson, 27 Kan. 581.

c. Neglect to make inquiries defeats the party's right.

Where a party fails to make inquiry as to the competency of a juror he waives objection, and cannot after conviction have a new trial on the ground of the incompetency of the juror and his ignorance thereof at time of trial. George v. State, 39 Miss. 570.

A defendant cannot avail himself of the partiality of a juror to secure a new trial where he has failed before trial to make necessary inquiries. Collier v. State, 20 Ark. 36; State v. Funck, 17 Iowa, 365.

"A party against whom a verdict has been rendered who has not seasonably availed himself of the means of inquiry thus afforded him, may in- 18 L. R. A.

deed, upon proof to the satisfaction of the court that a juror did not stand indifferent, by reason of facts unknown to the party until after the verdict be granted, a new trial on review at the discretion of the court; but he is not entitled to it as matter of law and has no right of exception if it is refused. Gray, Ch. J., in Woodward v. Dean, 113 Mass. 297.

Where there is a failure to interrogate a juror as to whether he is a freeholder objection cannot be made after verdict because he is not a freeholder. Croy v. State, 33 Ind. 384; Kingen v. State, 45 Ind. 132.

Quinebaug Bank v. Leavens, 20 Conn. 36, 50 Am. Dec. 272, held that a party who failed to inquire as to a person's interest could not thereafter object on that account.

The discovery of the incompetency of a juror after his acceptance and swearing is not ground for a new trial if due diligence would have led to the discovery in time. Burns v. State, 80 Ga. 344. In this case a man named Charles W. Foster, incompetent as a juror, served instead of Charles Foster who was on the jury list and was competent.

The fact that the foreman of the jury was uncle of the treasurer of the defendant corporation who was also a stockholder and a witness on the trial, is not sufficient ground for setting aside the verdict, when diligence has not been used to ascertain the juror's disqualification and objection is not made before the verdict. Harrington v. Manchester & L. R. Co. 62 N. H. 77.

In Daniels v. Lowell, 139 Mass. 53, an action for injuries resulting from a defective highway, the plaintiff moved for a new trial on the ground that a juror was a taxpayer in the city. He having neglected to make proper investigation on this point the motion was denied.

A party may or may not use his right of peremptory challenge, and if he chooses not to exercise the right and an incompetent juror under an erroneous ruling of the judge is actually sworn, and tries the case the verdict will be set aside. Brown v. State, 57 Miss. 434.

In State v. Vogel, 22 Wis. 471, the question was one of alienage. It was said that, while in capital cases the prisoner does not waive anything, in other cases, civil or criminal, the rule is otherwise; and where in these cases the defendant fails to make inquiries as to the qualifications of a juror he waives objection.

2. Objections on the ground of age of jurors.

A new trial will not be granted where one of the jurors was over sixty years of age when he sat without objection from either party. Williams v. State, 37 Miss. 407; State v. Fisher, 2 Nott & McC. 281; Seacord v. Burling, 1 How. Pr. 175; Davis v. People, 19 Ill. 74.

The statute exempting persons over sixty-five years of age from sitting on juries does not render such persons incompetent. Munroe v. Brigham, 19 Pick. 363.

To the same effect, see Green v. State, 59 Mo. 123. In Wassum v. Feeney, 121 Mass. 93, 23 Am. Rep. 258, a new trial was refused which had been moved for on the ground that one of the jurors was an

1, Rev. Stat., provides that, "when a person is required to be disinterested or indifferent in a matter in which others are interested, a relationship by consanguinity or affinity within the sixth degree according to the civil law, or within the degree of second cousin inclusive, except by written consent of the parties, will disqualify."

Section 80, chap. 82, Rev. Stat., declares that "the court, on motion of either party in a suit, may examine, on oath, any person called as a juror therein, whether he is related to either party, has given or formed an opinion, or is sensible of any bias, prejudice, or particular interest in the cause;" and if he does not stand indifferent he may be set aside. And section 88 of the same chapter provides that, "if any party knows any objection to a juror in season to propose it before trial, and omits so to do, he shall not afterwards make it, unless by leave of court for special reasons."

In the case at bar the court informed the infant. And see Trueblood v. State, 1 Tex. App. 630.

3. Alienage.

In Hollingsworth v. Duane, 4 U. S. 4 Dall. 354, 1 L. ed. 364, it was held that though the alienage of a juror might be a cause of challenge, it was not sufficient ground for granting a new trial.

The principle of Hollingsworth v. Duane, supra, was maintained in McCorkle v. Binna, 5 Binn. 348, 6 Am. Dec. 420; Presbury v. Com. 9 Dana. 206; and in a case in Illinois where the fact of alienage was unknown to the parties at the trial. Chase v. People, 40 Ill. 332, approved in Davison v. People, 90 Ill. 231. See, to the same effect, Kennedy v. Com. 14 Bush. 340; and George v. State, 39 Miss. 570, a capital case; Bennett v. Matthews, 40 How. Pr. 423.

But in Vermont a verdict rendered by jurors one of whom is an alien will be set aside if the disqualification is unknown by the defeated party and his counsel. Richards v. Moore, 80 Vt. 449; Quinn v. Halbert, 53 Vt. 363.

In Hill v. People, 16 Mich. 351, a juror sat who was excluded by statute, being an alien, a fact unknown at the time by the defendant, and a new trial was granted.

In People v. Scott, 56 Mich. 154, one of the jurors was an alien, but a new trial was refused because that fact was known to the objecting party at the time of the trial.

In People v. Reece, 3 Utah, 72, a juror falsely swore that he was a citizen of the United States. The complaining party was held not to have waived his right to a jury of twelve qualified men, he not having shown negligence, and a new trial was granted.

4. Want of property qualifications.

In Draper v. State, 4 Baxt. 253, a new trial was asked for because a juror was neither a freeholder nor a householder, facts of which the defendant was ignorant at the trial. The motion was denied.

State v. Crawford, 3 N. C. 296, was a case where a juror was not a freeholder, which was not known to defendant till after trial, but a new trial was refused.

In Briggs v. Georgia, 15 Vt. 61, the want of a freehold qualification was held sufficient ground for setting a verdict aside. But in Wassum v. Feeney, supra, the unsoundness of the decision was said to have been clearly demonstrated in Mr. Justice Bennett's dissenting opinion.

In Calhoun v. State, 4 Humph. 477, a new trial was denied in a capital case though the defendant did not know till after verdict that one of the jurors was not a freeholder.

A new trial must be granted where a juror who was incompetent because neither a freeholder nor a householder was permitted to sit, on his mistaken testimony that he was a freeholder and householder. Read v. State (Tex. App.) Oct. 23, 1889.

Where a juror qualified himself on his voir dire, answering that he was a freeholder in the state, when in fact he was neither a freeholder nor a householder in the county, proof that appellant and his counsel had intimately known the juror for 18 L. R. A.

years should not prevail over their oaths that the disqualification of the juror was unknown to them before the trial; and a new trial may be granted. Boren v. State, 23 Tex. App. 23.

5. Irregularities of selection.

It was held in State v. Breen, 59 Mo. 417, that where the objection to the juror goes only to the formalities by which he was selected, and no injury has resulted to the defendant, a new trial will not be granted.

By the Missouri statute (Wag. Stat. 707, § 3), it is provided that "no exception to a juror on account of his citizenship, nonresidence, state, or age, or other legal disability, shall be allowed after the jury is sworn."

After plea of not guilty and conviction, defendant will not be allowed to object to the venue, or the jurors summoned under it. State v. Cole, 9 Humph. 623.

In Page v. Danvers, 7 Met. 323, it was sought to set aside the verdict because the jury had been irregularly selected, but the motion was denied.

In Russell v. Ball, Barnes (3d ed.), 455, a son answered to the name of his father, and for this cause the verdict was set aside. But this case was overruled in Hill v. Yates, 13 East, 230, where the facts were similar, and no injustice had been done.

In Dovey v. Hobson, 6 Taunt. 460, Hill v. Yates, supra, was expressly affirmed, but under the circumstances of the case a new trial was granted. One who occupied the house formerly occupied by him who had been summoned appeared and answered to the latter's name. The fact was discovered after the case had been gone through with, but before verdict.

In Rex v. Hunt, 4 Barn. & Ald. 490, which was the case of an information for libel, where two special jurymen had not been summoned and two talesmen were sworn, the court refused to set aside the verdict.

The objection to a juror that his name was not in the box or in the list came too late after verdict. Osgood v. State, 58 Ga. 791; Edwards v. State, 53 Ga. 433.

The absence of a juror's name from the books of the tax receiver is not ground for a new trial where no objection is made until after verdict. Pool v. Callahan (Ga.) March 5, 1892; Osgood v. State, supra.

Where a name on the petit jury in a criminal case was answered to by another person, who served in the place of the person bearing such name, and the substitution was unknown to the defendant and his counsel until after the trial, it was held cause for a new trial. Stripling v. State, 77 Ga. 103.

A case resembling this was Anderson v. Green, 46 Ga. 361, where a new trial was refused. But in that case it did not appear that both substitute and principal were unknown to the defendant.

6. Bias of jurors.

The want of purely statutory qualifications, such as citizenship, age, property, etc., which do not go to make up the necessary qualities to enable a jury before the commencement of the trial who the parties to the suit were, and explained that, if any member of the panel was related to the parties within the degree of second-cousin, he would be disqualified to sit, and must step aside. But it appears from the admissions in the report that neither the plaintiff nor the defendant had any knowledge that this kinsman was a member of the panel until after the verdict; and the juror testified that he had not seen the Jewells since his childhood, and did not recognize the parties in the court-room, and hence was not made aware of his relationship until after the trial had concluded.

In Woodward v. Dean, 118 Mass. 297, it appeared that Henry Macomber, one of the jurors, was the husband of the plaintiff's niece, but that the defendant was personally unacquainted with Macomber, and did not know that he was on the panel until after the trial. It further appeared that the defendant had not availed himself of the opportunity offered by juror to perform his duty with intelligence and impartiality, have never been treated with the same strictness as objections for bias, criminality, and like causes. Brewer v. Jacobs, 28 Fed. Rep. 234.

In this case a new trial was refused though one of the jurors was an infant and had not the necessary property qualifications.

In Hollins v. Ames, 2 N. H. 842, 9 Am. Dec. 79, it was said that the better opinion was that a cause of challenge going to the partiality of a juror might be taken advantage of after verdict. See, to the same effect, Herbert v. Shaw, 11 Mod. 111; Dent v. Hertford, 2 Salk. 645; Wynn v. Bangor, 2 Com. Ins. Rep. 601; Eggleston v. Smiley, 17 Johns. 123.

In each of the cases of Howerton v. State, Meigs, 232; Troxdale v. State, 9 Humph. 411, and Brakefield v. State, 1 Sneed, 215,—a new trial was granted because of bias, or partiality, or prejudice, evidenced by the expressed opinion of the juror.

In Bronson v. People, 23 Mich. 84, a reversal of conviction was asked on the ground that two jurors were disqualified by reason of a previously formed opinion; but the conviction was affirmed. Cooley, J., delivering the opinion, distinguished this case from Hill v. People, supra, saying: "The case is not parallel to this. Here the facts were all known to the party and he made no seasonable objection. . . . Moreover, the objections in their nature are different. In Hill v. People a person sat as a juror who was excluded by statute. There is no complaint that the two jurors who were accepted in this case were thus disqualified; the complaint is that the court erred in holding that their examination disclosed no definite opinion in their minds on the facts. The disqualification was absolute in the one case; in the other it depended on a fact which is not found, and which we are asked to find in a review of the evidence. So far as concerns this question, there can be no claim that the jury was not a lawful one on the judge's ruling on the facts. It is not therefore a mistrial, and if the judge erred, his attention should have been particularly called to the error by requesting him to note an exception."

In Nomaque v. People, 1 Ill. 109, a capital case, a new trial was granted on the ground of bias of a juror.

A new trial was awarded on the ground of bias, in United States v. Fries, 3 U. S. 3 Dall. 515, 1 L. ed. 701, which was an indictment for treason.

In Block v. State, 100 Ind. 357, a criminal case, a new trial was granted because one of the jurors was a deputy prosecuting attorney.

In Kennedy v. Com., 14 Bush, 840, a new trial was refused on the ground that a juror had formed an opinion before being accepted and the decision of the court not being subject to exception on a motion for a new trial, its ruling was not reviewed.

a. Relationship.

By N. Y. Code Civ. Proc., § 1166, a person is disqualified to sit as a juror if related by consanguinity or affinity within the sixth degree to a party. The party to whom he is related must raise the objection before the case is opened, but another party may object within six months after verdict, by a motion to set aside the verdict and for a new trial. Baylies, New Trials, p. 161.

Where by mistake a juror has answered erroneously that he is not related to the person injured by the offense charged, and the fact of his relationship is not discovered until after conviction, it is ground for a new trial. Powers v. State, 27 Tex. App. 700; Page v. State, 22 Tex. App. 551.

A party moving for a new trial on the ground of a juror's relationship to a party in the case must negative any knowledge of such relationship, on the part of himself and counsel. Tilton v. Kimball, 52 Me. 500; Goodman v. Cloudman, 43 Me. 577.

As maintaining the same principle, see State v. Bowden, 71 Me. 89.

In Lane v. Goodwin, 47 Me. 593, a juror was related to one of the parties and this fact was clearly shown, as was also the fact that both the objecting party and his counsel were ignorant thereof and a new trial was granted. To the same effect, see Chase v. Jennings, 38 Me. 44; Hardy v. Sprowle, 33 Me. 310.

In Hudspeth v. Herston, 64 Ind. 123, neither the juror nor the party knew of the relationship of the juror to the successful party till after the verdict. A new trial was granted.

In Brown v. State, 23 Ga. 439, a new trial was granted because a juror was cousin to the prosecutor, which fact was unknown to the defendant.

Where an attorney after the case was closed and all the evidence submitted to the jury, was told by another that he thought there must be some relationship between the foreman of the jury and the adverse party, though he did not know; and the attorney sent him home to find out, but failed to disclose the matter to the other side, or to make any other effort himself to find out the facts until after the verdict, because he did not put any confidence in what was told him,—a motion to set aside the verdict will be denied. Brown v. Reed, 81 Me. 158.

In Wright v. State, 13 Tex. App. 163, a new trial was granted because there had been forced on the defendant one juror who could not read or write the English language, and another who was related to one of the parties.

In Woodward v. Dean, 118 Mass. 297, it was sought to have a verdict set aside because one of the jurors was disqualified by relationship to the plaintiff. The court refused to grant the motion, although the party was ignorant of the fact before the trial, where he had not claimed his right under the statute to have the juror examined under oath.

To the same effect, see Smith v. Earle, 118 Mass. 581.

A new trial was refused where the counsel of the defeated party knew before the trial that the juror of whom he complained was related to the other party in the case, but had forgotten it. Cannon v. Bullock, 26 Ga. 451.

In Weutworth v. Sanford Mfg. Co., 33 Me. 547, verdict was rendered for the defendant, and the plaintiff moved to set it aside because a nephew of the plaintiff served on the jury. The objecting the Massachusetts statute (in substance the same as section 80, chap. 82, Rev. Stat. supra) to have the members of the panel examined before the trial respecting their relationship to the parties, and the court said: "A party against whom a verdict has been rendered, who has not seasonably availed himself of the means of inquiry thus afforded him, may in-party knew the fact but did not know that relationship was a disqualification. The motion was denied.

b. Language evidencing a preconceived opinion.

Evidence that a juror on a trial for murder, who on his voir dire declared that he had neither formed nor expressed an opinion, and who was accepted and served on the trial, had in fact, on the morning after the killing, said, in speaking of the defendant: "He has killed his man at last, has he? This is not the first crime of that kind that he has been guilty of. He is a bad man, a desperate man, and they ought to hang him or do something with him not to put the county at any expense."—is sufficient to warrant a new trial, where the question involved was one of fact entirely and a grave doubt might have been entertained. State v. Cleary, 40 Kan. 287.

A new trial was granted in the following cases, in each of which similar declarations had been made by a juror: Sam v. State, 81 Miss. 430; People v. Plumer, 9 Cal. 206; Bustick v. State, 19 Ohio, 196; Bishop v. State, 9 Ga. 121; Achey v. State, 64 Ind. 56; Sewell v. State, 15 Tex. App. 56; Norfleet v. State, 4 Sneed, 340.

A new trial will be granted where a juror during an adjournment of the court immediately after the swearing in of the jury used brutal language regarding the defendant in a criminal case, when the matter is at once brought to the attention of the court. State v. Wheeler (Mo.), March 2, 1892.

In State v. Strauder, 11 W. Va. 745, during the course of the trial the counsel for the prisoner handed to the judge an affidavit of a juror who said before trial he had heard a juror say that the prisoner ought to be hung. But no motion was made and no action was taken by the court. It not appearing that prejudice resulted to the prisoner a new trial was refused.

c. The objection that a trial juror was a member of the grand jury.

That one of the jury which convicted the defendant in a criminal prosecution was in the grand jury which found the indictment, which fact was unknown to the defendant till after the verdict, is a proper ground for granting a new trial. United States v. Christiansen (Utah) July 12, 1890; Com. v. Hussey, 18 Mass. 221.

To the same effect, see Rice v. State, 16 Ind. 236, where the defendant was guilty of no negligence in not sooner discovering the incompetency of the juror.

An objection that a juror was a member of the grand jury by whom the indictment was presented is too late where raised for the first time on motion for a new trial. State v. McCarthy, 44 La. Ann.—; State v. Thomas, 35 La. Ann. 24; State v. Smith, 41 La. Ann. 686; State v. Turner, 6 La. Ann. 309.

In People v. Lewis, 4 Utah, 42, where a member of the grand jury which found the indictment sat on the trial jury which convicted the defendant, the motion for a new trial was overruled on the ground of defendant's negligence in failing to sufficiently inquire as to the qualifications of the jury.

In Gillespie v. State, 8 Yerg. 507, the motion for a new trial was made on the ground that two of the jurors had been members of the grand jury which found the indictment, and was supported by affidavits that the defendant did not know this fact till after the judge's charge, and the motion was denied.

d. Concealment of interest by juror.

In Lamphier v. State, 70 Ind. 322, a juror by his answers had deceived the court as to his qualifications. There being no negligence on the part of the appellant a new trial was ordered.

Where a juror, on being examined as to qualification, falsely answered that he held no policy in the defendant company, and the truth was unknown at the time to the plaintiff, a new trial was granted. Pearcy v. Michigan Mut. L. Ins. Co. 111 Ind. 59.

Concealment by a juror of the fact that he sat upon a former trial of the same case, with statements on his voir dire that he had not formed any opinion in the case, is ground for a new trial where the fact of his former service was not learned by the unsuccessful party until after verdict. Johnson v. Tyler, 1 Ind. App. 387.

e. Petitioner must negative knowledge of bias.

A party moving for a new trial alleging as cause bias or partiality of a juror must negative his knowledge of the juror's interest. Jameson v. Androscooggin R. Co. 52 Me. 412.

To entitle the defendant to a new trial on account of a previously expressed opinion of a juror, he must show affirmatively that he was ignorant of the expression of such juror at the time of accepting him. Kennegar v. State, 120 Ind. 179; Achey v. State, 64 Ind. 56.

In State v. Ross, 20 Mo. 32, a new trial was granted on account of partiality and prejudice of a juror unknown to the defendant till after verdict.

In Bronson v. People, 32 Mich. 34, two jurors had previously expressed opinions on the case, a fact which was known to the defendant. A new trial was refused.

A new trial should be granted in a criminal case where a juror has already formed and expressed an opinion, which fact was unknown to the defendant before trial. Wade v. State, 112 Ga. 25; Ray v. State, 15 Ga. 223.

But this is open to explanation by the juror to the effect that his opinion did not actually influence the verdict. Ray v. State, supra.

f. Preponderance of evidence necessary to show bias.

A verdict will not be set aside because of the disqualification of a juror who tried the case, who swears that he had no bias or prejudice and was perfectly impartial, unless there are affidavits of at least two witnesses, or what is equivalent thereto, to show his disqualification. Fogarty v. State, 80 Ga. 450; Hudgins v. State, 61 Ga. 182; Turner v. State, 70 Ga. 765.

A new trial will not be granted on the ground that a juror was intoxicated during the trial, where the allegation of such intoxication is supported only by the affidavit of the defendant, and is contradicted by the affidavit of the juror. State v. Lee, 80 Iowa, 75, 20 Am. St. Rep. 401; State v. Kennedy, 77 Iowa, 208; State v. Livingston, 64 Iowa, 600.

7. Criminality of juror.

In State v. Powers, 10 Or. 145, a capital case, it was discovered after verdict that one of the jurors had been convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude and was therefore unqualified to sit. The motion for a new trial was overruled.

A new trial will not be granted because during the trial a juror was accused of grave crime, and employed one of the counsel engaged in the trial to defend him against the charge when the juror was not rendered incompetent. Hill v. Corcoran, 15 Colo. 270.

deed, upon proof to the satisfaction of the court that the juror did not stand indifferent, by reason of facts unknown to the party until after the verdict, be granted a new trial or review at the discretion of the court; but he is not entitled to it as a matter of law, and has no right of exception if it is refused." But there appears to be no statute in Massachusetts which, like ours, rigidly prescribes one of the limits of disqualification. In the absence of such a statute, the prevailing rule of the common law undoubtedly is that a new trial will be granted only when the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, deems it reasonable and proper in the furtherance of justice.

In such case, one of the principal inquiries would obviously be whether the aggrieved party has exercised reasonable diligence to ascertain the qualifications of the jurors; for the rule is definitely settled that a party who is aware of any circumstance affecting the competency of a juror is bound to make his objection by way of challenge before that juror is sworn; otherwise he will be deemed to have waived it. Wassum v. Feeney, 121 Mass. 93, 23 Am. Rep. 258; Jeffries v. Randall, 14 Mass. 206; Thompson & M. Juries, § 302, and authority cited.

A waiver involves the idea of assent, and assent is primarily an act of the understanding. We cannot assent to a proposition without some intelligent apprehension of it. It presupposes that the person to be affected has knowledge of his rights, but does not wish to enforce them. He cannot properly be said to waive that of which he has no knowledge.

In the case at bar the juror in question was undoubtedly disqualified, and would have been excused if the relationship had been disclosed at the trial, and the objection been seasonably made. But the plaintiff was not apprised of the relationship until after the verdict; she could not make the objection until she had knowledge of the fact. The statute explicitly and absolutely declares that relationship within the sixth degree "will disqualify." Under that statute William Ballentine was not "disinterested," and was not a legal juror. The plaintiff had a constitutional right to a trial by a legal jury. She has not willingly submitted to a trial by any other than legal jurors, and she is now entitled to a new trial as a matter of law. Hardy v. Sproule, 32 Me. 311; Quinn v. Halbert, 52 Vt. 353.

If the institution of trial by jury is to retain the confidence of the court and respect of the people, as a reliable and efficient agency for the investigation of facts and discovery of truth, not only must the municipal authorities charged with the duty of revising the list of jurors carefully heed the requirement of the statute to "take the names of such persons only as are of good moral character, of approved integrity, of sound judgment, and well informed," and otherwise qualified under the Constitution and the laws, but the courts must continue to exercise no less care to preserve all the safeguards which the law has placed around it. "All questions touching the formation of juries," said Coleridge, J., in O'Connell v. Reg., 11 Clark & F. 358, "must be examined by the judges with very critical eyes."

Verdict set aside. New trial granted.

Peters, Ch. J., and Walton, Libbey, Emery and Haskell, JJ., concurred.

v.

DOUGLAS COUNTY STREET R. CO.,
Appt.

(.....Wis.....)

1. An electric street railway company is liable for injuries to a passenger from an electric shock received while passing from one car to another by grasping a hand-rail charged with electricity because of imperfect insulation where it has ready means of ascertaining the escape of electricity from the works of the car, and the passenger is free from contributory negligence.
2. It is not as matter of law negligence contributing to injury from an electric shock caused by imperfect insulation for a passenger to swing around from the step of an electric street-car to that of the trailer when the railway company has no rule prohibiting and allows it without objection.

NOTE.—In the amazing development of electrical uses every legal decision as to the rights and liabilities of the users is of interest and importance. This is, we think, a pioneer case as to the liability of an electric railway for injury to a passenger by an electric shock.

18 L. R. A.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Douglas County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence.
Affirmed.

Statement by Lyon, Ch. J.:

The action is to recover damages for personal injuries to plaintiff, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant company. The company owns and operates a street railway in Superior City. The cars used thereon are propelled by electric power. On the evening of December 23, 1890, two cars, attached together by a drawbar, were being run by the company on its railway, for the transportation of passengers. Each car was constructed in the usual way, with a platform on either end outside the car, guarded by a dashboard with an iron handle or guard attached thereto. The plaintiff took passage on the first car, called a "motor car;" but because there was no fire therein, and the weather was cold, he attempted, when the cars were in motion, to pass to the rear car, or trailer, in which there was a fire. To do so it was necessary that he should take hold of the iron handle on each car, and step about three feet from the lower step of one platform to the lower step of the other. There was no proper insulation of the wires attached to these cars for conducting the motive power, and as a result thereof the electricity escaped, and such iron handles became heavily charged therewith. This condition was unknown to the plaintiff. When he took hold of the two handles a circuit was formed for the passage of the electricity, and he received a severe shock. He was unable to loosen his hold therefrom, and was dragged a considerable distance, helpless and insensible, and was quite severely injured. On the trial the jury found 'specially that the cars in which the plaintiff was a passenger were out of repair, in that the electricity was allowed to escape from its proper channel to the handles which the plaintiff took hold of in attempting to pass from one car to the other; that the company was guilty of negligence in allowing its cars and electrical appliances to remain in that condition; that such negligence was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries; and that plaintiff was not guilty of any negligence which contributed to such injuries. The jury also assessed plaintiff's damages at $1,500. A motion on behalf of defendant for a new trial was denied, and judgment entered for plaintiff pursuant to the verdict. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

Messrs. Ross, Dwyer, Smith, Hanitch & Douglas, with Mr. F. G. Wixon, for appellant:

The act of the plaintiff under all the circumstances was contributory negligence on his part such as to bar recovery; the testimony shows that as matter of law the attempt to cross was fraught with great danger and that it was not designed or intended that passengers should cross there.

See Downey v. Hendrie, 46 Mich. 498, 41 Am. Rep. 177; Hickey v. Boston & L. R. Co. 14 Allen, 429; Indianapolis & O. R. Co. v. Rutherford, 29 Ind. 82, 92 Am. Dec. 386; Solomon v. Central Park, N. & E. R. Co. 1 Sweeney, 298; Spooner v. Brooklyn O. R. Co. 31 Barb. 419; Galena & C. N. R. Co. v. Yarwood, 15 Ill. 468; Clark v. Eighth Ave. R. Co. 36 N. Y. 136, 93 Am. Dec. 495; Tregear v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. 14 Abb. Pr. N. S. 50.

The plaintiff had full knowledge of the danger, yet he unnecessarily and voluntarily put himself in a place of exposure. The danger was obvious. His having crossed between the cars before, is no defense to his reckless and negligent act.

Downey v. Hendrie, supra; Morrison v. Erie R. Co. 56 N. Y. 302; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Jones, 95 U. S. 439, 24 L. ed. 506; Dietrich v. Baltimore & H. Springs R. Co. 58 Md. 857; Griswold v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 64 Wis. 652.

Moving from one car to another while a train is in motion is generally evidence of gross negligence, and a case of urgent necessity must be shown in order to justify it.

2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 525, and cases cited.

If a person thinks it proper to make an experiment under circumstances of peril and which he could have reasonably avoided, it is no injustice that he should be required to bear the consequences of his own acts.

Dietrich v. Baltimore & H. Springs R. Co. supra.

When the plaintiff's evidence conclusively shows contributory negligence on his part, a nonsuit will be granted.

Lloye v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 67 Wis. 1, and cases cited.

It was culpable negligence on his part to put himself in a position where it was possible to receive the jury.

Galena & C. U. R. Co. v. Yarwood, supra; Gavett v. Manchester & L. R. Co. 16 Gray, 501, 77 Am. Dec. 422; Ricketts v. Birmingham Street R. Co. 85 Ala. 600.

Mere inconvenience is no excuse for taking risks on the part of the passenger on a street-car.

Morrison v. Erie R. Co. 56 N. Y. 302; Clark v. Eighth Ave. R. Co. 36 N. Y. 135, 98 Am. Dec. 495.

Messrs. Knowles, Dickinson, Buchanan, Graham & Wilson, for respondent:

We have overcome the presumption of negligence of the plaintiff arising out of his exposed position, by showing that the position had nothing to do with the injury. The proximate cause was the terrible current of electricity which the defendant negligently allowed to escape from its proper channel, and without warning to clutch the respondent in its grasp and transfer what otherwise was a comparatively safe position to one of extreme danger. In the absence of instructions or notice by the company to passengers not to go from one car to the other while the train was in motion, there is an implied license that they may do so, subject, however, to the ordinary risks obviously involved. If the electricity had not been in the handles of the car, so far as appears, the respondent would have gone over in perfect safety.

Costikyan v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 58 Hun, 590; Nolan v. Brooklyn, C. & N. R. Co. 87 N. Y. 63, 41 Am. Rep. 345; Willis v. Long Island R. Co. 34 N. Y. 670; Upham v. Detroit City R. Co. 12 L. R. A. 129, 85 Mich. 12; Thirteenth & Fifteenth Street Pass. R. Co. v. Boudron, 92 Pa. 475, 2 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 30, 87 Am. Rep. 707; Cummings v. National Furnace Co. 60 Wis. 603.

If the plaintiff, though negligent, would not have been injured had proper care been observed by the railway company, he may maintain the action.

Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Kean, 65 Md. 395, 28 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 580; Troy & Cape Fear & Y. V. R. Co. 99 N. C. 298, 34 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 18.

Unless the inference of negligence or its absence is necessarily deducible from the facts and circumstances proved, it is a question for the jury.

Dahl v. Milwaukee City R. Co. 62 Wis. 652;

Nelson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 60 Wis. 320.

Lyon, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The learned counsel for the defendant company made the point in his argument that the company had no notice or knowledge of the peril that a person passing from one car to another, in the manner the plaintiff attempted so to pass, might receive an electric shock. He argues therefrom that the company is not liable in this action. We think the point is not well taken. The company was chargeable with notice that the electrical apparatus on its cars was in a defective condition, for it appears that it had the means of readily ascertaining whether any electricity was escaping from the machine and works in the body of the car, and knowledge must be imputed to the company that if it escaped the iron handles of the platform were liable to become charged therewith.

The only other question argued in the case is whether the evidence conclusively proves that the attempt of plaintiff to pass from one car to the other when the cars were in motion, in the manner he did, was negligence on his part which contributed directly to the injury of which he complains. Or, stated in another form, was it error for the trial court to submit the question of contributory negligence to the jury? The testimony tends to prove that the company had no rule prohibiting passengers from stepping from the platform of one car to the platform of the other when the cars were in motion, and had never given any caution against the practice; that before plaintiff was injured, passengers on those cars, among whom was the plaintiff, frequently did so without objection on the part of the company; and that the car conductors constantly passed from one car to another when the same were in motion, in the same manner. Moreover, while it may reasonably be claimed that in thus passing from one car to another there was some peril of being thrown from and under the cars, there was no apparent reason to apprehend, and the plaintiff did not apprehend, the presence of any peril that by so doing he would come in contact with a current of electricity. Under these circumstances, we cannot say that contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff was conclusively proved. Hence it was not error to submit that question to the jury.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

OHIO FARMERS' INSURANCE CO.,
Pf. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

1. Each of two persons owning in severalty respective shares of personal

NOTE.—How far an undivided interest in property is a complete or full ownership for the purposes of insurance.

A proposition that an undivided interest in property is insurable by a contract fairly made and not stipulating for any greater interest in the insured is unquestioned and no authorities need be cited in support of it.

But there has been some uncertainty as to the validity of an insurance policy issued on an application describing the property generally as that of the insured.

In Columbian Ins. Co. of Alexandria v. Lawrence, 27 U. S. 2 Pet. 23, 7 L. ed. 335, and again on a subsequent appeal in the same case in 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 507, 9 L. ed. 512, it was held that insurance obtained on mill property upon an application describing it as belonging to the assured was not valid where he held only one half of one third of the property under a lease for three lives renewable forever and one half of the other two thirds only as mortgagee while the other moiety was held under an unperformed contract which if completed would give title to two thirds of it only as mortgagee.

So in Catron v. Tennessee Ins. Co., 6 Humph. 178, insurance on a furnace and forge was held invalid where it was granted on an application which did not disclose that the insured owned but one half of the property.

property insured is the "absolute owner" of the property within the meaning of a question and answer as to such ownership in an application for insurance thereon.

2. The failure of an insurance agent to write upon a policy the permission which he has in the exercise of his authority granted to place incumbrances on the property will not defeat the permission especially where he took an active part in procuring the money for the in-

A transfer by the owner of real property which is insured on a one-third interest therein to another person was held to violate the whole policy where there was a provision against "sale, transfer, or change of title." Western Massachusetts Ins. Co. v. Ricker, 10 Mich. 279.

But these cases substantially conflict not only with the main case but with other cases below cited.

Thus in Peck v. New London County Ins. Co., 23 Conn. 375, a policy to two persons jointly on a tannery and stock was held valid although one owned all the tannery and the other all the stock, where there was no misrepresentation in the application and it appeared that the facts were known to the insurance agent.

So a policy issued jointly to mother and son on a dwelling and personal property is valid in the absence of any requirement as to stating the exact state of the title where each owned part of the personal property and the mother had a life estate in the realty of which the son owned the fee. Castner v. Farmers Mut. F. Ins. Co. 46 Mich. 15.

And a representation by the assured that his title to a house on which a policy was issued was "complete" is not false so as to avoid the policy where the house and 200 acres of land on which it stood constituted his homestead, although the fee to an undivided half had vested on his wife's death in his children but no partition had ever been made and he was entitled to occupy it uncondi-sured and gave assurances that the rights of the latter were fully protected.

3. The knowledge of an incumbrance on the part of an insurance agent who filled out an application and had the applicant sign it without reading, assuring her that it was all right and that she was fully protected under it, will prevent a forfeiture because of such incumbrance which is not stated in the application.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Livingston County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due upon a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas E. Barkworth for appellant.

Mr. Luke S. Montague for appellee.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought upon two insurance policies. Plaintiff had judgment. Defendant brings error. The cause was tried before the court without a jury, and the court found substantially that the plaintiff was the owner in fee of a farm situate on sections 8 and 17, in the township of Putnam, Livingston county, the land being used together as one farm. On the day the policies were issued (June 30, 1890) there was situate upon that portion of the farm on section 8 a dwelling-house occupied by plaintiff as her residence, a barn, storehouse, pigpen, corn house, crib, and wheat house; and upon that portion of the farm on section 17 another barn. These barns were within ten rods of each other, a highway running between them, and the other buildings were all within twelve rods of the barns; both barns and the other buildings being used for general farm purposes. The plaintiff kept upon the farm, stock, tools, and implements, and had crops and produce upon it. On the above day, the defendant issued its two policies,—the one, No. 1,440, covering barn No. 1, on section 17, to the amount of $750, and barn No. 2, on section 8, at $150; and the other policy, No. 1,441, made to the plaintiff and Mrs. Sophia Beebe, and covering dwelling-house No. 1, household furniture, barn No. 1, hay, grain, fodder, and seeds while therein, livestock while therein, and against lightning on the farm, storehouse, horse barn, hay, grain, and fodder while therein, livestock while therein, and against lightning on the farm, farming implements, wagons, carriages, and harness while in barns or barn insured, dwelling-house No. 2, household furniture and clothing while therein, barn No. 2, hay, grain, fodder, and seed while therein, pigpen, corn house, crib, wagon house, wagons, carriages, and farm tools while therein, and on the wheat house, in the total sum of $4,700. A writing was indorsed on policy 1,441, that "it is understood that produce is covered in barns, in granary, in crib, and hay stacks, within twelve rods of the buildings." March 18, 1890, further ally as long as he lived. East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Crawford (Tex.) 21 Ins. L. J. 39.

Insurance of a vessel by a tenant in common is good as to his own interest although he has no right merely by virtue of his relation to his co-tenant to insure the share of the latter for him. Foster v. United States Ins. Co. 11 Pick. 85.

The sale by a tenant in common of his interest in the property to a co-tenant does not violate a provision of a policy against alienation "by sale or otherwise." Lockwood v. Middlesex Mut. Assur. Co. 47 Conn. 553.

Partnership interest.

By a large majority of the decisions it is held that the transfer by one partner of his interest in property insured to other members of the firm is not such a transfer of the property or change in the title thereto as will violate conditions in a policy against transfer, change, or alienation of the property or interests therein. Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Vaughan, 88 Va. 832; New Orleans Ins. Assn. v. Holberg, 64 Miss. 51; Powers v. Guardian F. & L. Ins. Co. 136 Mass. 108, 49 Am. Rep. 20; Texas Bkg. & Ins. Co. v. Cohen, 47 Tex. 406, 28 Am. Rep. 293; West v. Citizens Ins. Co. 27 Ohio St. 1, 22 Am. Rep. 294; Pierce v. Nashua F. Ins. Co. 50 N. H. 297, 9 Am. Rep. 233; Derman v. New Orleans H. Mut. Ins. Co. 28 La. Ann. 69, 21 Am. Rep. 544; Hoffman v. Aetna F. Ins. Co. 32 N. Y. 405, 88 Am. Dec. 337; Wilson v. Genesee Mut. Ins. Co. 16 Barb. 511; Burnett v. Eufaula H. Ins. Co. 46 Ala. 11, 7 Am. Rep. 551.

This rule is applied by the above cases to varying clauses prohibiting transfer or change as that the property shall not be "sold." Powers v. Guardian F. & L. Ins. Co. supra.

Or against "transfer by sale or otherwise." Texas Bkg. & Ins. Co. v. Cohen, supra.

Or against any change "in the title or possession . . . by sale transfer or conveyance." New Orleans Ins. Co. v. Holberg, supra.

Or that the property shall not be "sold or conveyed." Hoffman v. Aetna F. Ins. Co. supra.

Or that it shall not be "sold or conveyed or the interest of the parties therein changed." Burnett v. Eufaula H. Ins. Co. supra.

Or that there shall not be "any alienation by sale or otherwise." Pierce v. Nashua F. Ins. Co. 50 N. H. 297, 9 Am. Rep. 235.

Or that the "policy or any interest therein" shall not be assigned. West v. Citizens Ins. Co. 27 Ohio St. 1, 22 Am. Rep. 294.

Or that there shall not be "any change in the title or interest of the assured." Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Vaughan, 88 Va. 832.

A sale by the owner of insured property to a firm of which he is a member is not an "alienation by sale or otherwise" within the meaning of a condition in the policy. Cowan v. Iowa State Ins. Co. 40 Iowa. 551, 20 Am. Dec. 533.

And the fact that the insured and his partner owned insured property in partnership does not make the insurance invalid. Hartford Prot. Ins. Co. v. Harmer, 2 Ohio St. 452.

And the fact that the insured does business in the name of his father and himself as a firm, although he actually owns the goods insured, does not make the insurance void. Gould v. York County Mut. F. Ins. Co. 47 Me. 403.

And a policy of insurance on "his stock" of goods sufficiently describes the interest of a cabinet maker in a stock of goods of which he was the substantial owner although he had a partner in the business who was interested in the profits but owned no part of the capital of the firm. Irving v. Excelsior F. Ins. Co. 1 Bosw. 507.

So a merchant's taking in a partner does not vioinsurance to the sum of $800 was placed in policy No. 1,441, on produce while in barn and sheds, the same being the barn south of the road on section 17, designated originally in policy No. 1,440 as "barn No. 1 and foundation." At the date the policies were issued, Gov. Felch held a mortgage of $1,800, with accrued interest thereon of $700, on twenty acres of land on section 17. One Thomas Burkett held a chattel mortgage for $500, given by plaintiff upon fifty acres of beans then growing on the farm, the chattel mortgage being collateral and additional security for the same indebtedness covered by a real-estate mortgage held by Burkett. Permission was given upon the policies for the chattel mortgage of $500, as additional security to be placed on produce. "Loss, if any, payable to Thomas Burkett, mortgagee, as his interest may appear;" and upon policy No. 1,441 was indorsed: "Loss, if any, on real estate payable to Thomas Burkett, mortgagee, as his interest may appear." Upon policy No. 1,440 was indorsed: "Loss, if any, on real estate payable to A. Felch, mortgagee, as his interest may appear." August 15, 1890, the defendant, through its agent, further indorsed upon the policy: "Further chattel mortgage for $700 permitted, to put in and secure crops, but $350 returned, and not used." At the date the policies were issued, John Dyer held a bill of sale given as security upon certain personal property owned by the plaintiff. This was dated June 26, 1890, to secure the sum of $200. On the day the policies were issued,

Mr. Morris, the agent of the defendant company, dictated a new bill of sale to secure the payment of the same indebtedness to Mr. Dyer, to take the place of the one of June 26, 1890. This was delivered to Mr. Dyer and the old one taken up; also, on the date the policies were issued, Enoch Smith held a chattel mortgage given by the plaintiff to him to secure the payment of about $200, just what personal property it covered is not shown. October 9, 1890, the plaintiff gave to Smith a new chattel mortgage to take the place of the one last mentioned, and to secure the same indebtedness; thereby mortgaging to him a horse, a piano, and 12 acres of growing wheat. The horse and piano were insured by policy No. 1,441; but the wheat was still growing on the farm at the time the fire occurred, and none of the property covered by this mortgage was destroyed by the fire. The bill of sale to Dyer and the mortgage to Smith, and the removal of the same, were known to defendant's agent, but no permissions were indorsed on the policies for the same. No steps were taken by the company to cancel the policies before the fire.

Each policy was preceded by a written application, which was made a part of the policy, and each recited: "This policy is based upon an application and survey of the property on file, which is hereby referred to as forming a part of this policy." It was also printed in and made a part of each policy that, "if the property, real or personal, covered by this policy, be or become incumbered by a mortgage, trust deed, judglate a provision in a policy against a sale or transfer of the goods insured. Blackwell v. Miami Valley Ins. Co. 14 L. R. A. 451, 48 Ohio St. 533.

And a sole owner of insured property by taking partners does not violate a clause making a policy void if the property is "sold or conveyed." Scanlon v. Union F. Ins. Co. 4 Biss. 511.

At least where he continues to be the real owner of all the property. Malley v. Atlantic F. & M. Ins. Co. 51 Conn. 222.

On the other hand, in Drennen v. London Assur. Corp. 20 Fed. Rep. 667, it was decided that the introduction of a new partner with the investiture of an interest in him which he did not have before avoids a policy containing a condition that it shall be void in case the property is "sold or transferred or any change in the title" made.

This case was reversed in London Assur. Corp. v. Drennen, 116 U. S. 451, 29 L. ed. 688, and in the United States Supreme Court it was decided merely that in that case there was no partnership and therefore the effect of a transfer to a partner was not passed upon.

But a few other cases have held that a transfer by one partner to another of his interest in the firm made a policy of insurance on the firm property void.

Thus in Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Ross, 28 Ind. 179, 85 Am. Dec. 452, a transfer by one partner to another of his interest in the firm was held to defeat a policy containing a condition against a "sale, transfer, or change of title . . . or of any undivided interest therein."

The same decision was made in Dix v. Mercantile Ins. Co., 22 Ill. 272.

The particular language of these policies, however, clearly distinguishes these cases from those above referred to by expressly prohibiting the transfer of "any undivided interest."

In Hathaway v. State Ins. Co., 64 Iowa, 239, 53 Am. Rep. 433, it was held that such a transfer by one partner to another was a "change of title" contrary to a provision in the policy.

And in Keeler v. Niagara F. Ins. Co., 16 Wis. 523, 84 Am. Dec. 714, the same decision was made in respect to a policy with a condition that the property should not be "sold or conveyed."

And in Finley v. Lycoming County Ins. Co., 30 Pa. 311, 72 Am. Dec. 705, it was held that a sale by one partner to the other on dissolution of the firm violated a provision in the policy against alienation by "sale or otherwise."

The court, however, in this state relied on Tillon v. Kingston Mut. Ins. Co., 5 N. Y. 406, which is said by later New York cases not to support this doctrine when correctly understood.

And under the same circumstances as to the sale by one partner to another on dissolution the contrary decision was made in Wilson v. Genesee Mut. Ins. Co. 16 Barb. 511.

Again in Biggs v. North Carolina H. Ins. Co., 88 N. C. 141, the taking of a partner by the insured was held to defeat a policy which provided that the property must not be "transferred or changed in any way other than by succession by reason of death."

A policy issued to a firm does not cover goods bought by the surviving partner on his own account after he had bought the firm property and begun to carry on the business alone. Wood v. Rutland & A. Mut. F. Ins. Co. 31 Vt. 552.

And a surviving partner has not the "unconditional and sole ownership of the property" of the firm within the meaning of those words in an insurance policy. Crescent Ins. Co. v. Camp, 71 Tex. 503.

B. A. R.

ment, or otherwise, this entire policy shall be void, unless otherwise provided by agreement, indorsed hereon or added hereto." It was also printed in the policy: "This policy shall be void if the insured has concealed or misrepresented in writing any material fact or circumstance concerning this insurance or the subject thereof, or if the interest of the insured in the property be not truly stated herein, or in case of any fraud or false swearing by the insured touching matters relating to this insurance, or the subject thereof, whether before or after the loss." And also: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership, or the subject of insurance be personal property, and be or become incumbered by chattel mortgage." Also: "If the application, survey, plan, or description of the property be referred to in this policy, it shall be a part of this contract, and a warranty by the insured as to material facts." Also: "This policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions together with such other provisions, agreements, and conditions as may be indorsed hereon or added hereto; and no officer, agent, or representative of this company shall have power to waive any provision or condition of this policy, except such as by the terms of this policy may be the subject of agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto; and, as to such provisions or conditions, no officer, agent, or representative shall have such power, or be deemed or held to have waived such provisions or conditions, unless such waiver, if any, shall be written upon or attached hereto; nor shall any privilege or permission affecting insurance under this policy exist or be claimed by the insured, unless so written or attached. In the written application for policy No. 1,440 occurred the question, "Is the property incumbered?" The written answer was, "Yes." Then in the application is the following question, "If so, what amount, and the value of the premises?" The written answer is, "$1,800,—$1,800." Each of the written applications contains this clause: "The applicant hereby warrants the above answers and statements are true, and that no statement contradictory to above was made to or by the agent of the company, and he agrees that this declaration shall be the basis or form part of the contract or policy between the assured and the company." January 17, 1890, a fire occurred without the fault of the plaintiff, which destroyed the barn mentioned in policy No. 1,440 as "Barn No. 1," and a large amount of insured personal property consisting of hay, corn stalks, oats cut and stored, harness, farming implements, 671 bushels of beans stored partly in stack within 12 feet of the barn, beanpods in barn and shed adjoining, and grain bags, making a total loss under both policies of $2,843.19, for which plaintiff had judgment. The value of the barn was in excess of the insurance.

The objection to the proceeding relates entirely to the conclusions of law reached by 18 L. R. A.

the court below, upon the grounds: (1) Because the plaintiff could not bring suit on both policies, joining the same in one action and in her sole name; (2) that policy No. 1,440 was void, because the amount of the Felch mortgage was incorrectly stated in the application; (3) that the policies were void because the chattel mortgages were not permitted by writing indorsed upon them.

It appeared in the findings of the court that no part of the property belonging to Sophia Webb was destroyed by fire. The property covered by policy No. 1,441 belonged partly to the plaintiff and partly to Sophia Webb, each owning in severalty their respective shares, although the property thus secured was commingled and used in common by them for farming purposes. The only question in the application for that policy was addressed both to the plaintiff and Sophia Webb, as follows: "Are you the absolute owner of the personal property to be insured? Answer. Yes." It is evident that, if the property of both of the insured under this policy had been destroyed by fire, a joint action could have been brought by them, and the proceeds of the judgment afterwards apportioned between them according to their respective interests in the property. Castnor v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 46 Mich. 18. In the above case it was said: "When the entire property belongs to the persons insured, it can make no necessary difference to the insurer in what way their interests are apportioned. If they deem it material, they should inform the applicant before accepting his money." In the present case, much more clear is it that the insurer should not take advantage of this fact, for the reason that Mr. Morris, the agent, was fully informed where the title rested, and had assured the plaintiff that her interests were fully protected under the policies. Neither was the answer to the question in the application as to title of the personal property contrary to the true state of facts. Each owned in severalty, and they were the absolute owners of it.

It is contended: (1) That there was material misstatement as to the amount of incumbrance on the real property in policy No. 1,440; (2) that the placing of the chattel mortgages on the property, without the written permission of the company indorsed on the policy, worked a forfeiture.

It appears from the finding of the court below that Mr. Morris, the defendant's agent, was clothed with full power to issue policies. He took the applications, approved them, and without forwarding them to the company at once issued the policies, having been furnished with blanks for that purpose. Before the policies were made out, and at and before the applications were made, he knew of the Felch mortgage and the accumulated interest. In the presence of the insured he filled out the applications, and told them to sign, without reading the applications to them, or advising them of the contents. He knew all the facts in regard to the mortgage incumbrance, and the situation of the personal property with its incumbrances. After the applications were made, he assured the parties that they were fully protected under the policies. He also knew of and permitted the additional mortgages to Smith and Dyer, and advised Mrs. Beebe in the execution of them. No part of the property covered by the Smith and the Dyer mortgages was destroyed. It is contended, however, that by the terms of the policies the plaintiff cannot be heard to say that this was done by and with the full knowledge of defendant, as by the terms of the policies no officer, agent, or other representative of the company had power to waive any provisions or conditions of them, except such as by the terms of the policies might be the subject of agreement indorsed on them, etc. The claim is made that this principle was decided in Cleaver v. Traders' Ins. Co., 65 Mich. 527. In that case the policy provided that the agent "had no authority to waive, modify, or strike from the policy any of its printed conditions; . . . nor, in case this policy shall become void by reason of the violation of any of the conditions thereof, has the agent the power to revive the same."

The question involved there was whether the taking of $2,000 additional insurance in another company avoided the policy. Mr. Quinn was the agent of the company, and the plaintiff claimed to have spoken to him about the additional insurance, and after he received his additional policy he claims to have been told by Quinn that it was all right. It was said by this court that that was not a case where the insured had a right to rely upon the action of the agent, or to presume that his action was known to the company and ratified by it. But in the present case it appears that the agent stood in place of the company, with full power to issue policies without first referring the applications to the company; and the plaintiff relied upon, and had a right to rely upon, the agent, and to presume that the company had knowledge of his acts, and ratified them. If the Cleaver Case, supra, is to be construed as laying down such a doctrine as contended for here, it ought at once to be overruled. But we think the case is clearly distinguishable. The present case presents features by which, if that doctrine is applied, the grossest fraud is to be perpetrated upon the plaintiff. Morris, the agent, is an attorney at law, living near the plaintiff. He has been her legal adviser, and knew the situation and surroundings of her property as well as the plaintiff did. He filled out the applications, did not read them to the plaintiff, advised just what property each should cover, knew the amount of the Felch mortgage and interest accrued, knew the amount of each chattel mortgage, and in fact assisted the plaintiff in procuring the money on each. When all had been completed, he assured the plaintiff that the policies were all right, and that she was fully protected; and yet it is gravely contended here that she is not in a position to set up these facts because the policy contains a clause that "no officer, agent, or other representative of the company shall have power to waive any provision of the policy." If no officer, agent, or other representative of the company could waive it, then there could be no waiver. It is like the case of Westchester F. Ins. Co. v. Barla, 88 Mich. 148. In that case the policy provided that there should be no waiver of any of the printed or written conditions, except in writing on the policy, and the court said: "The conditions, literally applied, would prevent any unindorsed consent by the company itself, by resolution of its board, or by acts of its officers, as effectually as by any one else; and the case seems to settle down to the simple question whether a person who has agreed that he will only contract by writing in a certain way precludes himself from making a parol bargain to change it."

In the present case it is attempted, as in the Westchester F. Ins. Co. Case, supra, to limit every one connected with the company either as officer, agent, or representative, to waive by parol the requirements of the policy. The agent had the right, under the policy, to grant permission to place other chattel mortgages upon the property, but was required to write such permission upon the policy. He granted the permission, took an active part in procuring the money upon the mortgages, advised in regard to it, and assured the plaintiff that she was protected, though he did not enter in writing upon the policy the permission to do so. With the power vested in him by the company to issue policies, we think it would be a gross fraud upon the insured to hold that this condition was not waived by the consent of the company. If the company itself could waive compliance with this condition, then it was waived, as held in the case above cited.

What we have said above applies equally to the contention about the Felch mortgage. It is said that inasmuch as the policy provided that, if the property was incumbered, it must be stated in the application, otherwise the policy was to become void, therefore the representation in the application that the incumbrance was $1,800, when in fact it was $2,000, was such a misstatement that the policy was void, and no recovery could be had for that reason. As is seen from the findings of the court below, the agent of the company knew just what the incumbrance was. He filled out the application, had plaintiff sign it without reading it to her, assured her it was all right, and that she was fully protected under it. She was not asked to state the amount of the incumbrance, and no fraud or deceit was practiced by her. She did not know the printed clause in the policy in reference to warranties, and the court found that she was not negligent or careless in failing to read the application, under the circumstances, and that she and Mrs. Webb both understood and believed from the conduct and acts of the defendants' agent that the application stated the facts. Under these circumstances, the defendant company is not in a position to insist upon the forfeiture of the policy. Instead of a fraud being practiced upon the company, they must be presumed to have the knowledge which their agent possessed; and it would be a gross fraud upon the plaintiff to permit the company to take advantage of such a misstatement in the application, and hold the policy void by reason of it. The case falls clearly within the principle laid down in Tubbs v. Duelling-House Ins. Co. 84 Mich. 651; Michigan Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Reed, 84 Mich. 581, and cases there cited; Aetna, L. S. F. & T. Ins. Co. v. Olmstead, 81 Mich. 252. In the last case it was said by Mr. Justice Cooley: "The general rule undoubtedly is that, in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, a party must be conclusively presumed to understand the force of his contracts, and to be bound by their terms. But it cannot be tolerated that one party shall draft the contract for the other, and receive the consideration, and then repudiate his obligation on the ground that he had induced the other party to sign an untrue representation, which was, by the very terms of the contract, to render it void."

We think the court below, under the evidence and facts shown, very properly ruled that the policy was not rendered void by the misstatement of the amount of the Felch mortgage in the application.

Some contention is made that the personal property destroyed was not covered by policy No. 1,441. We think the two policies, taken together, show what the intention of the parties was, and that the property so destroyed was covered by and included in the policy.

Judgment is affirmed, with costs.

Grant, J., did not sit. The other Justices concurred.

v.

Peter JOHNSON et al., Piffs. in Err.

(.....Mich.....)

1. It will be presumed that chattel mortgagees, who have taken possession of the mortgaged property and are proceeding to sell it, acted in accordance with the provisions of the mortgage where such provisions are not shown.
2. That only a few days elapsed between the execution of a chattel mortgage and the taking possession of the mortgaged property is not of itself a badge of fraud.
3. Attachment of the debtor's property to secure a debt not due is not authorized by Pub. Acts 1889, No. 149, where the facts alleged in the affidavit as a basis for the attachment are consistent with an honest purpose on the part of other creditors to secure their just claims.
4. The right of attachment debtors to move to quash the attachment is not waived by the fact that a bond was given to the sheriff for their retention by a stranger to the suit in whose possession they were.
5. A writ of error is the proper remedy to review the overruling of a motion to quash an attachment after the entry of judgment in favor of the attachment creditor.

(October 4, 1892.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Gogebic County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an attachment proceeding brought to collect a claim against the copartnership of Peter Johnson & Co. Reversed.

Statement by Grant, J.:

This suit was commenced by attachment under Act No. 149 of the Public Acts of 1889. This Act authorizes the commencement of suit by attachment before the debt is due. The Act requires the affidavit to "show reasons for the immediate issuance of the writ to the satisfaction of the circuit judge." The affidavit was made by the attorney for the plaintiffs, and the only facts stated therein tending to show an exigency for the issuance of the writ are as follows: "That recently, and upon October 27, 1890, two certain chattel mortgages were executed and filed, covering the property of Peter Johnson and Sarah J. Healy, copartners; that the assignee of the mortgages has taken possession of the property therein described, and is now selling the same at retail, and at a rapid rate; that there has been placed on file in the office of the recorder of the city of Ironwood a bill of sale from Peter Johnson upon all his tangible personal property; and that the firm of Peter Johnson & Co. is wholly insolvent."

All other allegations in the affidavit are upon information and belief. The property seized was in the possession of a third party, who obtained a release of the property from the attachment by giving a bond conditioned for the payment of any judgment that might be recovered against the defendants Johnson and Healy. Neither of the defendants was a party to the bond. The defendant Healy appeared specially, and entered a motion to quash the affidavit and writ, for the reason, among other things, that the affidavit made no case to justify the issuance of the writ. This motion was overruled by the court. The defendants took no further steps, and judgment was entered against them upon default. Defendants bring error.

Messrs. Hammond & Kissane, with Mr. Edward Cahill, for appellants.
Mr. M. M. Riley for appellees.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not claimed that the chattel mortgages and bill of sale were not given to secure bona fide debts. The record does not contain either the mortgages or bill of sale. In the absence of any statement of the provisions of the mortgages, it must be presumed that the mortgages took possession and were proceeding to sell in

NOTE.—The only case we have been able to discover in which is considered the effect of a bond for dissolution of an attachment as an appearance in the action when the defendant is not a party to the bond is that of Clark v. Bryan, 16 Md. 171.

In that case it was decided, as in the above case, that such bond did not subject the defendant to the jurisdiction of the court. The defendant in the Maryland Case being a nonresident and not personally served a personal judgment against him in the action was held to be rendered without jurisdiction accordance with their terms. The law authorizes the debtor to give either or both to secure his creditors. The fact that the mortgagees took possession within a few days after the execution of the mortgages is not, of itself, a badge of fraud. Diligent and honest creditors may take this course to secure their debts. When the facts alleged in the affidavit are consistent with an honest purpose on the part of creditors to secure their just claims, no case is made to authorize the seizure of a debtor's property by attachment. The motion to quash should have been granted. The bond given by the party from whose possession the property was taken by the sheriff, and who was a stranger to the suit, in no manner affected the rights of the defendants, and did not operate as a waiver of their right to move to quash. After judgment, the writ of error was the proper remedy for a review of the proceedings in this court. Jewell v. Lamoreaux, 80 Mich. 155; Stall v. Diamond, 87 Mich. 429; Emerson v. McCormick Harvester Mach. Co. 51 Mich. 5; Warren v. Crane, 50 Mich. 300. The defendants had done nothing to waive the defect in the affidavit, or to confer jurisdiction on the court.

Judgment must be reversed, and judgment entered in this court quashing the proceedings. The other Justices concurred.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

City of BLOOMINGTON, Appt.,

v.

Frances J. LATHAM et al.

(.....Ill.....)

1. Assessment by special taxation is not justified by section 53 of the Illinois City and Village Act providing that in condemnation proceedings on supplemental petition an assessment may be made to raise the amount necessary to pay the compensation and damages awarded.

2. The constitutional requirement of just compensation to the owner of a lot of which part is taken and the remainder damaged by opening an alley across it cannot be complied with by charging the owner with the amount as a special tax on that part of his lot which is not taken. Such assessment would amount practically to confiscation.

Messrs. Benjamin & Morrissey, for appellees:

The ordinance and proceedings thereunder are contrary to the Constitutions of the state of Illinois, and of the United States, especially to that provision of the state Constitution which ordains that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation."

Magruder, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition filed in the county court of McLean county on November 19, 1891, by the city of Bloomington, for the appointment of commissioners to assess the special taxes to pay for the opening and extension of an alley in a block in that city, "including compensation for property taken or damaged, if any, or both, and the cost of an assessment of a special tax to pay therefor, and of the collection of the same, and of condemnation proceedings," etc. On the same day commissioners were appointed to assess the cost of said improvement in the manner prescribed by the ordinance hereinafter named, and the statutes, etc. On November 28, 1891, the commissioners took an oath to make a true and impartial assessment of the special taxes, and on December 4, 1891, made and returned their assessment roll. On December 16, Frances J. Latham, the owner of lot 1, hereinafter named, and Anna E. Loehr, owner of lot 2, hereinafter named, filed objections to the appointment of commissioners, to their report, to the confirmation of the same, and to the entry of judgment. On December 28, 1891, a hearing was had before the court on said objections, some of which were overruled and others sustained, and the petition of the city was dismissed. The orders sustaining the objections and dismissing the petition were excepted to. The present appeal is prosecuted from the judgment of the county court dismissing the city's petition.

The block above referred to lies between Front street on the north and Grove street on the south, and between Lee street on the east and Low street on the west. Lots 1 and 2, the former being east of the latter, run from Front street to Grove street; all the other lots in the block run to the middle of the block only. Before the passage of the ordinance hereinafter mentioned, an alley, 10 feet wide, ran from Lee street westward through the middle of the block to the east line of lot 1; and the lotowners west of lot 2 had conveyed to the city the ground for an alley 10 feet wide through the middle of the block eastward from Low street to the west side of lot 2. The object of the present proceeding is to connect the alley on the west with the alley on the east by extending them through lots 1 and 2, and by taking from the appellees for that purpose a strip of land 10 feet wide running through the middle of their lots. The petition recites that the city had adopted article 9 of the City and Village Act; that on July 31, 1891, it passed an ordinance for the opening and extension of said alley in said block, by which it is ordained, in section 1 thereof, that said alley be opened and extended from the east end of the alley west of said lots to the west end of the alley east thereof; in section 2, that the cost of opening and extending said alley, including the cost of real estate taken or damaged for that purpose, or both, and expenses, etc., be paid for by special taxation, and a special tax equal to the whole cost of said improvement and of collecting said tax be assessed and collected upon and from each of the lots or parcels of land abutting upon said alley along the proposed line thereof, in proportion to the frontage thereof upon said alley; in section 3, that, upon the approval by the city council of the report of the committee provided for in section 4, the city attorney filed in the county court a petition asking that compensation be made and ascertained by jury for private property to be taken or damaged, or both, for said improvement, and also a petition for the appointment of commissioners to assess the special tax therein provided for, as required by law; and in section 4, that three persons be appointed commissioners to make an estimate of the cost of said improvement, including compensation for property taken or damaged, if any or both, and the cost of the assessment and collection of the special tax and of the condemnation proceedings and report the same to the counsel. The petition then proceeds to state that, on the same day, the persons so appointed made their report, estimating the cost of said improvement, including compensation for property taken or damaged, or both, at $400, and the costs of assessing and collecting the special tax at $60; that the city council instructed its attorney to file this petition. The petition closes with a prayer for the appointment of commissioners to assess the special tax, as above set forth. The assessment roll, so filed by the commissioners, recited that they assessed the whole cost of the improvement, amounting to $1,375, against the property contiguous thereto, as provided by said ordinance, and that the amount of the special tax assessed against lot 1, owned by Frances J. Latham, was $626, and the amount thereof assessed against lot 2, owned by Anna Loehr, was $749. The petition for the assessment of the special tax, so filed on November 19, 1891, makes no reference to the proceedings taken under the petition filed for the condemnation of the property; but those proceedings were introduced in evidence upon the hearing of said objections, and show that, on August 6, 1891, the city filed a petition in said county court; containing copies of said ordinance and of the estimate of the cost of said improvement made by the committee appointed by the council, and stating that Frances J. and William A. Latham were owners of said lot 1, and Anna E. and Susan E. Loehr of said lot 2; that part of said lots would be taken or damaged for said improvement; that the city had been unable to agree with the owners as to compensation; that the council had instructed its attorney to petition for condemnation, and praying that just compensation for private property taken for or damaged by said improvement be ascertained by a jury; that the property owners were duly served with summons; that a jury was sworn and impaneled to ascertain and report the compensation, both parties appearing by their attorneys; and that on August 18, 1891, a judgment was rendered, in which, after reciting the appearance of the parties, and the jury having heard the evidence and arguments of counsel and received the instructions of the court, had returned a verdict finding the just compensation to be as hereafter stated in the opinion; it was adjudged that the defendants Latham receive of the city the said sums so awarded them "as the just compensation for the taking and damaging such land, improvements, and property, to wit, lot 1," etc.; and that the defendant Loehr receive of the city the said sums of money awarded "as the just compensation for the taking and damaging said land and property, to wit, lot 2," etc.; and that the city pay the said several sums so awarded, with the costs, into this court, or to Frances J. and William A. Latham and Anna E. Loehr, or to the treasurer of McLean county; and that, upon such payment being made, the city should have the right at any time thereafter to enter upon and take possession of the said lands, improvements, and property. Upon the hearing of the objections it was admitted by the city that, upon the trial of the condemnation suit, the city introduced testimony to show whether or not the opening of the alley would benefit the portions of the lot not sought to be taken, and how much in dollars and cents such benefit would be. It is assigned as error that the county court sustained the objections to the confirmation of the assessment. One of the objections so sustained is that this proceeding is in violation of section 18 of article 2 of the Constitution. That section, which is a part of the Bill of Rights, provides that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation." Section 2 of article 9 of the City and Village Act directs that, where the city or village provides by ordinance for the making of any local improvement, it shall by the same ordinance prescribe whether the same shall be made by special assessment, or by special taxation of contiguous property, or general taxation, or both. Sections from 8 to 15, inclusive, apply to cases where the local improvement named in the ordinance requires the taking or damaging of private property. The last-named sections specify the mode of proceeding to be adopted for making just compensation for the private property to be taken or damaged for said improvement. In pursuance of a petition to be filed by the city or village in a court of record, and after notice by service of process or publication upon the parties defendant, the compensation must be ascertained by a jury; and the final judgment rendered upon the finding of the jury is a lawful condemnation of the property to be taken, upon the payment of the amount of such finding in the manner therein provided. Section 53 of said article 9 provides that, in the same proceeding in which the judgment of condemnation is rendered, the city or village may file a supplemental petition praying that an assessment be made "for the purpose of raising the amount necessary to pay the compensation and damages which may be or shall have been awarded for the property taken or damaged, with the costs of the proceeding." In the case at bar the petition for the assessment of the special tax does not purport to be a supplemental petition in the eminent domain proceeding, but it must be regarded as such because there is no other provision in the statute for making an assessment to raise the amount awarded as compensation for the property taken or damaged, except that which is embodied in said section 53. Does section 53 apply to such a case as is presented by this record?

The ordinance directs that the cost of the real estate taken or damaged, or both, be assessed upon and collected from each of the lots abutting upon the alley along the proposed line thereof in proportion to the frontage thereof upon said alley. This means that the judgment in the condemnation proceeding for the value of the land taken, and for damages to the land not taken, shall be assessed upon the lots abutting upon the proposed alley in proportion to the frontage thereon. The proposed alley is to be opened across two lots only. Those lots are owned by two persons only. It follows that the property abutting upon the proposed alley is the remainder of the two lots after taking out the land required for the alley, and that said remainder is the only property that is damaged by the opening of the alley. Therefore the judgment for the value of the land taken is assessed against the remainder of the lots from which the land is taken, and the judgment for damages is assessed against the land damaged. The consequence is that the owners of the two lots are compelled, either in whole or in part, to pay the condemnation judgments rendered in their own favor, as benefits are not offset against such judgments in an assessment by special taxation. For example, judgment was rendered in favor of Mrs. Loehr, the owner of lot 2, for $365; $265 for the value of the portion of the lot taken, and $100 for damages to the part not taken; but this judgment is embraced in the amount of the special tax assessed against the part of her lot not taken, to wit, $749; so that she not only gets no compensation for her land taken and no compensation for damages to her land not taken, but she is compelled to pay out $384 in addition to her loss. The judgment in favor of Mrs. Latham, the owner of lot 1, was $950, $250 for the value of the portion of her lot taken, and $700 for damages to the part not taken; but, as $626 of this judgment is included in the amount of the special tax assessed against the portion of her lot not taken, she loses all of her judgment except $324. Practically and in effect there is here a taking of private property for a supposedly public use without just compensation.

The general doctrine is that the constitutional prohibition against the taking of private property for public use without just compensation has reference to the exercise of the right of eminent domain, and not to the exercise of the taxing power. A strict application of this doctrine to the facts of the present case involves the following propositions: That the proceeding to condemn a part of the two lots for the opening of the alley is an exercise of the power of eminent domain; that in that proceeding the land condemned cannot be taken by the city without paying the condemnation judgment; that, on the other hand, the proceeding for an assessment of the special tax upon the remainder of the lots is an exercise of the power of taxation; that the tax is imposed by the Legislature, or by a municipality authorized by the Legislature to impose it, for the purpose of raising money; that, as the imposition and collection of the tax do not require the exercise of the right of eminent domain, the constitutional prohibition has no application. Money is property, but where the Legislature, or a municipality acting under its authority, imposes a tax, many cases hold that the money raised by that tax—no matter how unjust the tax may be—is not private property taken for a public purpose without just compensation, within the meaning of the Constitution. The objection here, however, is not that the levy and collection of a special tax of $1,875 upon the lot is the taking of $1,875 in money from the taxpayers without any just compensation, either in the protection to be received from the government, or in the benefits to be conferred upon the residue of the property; but, on the contrary the objection is that, in the condemnation proceeding itself, a part of the lots was condemned and damage was inflicted upon the remainder without paying for the property so condemned and damaged, and without resorting to suitable means for the purpose of raising money to make such payment.

It has been held that a provision for compensation is an indispensable attendant upon the due and constitutional exercise of the power of depriving an individual of his property under the right of eminent domain. Sage v. Brooklyn, 89 N. Y. 189. Chancellor Kent has said that, to render valid the exercise of the power to take private property for public purposes, "a fair compensation must, in all cases, be previously made to the individuals affected, under some equitable assessment to be provided by law." Gardner v. Newburgh, 2 Johns. Ch. 162, 1 L. ed. 832, 7 Am. Dec. 826. Means must be provided whereby compensation can be obtained. Chapman v. Gates, 54 N. Y. 132. "Although it may not be necessary, within the constitutional provision, that the amount of compensation should be actually ascertained and paid before property is thus taken, it is . . . the settled doctrine . . . that, at least, certain and ample provision must be first made by law . . . so that the owner can coerce payment, through the judicial tribunals or otherwise, without any unreasonable or unnecessary delay." People v. Hayden, 6 Hill, 359. It is necessary that the Legislature, by some enactment, "make certain and adequate provision by which the owner can coerce compensation." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 615. Some cases have gone so far as to hold that the remedy must be one to which the party can resort on his own motion, and that, if the provision be such that only the public authorities appropriating the land are authorized to take proceedings for the assessment, it must be held to be void. Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 693, and cases in note 1.

In recognition of the doctrine that proceedings for condemnation of private property for public purposes, under the right of eminent domain, must be attended by legislative provision for making compensation, the General Assembly passed section 53 of article 9. Under 18 L. R. A.

that section it has become the practice in this state to institute proceedings in accordance with sections from 18 to 51, inclusive, of article 9, for the making of special assessments upon the property specially benefited by the improvement, in order to raise the amount necessary to pay the compensation for property taken. The special assessment proceeding does not secure a complete compensation in money, but it results in the payment of the condemnation judgment, either in whole or in part, by offsetting against it the special benefits received by the property from the improvement. In the recent case of Goodwillie v. Lake View, 187 Ill. 51, the compensation awarded to one of the property owners in the condemnation proceeding exceeded the amount assessed as special benefits in the special assessment proceeding, and it was there held that the property was properly assessed for the amount of the benefits received, but that the balance of the award should be paid by the city from its corporate funds. In other words, where the proceeding instituted under section 53 is by special assessment, the property owner is compensated for the taking of his property, either in special benefits alone, or in special benefits and money. If, therefore, section 53 is so construed as to authorize a proceeding by special assessment, we are not prepared to say that it does not make such provision for compensation as will satisfy the requirement of the Constitution. But we do not think that section 53 should be so interpreted as to justify a resort to assessment by special taxation. Special taxation does not proceed upon the theory that the assessment must not exceed the special benefits received from the improvement. Where there is an award of compensation for land taken, an assessment by special taxation of the amount of the award upon the land not taken is not an adequate provision for compensation, because it compels the property owner to pay for his own land. This is especially true, where, as here, the condemnation judgment is for damages to the land not taken, as well as for the value of the land taken. In such case the special tax, imposed, as it is, upon the abutting residue in proportion to its frontage, falls upon property which has been judicially determined to be damaged. The owner cannot offset benefits against the tax, and consequently the assessment is not equitable.

It is said that the power of taxation vested in the Legislature is practically absolute, but this is only true where such power is not restrained by constitutional limitations. While the Constitution authorizes cities to make local improvements by special taxation, it at the same time forbids the taking of private property for public purposes without just compensation. The two provisions must be construed together, and neither must be so construed as to nullify the other. We have seen that the constitutional prohibition against the taking of private property without just compensation involves and requires some provision, which shall be ample and equitable, for raising money to pay such compensation. Where the provision so made is the levy of a tax, such tax levy is the mode of obtaining the compensation which is required to be made. Thus the power of taxation and the right of eminent domain are made to go hand in hand. The one aids the other. The constitutional exercise of the right of eminent domain necessitates a resort to the power of taxation. The power of taxation, when thus invoked as a means of providing compensation for the taking of private property, is necessarily restricted by the constitutional requirement in regard to such taking. The taxing power must be so exercised as to give to the property owner a just compensation, and hence cannot be exercised arbitrarily. In this way, the constitutional prohibition against taking private property without just compensation, though strictly applicable only to a taking under the right of eminent domain, operates as a limitation upon the power of taxation. The prohibition requires just compensation, and therefore the assessment, which is made to effectuate the prohibition, must be so made as to realize a just compensation. Where a part of a man's lot is taken for an alley, and the balance of the lot is damaged by opening the alley, special taxation of the part of the lot not taken, in proportion to its frontage as it abuts upon the alley, affords no just compensation for the loss. We are therefore of the opinion that section 58 does not authorize assessments by special taxation. The section is correctly entitled in the Revised Statutes of 1874 as follows: "Supplemental petition to assess benefits in condemnation case." Hurd, Rev. Stat. 1874, chap. 24, § 167; Id. § 53, art. 9; Id. p. 240.

The views here expressed do not materially conflict with any decision heretofore made by this court upon the subject of special taxation. The cases to which we have been referred are those where the improvements sought to be made by special taxation have been such improvements as did not require the actual taking and damaging of the property. We have sustained special taxation as a mode of raising money to build sidewalks, to grade and pave streets, to lay sewers, etc., but we know of no case where a judgment in condemnation for land taken has been assessed back by special taxation upon abutting property in proportion to frontage. An ordinance which requires such a proceeding is an unreasonable ordinance, and it is well settled that city ordinances must be reasonable and not oppressive. Bloomington v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 134 Ill. 451; Hyde Park v. Carton, 132 Ill. 100; Tugman v. Chicago, 78 Ill. 405; Craw v. Tolono, 96 Ill. 255, 36 Am. Rep. 148; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 819, 821.

In White v. People, 94 Ill. 604, this court sustained the power of the Legislature to provide for the construction of sidewalks in cities and villages by special tax upon the adjoining lots according to their respective frontage upon such sidewalks. But there the sidewalk was part of an existing street, and was unquestionably a benefit to the property of the owner in front of whose lot it was built; nor did its construction require the taking of any part of said lot. In Craw v. Tolono, supra, where it was held that there was no personal liability upon the owner of such adjoining lot to pay the special tax so levied for building a sidewalk, the majority opinion used the following language: "Serious apprehensions are expressed lest, under the power to enforce special taxation upon contiguous property for local improvements, cities may, in case of very expensive improvements, abuse the power, and, under the form of its exercise, practically confiscate private property to public use. So long as it is confined to sidewalks, there is little cause for such apprehension. It will be time enough to consider the question when a case of oppression occurs." The present record reveals just such a case of oppression as is referred to in the Craw Case. In Allen v. Drew, 44 Vt. 174, the Supreme Court of Vermont, speaking through Mr. Justice Redfield, said: "We have no doubt that a local assessment may so transcend the limits of equality and reason that its exaction would cease to be a tax, or contribution to a common burden, and become extortion and confiscation. In that case it would be the duty of the court to protect the citizen from robbery, under color of a better name." If the assessment in the case at bar is confirmed, it will amount practically and in effect, to a confiscation of the property of the appellees. We are therefore of the opinion that the county court committed no error in sustaining the objections and dismissing the petition. Barnes v. Dyer, 56 Vt. 469; Washington Ave. 69 Pa. 352, 8 Am. Rep. 255; People v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 419, 55 Am. Dec. 286; Louise v. Newark, 88 N. J. L. 151; Harwood v. Bloomington, 124 Ill. 48; Macon v. Patty, 57 Miss. 378, 34 Am. Rep. 451; State v. Perth Amboy, 52 N. J. L. 133; State v. Ramsey County Dist. Ct. 29 Minn. 62; Genet v. Brooklyn, 99 N. Y. 296.

The judgment of the County Court is affirmed.

by a writing acknowledging the receipt of a specified amount of money in payment of a certain described sand-bar for one year with "the exclusive right to all gravel and sand for the year above named and excluding all other parties from said premises."

(November 17, 1892.)

In Druze v. Wheeler, 23 Mich. 489, the privilege given to certain persons to enter upon premises and shelter their teams whenever they attend a neighboring church was held not a lease but a mere li-

APPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to enjoin them from entering on certain land and removing sand therefrom. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Upton J. Hammond and Edwin St. G. Rogers, for appellant:

When the owner of land enters into an agreement, upon a sufficient consideration, subjecting it to an easement, or servitude, or profit a prendre, and the land is afterwards sold and conveyed to one who has actual or constructive notice of the agreement, the purchaser and grantee will take the land bound by the agreement, and will be restrained from violating it, whether the agreement is, or is not, one which in law runs with the land.

Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. 774; Parker v. Nightingale, 6 Allen, 841, 88 Am. Dec. 632; Whitney v. Union R. Co. 11 Gray, 359, 71 Am. Dec. 715.

But it is not the consideration in which the agreement had, as between the parties to it, its support, that makes the agreement affect and subordinate the land when afterwards sold and conveyed to some third person for value; but it is the actual or constructive notice which such third person has of the agreement when becoming the purchaser and grantee of the land, which essentially achieves that result.

Paul v. Connersville & N. J. R. Co. 51 Ind. 527; Davies v. Bear, L. R. 7 Eq. 427; Morland v. Cook, L. R. 6 Eq. 252; Raritan Water Power Co. v. Veghte, 21 N. J. Eq. 468.

Hence, the force of that class of cases where specific performance of a contract has been enforced against a vendee where the vendee, being familiar with the land, or having seen it shortly before becoming its purchaser and grantee, is held charged with constructive notice of the easement, or other similar right, to which the contract relates.

The privilege of reasonable storage room in the basement of a building given to a tenant of upper rooms is a license and not a lease of any part of the building. Cluett v. Sheppard, 181 Ill. 636.

An agreement to let millowners have two acres of ground to hold and use as their own as long as they keep the mill upon it and keep the same in running order, there being no words of grant or conveyance of any description whatever, is a mere license. Malott v. Price, 109 Ind. 22.

A grant by a sealed instrument upon a consideration of the liberty of flowing land for twelve years without restriction and for eighty years during the winter half of the year between November 15 and May 15 is a lease. Smith v. Simons, 1 Root, 818, 1 Am. Dec. 48.

One having board and lodging at a certain place in which particular rooms are designated for his occupation does not thereby become a tenant. White v. Maynard, 111 Mass. 260, 15 Am. Rep. 28; Wilson v. Martin, 1 Denio, 602.

But the mere furnishing of a private table and similar accommodations to a tenant of certain rooms in a building does not prevent his occupancy from being that of a tenant. Porter v. Merrill, 124 Mass. 534.

An agreement for the use of gardens and a music hall on four days for a series of four grand concerts at a specified sum per day was declared not to be a lease although the question was not strictly decided in the case. Taylor v. Caldwell, 8 Best & S. 826.

No demise of a room is made by merely letting standing room for machines and furnishing power to run them. Hancock v. Austin, 14 C. B. N. S. 634.

Permission for a monthly rent to use a stable for horses subject to by-laws, rules, and regulations of a railroad company which owns the stables was held not to defeat the occupation of the railroad company for the purpose of taxation. London & N. W. R. Co. v. Buckmaster, L. R. 10 Q. B. 70.

And a grant of liberty and license until either party gives one month's notice to fasten a coal bulk to moorings placed in a river for a certain annual payment was held not a demise for the purpose of taxation but only a license. Watkins v. Milton-Next-Gravesend Overseers, L. R. 3 Q. B. 350. 18 L. R. A.

As to minerals.

In Mountjoy's Case, And. 807, Godb. 17, 4 Leon. 147, it was decided that a grant of the right for a term of years to take from certain premises sufficient ore for a specified purpose did not exclude the right of the grantor.

And again in a later case it was held that a leave for a term of years to take ore from land at a yearly sum is a license and not a lease of the land. Ward v. Day, 4 Best & S. 387.

So the mere liberty of digging for coal in another's lands does not give an exclusive right to the coal. Chetham v. Williamson, 4 East, 487.

And the grant of liberty to dig, work, and mine minerals through all parts of a tract of land, to take and dispose of the same, is only a license and not a lease. Doe v. Wood, 2 Barn. & Ald. 724.

A grant of a right for a term of years to dig fire coal from under certain lands is merely a license which does not preclude the granting of a similar right to another person. Carr v. Benson, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 524.

So in Silsby v. Trotter, 20 N. J. Eq. 228, a contract simply giving a right to take a definite quantity of ore at a specified price within a certain time did not exclude the grantor's occupancy of the mine.

And in Grubb v. Bayard, 2 Wall. Jr. 81, a grant of the right to dig and carry away all the iron ore in a certain tract of land at a specified rate per ton was held not to be a grant of the ore but merely an irrevocable license.

An oral agreement that another may enter on one's lands to dig for ore and put buildings thereon for that purpose paying a specified sum per ton for the ore was held in Moore v. Miller, 8 Pa. 272, to be a lease and that it was a question for the jury on conflicting evidence whether the lease was for a year or at will. It does not appear in this case that the technical distinction between a lease and license was particularly considered, but the chief question was as to the substantial property right of the co-called lessee to continue his mining operations for the time agreed.

A grant of the right to take ore at a specified price per ton does not exclude the grantor but is something more than a mere revocable license and amounts to an incorporeal hereditament. Johnstown Iron Co. v. Cambria Iron Co. 82 Pa. 241, 73 Am. Dec. 783. In this case also the main question was as to the exclusiveness of the grantee's right in the mine.

A grant or lease of the right and privilege to mine coal for a term of years at a specified price per ton was said in Harlan v. Lehigh Coal & Nav.

Grant v. Munt, Coop. 173; Pope v. Garland, 4 Younge & C. 394; Bowles v. Round, 5 Ves. Jr. 508; Dyer v. Hargrave, 10 Ves. Jr. 506; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 611; Spath v. Hankins, 55 Ind. 155.

A parol license by the grantor to the grantee of land for the use of a way along the margin thereof, over other land of the grantor, does not create a right to the grantee which will fix a servitude upon the adjoining land after it has passed to a purchaser who had no notice of the supposed right.

Cox v. Leviston, 63 N. H. 288.

What the writing, and all that the writing, evinces in the way of intention in the direction of any sale and purchase of, or grant of, the sand bar, is no more nor less than an exclusive right, during the year 1890, of severing and removing gravel and sand from it.

Any lease that can be said to effect any transfer of any use or possession of land, as land, must first fulfill the condition of transferring some interest in land, as land.

Whether the writing be a lease is logically determinable by the distinction made in adjudged cases between a contract for the sale of so much gravel and sand from a sand-bar, or land, as the vendee may see fit, during a designated length of time, to enter the sand-bar, or land, and sever and remove, and a contract for the sale of the use or possession of the sand-bar, or land, during a designated length of time, in the sense of an immediate transfer to the vendee of the property in its contents of gravel and sand, before and independently of any severance of such sand and gravel by the vendee from the sand-bar, or land.

See Smith v. Simons, 1 Root, 818, 1 Am. Dec. 48; Owens v. Lewis, 46 Ind. 488, 15 Am. Rep. 295; Knight v. Indiana Coal & Iron Co. 47 Ind. 105, 17 Am. Rep. 692; Rogers v. Cox, 96 Ind. 157, 49 Am. Rep. 152; Martin v. Brewster Iron Min. Co. 55 N. Y. 538, 14 Am. Rep. 322; Moore v. Miller, 8 Pa. 272; Williams v. Gibson, 84 Ala. 228, 5 Am. St. Rep. 868; Fairchild v. Dunbar Furnace Co. 128 Pa. 465; Masot v. Moses, 8 S. C. 168, 16 Am. Rep. 697.

Each of the above cases is a case where some

Co., 35 Pa. 287, to grant an interest in the land and not a mere license, but the only question actually decided in that case was that there was no implied warranty of the existence of coal on the land.

In the later case of Funk v. Haldeman, 58 Pa. 229, the distinction between a lease and a license was distinctly taken and it was decided that a deed for a present consideration and also for a share of the minerals that might be found giving a right to bore and excavate for oil and other minerals and with the exclusive use of one acre of land around each well or tip and certain other privileges conveyed an incorporeal hereditament, but that it was a license coupled with an interest and not a lease.

Substantially the same decision was made in Gloninger v. Franklin Coal Co., 55 Pa. 9, 93 Am. Dec. 720, in respect to a grant of the "free right to dig coal" at a certain coal-bed.

So in Dark v. Johnston, 55 Pa. 164, 98 Am. Dec. 732, a contract for a present consideration and also for a share of the oil that might be found giving an exclusive right for ten years to sink and operate oil wells on certain lands was a mere license but not a revocable one.

Again in Union Petroleum Co. v. Bliven Petroleum Co., 72 Pa. 173, the exclusive right and privilege of boring for salt, oil, or minerals granted for a cash consideration and a share of the proceeds of the work to continue until a mutual agreement to annul it was held to be an incorporeal hereditament but without especially distinguishing between a lease and license.

In Shepherd v. McCalmont Oil Co., 38 Hun, 37, a grant of the right to bore for and take oil or other minerals, but not to hold possession of any part of the land for any other purpose, was held to be a license merely and not a grant of oil under the surface.

But the cases above are to be clearly distinguished from those in which all the minerals within certain land are expressly conveyed; such a conveyance grants an interest in the land and excludes the grantor from the mine. Hope's Appeal (Pa.) Jan. 4, 1888; Caldwell v. Fulton, 81 Pa. 475, 72 Am. Dec. 760; Mosot v. Moses, 8 S. C. 168, 16 Am. Rep. 697; Knight v. Indiana Coal & Iron Co. 47 Ind. 105, 17 Am. Rep. 692.

Thus the grant of minerals in and under land with a right to go upon the land and remove them and to occupy it with such constructions and buildings as may be necessary for the full enjoyment of the grant although reserving to the lessee the right at any time to abandon the land and mining was held a lease and not a license. Knight v. Indiana Coal & Iron Co. supra.

So a grant of the right for ten years to enter all or any part of a tract to dig and take away minerals "that may be found on, by any person or persons, or contained in any part" of all that tract, but not to work at any time more than one third of the land, was held a demise of the minerals for ten years, because it was held to show an intent to exclude the grantor. Masot v. Moses, supra.

The same was held of a conveyance of the full right, title, and privilege of digging and taking away coal to any extent the grantee might think proper. Caldwell v. Fulton, supra.

So a contract purporting to be a license from the superintendent of the United States lead mines for smelting lead ore for the period of one year at a specified rent was held to be a lease as it called for possession of the land. United States v. Gratiot, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 523, 10 L. ed. 673.

A conveyance of land reserving a specified quantity of ore at a certain price reserves a mere license. Stockbridge Iron Co. v. Hudson Iron Co. 107 Mass. 290.

In Grubb v. Bayard, supra, although the grant was of all the iron ore in the tract, the court regarded the fact that there was no obligation on the part of the grantee to mine any quantity as sufficient to prevent it from being anything more than a license as he was to pay only for what was mined.

Nothing more than a right or license or privilege to search and get the minerals is imported by the words "bargain and sell the right of digging for lead ore," which right is given for a specified gross sum. Gillett v. Treganza, 6 Wis. 842.

A license to work mines is necessarily an interest in lands, tenements, and hereditaments, which is within the Statute of Frauds, and possession under such a license created orally was held to be merely an estate at will. Dealoge v. Pearce, 38 Mo. 538.

In this case a six months' notice was held to terminate the right.

The right to dig and carry away ore in consideration of 1000 pounds of iron to be given from time to time is an incorporeal hereditament, and an oral agreement therefor is not valid but is good only as a license revocable at will. Riddle v. Brown, 20 Ala. 412, 56 Am. Dec. 202.

An oral contract for working a mine is a mere license and not a valid lease. Wheeler v. West, 71 Cal. 123.

B. A. K.

fixed and determinate part of the land became, by grant, separated in point of proprietorship, temporary or absolute, from the remaining part, being a proprietorship in some fixed and determinate part of the soil as such, as distinguished from proprietorship in a mere incorporeal right to enter on the soil to which the right generally extends and sever and remove from within its boundaries some unfixed and indeterminate portion of one or more of its component parts, to which the right specially relates.

In this case the right is to sever and remove gravel and sand from within the named boundaries of the "sand-bar" to the exclusion of any participant in such right, during the year 1890, as contradistinguished from the right or title to, or property in, all the gravel and sand within said named boundaries, and while and as part and parcel of and contained within the soil having such boundaries, and this forms the border line between the above cases, to which may be added:

Caldwell v. Fulton, 81 Pa. 475, 72 Am. Dec. 760; Harlan v. Lehigh Coal Nav. Co. 85 Pa. 287; Stewart v. Chadwick, 8 Iowa, 463; Caldwell v. Copeland, 87 Pa. 427, 78 Am. Dec. 436; Kier v. Peterson, 41 Pa. 357; Armstrong v. Caldwell, 53 Pa. 284; Pennsylvania Salt Mfg. Co. v. Neel, 54 Pa. 9,—and the cases of Gloninger v. Franklin Coal Co. 55 Pa. 9; Rutland Marble Co. v. Ripley, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 339, 19 L. ed. 955; Grove v. Hodges, 55 Pa. 504; Carnahan v. Brown, 60 Pa. 23; Punk v. Haldeman, 53 Pa. 229; Dark v. Johnston, 55 Pa. 164, 93 Am. Treganza*, 6 Wis. 343; Union Petroleum Co. v. Bliven Petroleum Co. 73 Pa. 173,—all of these being cases which proceed upon the ground of no title of any specific part of the land severed from the title of the land in general—an incorporeal hereditament.

The writing evinces a contract for the mere privilege, for the year 1890, of severing and removing such gravel and sand from the "sand-bar" as may be severed and removed at all during such year; so long as gravel and sand continue in their natural condition, and no act is done by the appellees towards their separation from the land, no property or title passes to the vendee. Had the appellant's vendor refused to permit the appellees, as vendees of such privilege, to enter on the land for the purpose of severing and removing from the freehold gravel and sand, as it was agreed they should be privileged to do, his refusal would have been only a breach of contract, remediable in an action for damages.

This case is ruled by Massot v. Moses, 3 S. C. 168, 16 Am. Rep. 697, where it was held that a grant, for a term of years, of the exclusive right to search for, take, and dispose of all phosphates found during the term in a designated tract of land was a demise of the beds or veins of phosphates contained in such land.

See also Knight v. Indiana Coal & Iron Co. supra; Fairchild v. Dunbar Furnace Co. 128 Pa. 485; Moore v. Miller, supra.

The right to get to the sand and haul it off would pass as a necessary incident to the grant even if the use of the premises were not given to the appellees.

McBride, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A construction of the following writing will determine every question presented by the record in this case:

"Indianapolis, Ind., April 21, 1890. Received of Fulmer, Cooper & Co. one hundred and seventy-five dollars, in payment of sand-bar on Fall creek, between Central avenue and Meridian street, and adjoining the land of F. W. Morrison on the south, and W. O. Patterson on the north, side of said creek for the year 1890. This is for the exclusive right to all gravel and sand for the year above named, and excluding all other parties from said premises. [Signed] W. O. Patterson."

When the writing was executed, W. O. Patterson, by whom it was executed, was owner in fee of the land on which the sand-bar referred to was located. On the 28th day of May following, he, with his wife, conveyed the land by warranty deed to the appellant, as trustee for himself (Heywood) and two other parties. This suit was brought to enjoin the appellees from entering upon the premises, and hauling away sand and gravel from the sand-bar in question. It is averred in the complaint that the appellees claim the right so to do by virtue of the foregoing writing. It is also alleged, in substance, that neither the appellant nor either of those united in interest with him had any knowledge of the existence of the writing in question at or before the execution of the deed to them, or any knowledge or notice that they had or claimed any such right to or interest in the land. The presentation of the question by both sides is able. The argument of counsel for the appellant is especially skillful and forceful. In deciding the case we will confine ourselves to the sole question discussed by the appellant. The determination of this question depends upon whether the writing above quoted is a lease, as the appellees contend, or is a mere license, under which, as against Patterson and others having notice of its existence, the appellees might enter upon the premises during the time limited, and remove an indeterminate quantity of sand and gravel, but which gives no interest in land itself, which is, we think, a fair statement of the appellant's contention. Among many definitions of a "lease" found in the books are the following: "A lease is a contract by which one person divests himself of, and another takes the possession of, lands or chattels for a term, whether long or short." Wood, Land, & T. § 208. "A lease at the common law is a grant or assurance of a present or future interest for life or for years, or at will, in lands or other property of a demisable nature, a reversion being left in the party from whom the grant or assurance proceeds." Platt, Leases, 1. "A lease is a species of contract for the possession and profits of lands and tenements, either for life or a certain term of years, or during the pleasure of the parties." 12 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, title, Lease, 976. "No particular form of expression or technical words are necessary to constitute a lease, but whatever expressions explain the intention of the parties to be, that one shall divest himself of the possession of his property, and the other shall take it for a certain space of time, are sufficient and will amount to a lease for years as effectually as if the most proper and permanent form of words had been made use of for that purpose." 12 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 977. "No precise form of words is 18 L. R. A.

necessary to make a lease. Any written instrument expressing the agreement of the parties, signed by one and accepted and acted upon by the other, will be obligatory upon both." Alcorn v. Morgan, 77 Ind. 184. In the case from which we quote the foregoing, the written instrument which the court there held to be a written lease was in form a receipt, but also contained independent stipulations sufficient, in the opinion of the court, to make it also a contract. A lease may not only confer upon the lessee the right to the occupancy of the leased premises, either generally for the time limited, or for some specific purpose or in some specific manner, or the right to occupy and cultivate and to remove the products of cultivation; but it may confer upon him the power to occupy and remove a portion of that which constitutes the land itself. Familiar and common examples of such leases are those authorizing the lessee to quarry and remove stone, to open mines and remove ores, minerals, mineral coal, etc., or to sink wells for procuring and removing petroleum and natural gas. The power to execute leases for such purposes, and the fact that the instrument by which such interest in land is granted may be in all essential particulars a lease, will not be questioned. Knight v. Indiana Coal & Iron Co. 47 Ind. 105, 17 Am. Rep. 692. Manifestly, there can be no valid reason why a lease may not confer upon the lessee the right to remove a portion of the soil, or of sand and gravel found upon the surface of the land leased, as well as to remove stone or iron ore or mineral coal, found either upon the surface or beneath it. In our opinion, the writing in question contains all of the essential elements of a valid lease. Like the writing referred to in Alcorn v. Morgan, supra, it is in form a receipt. Like that writing, also, it contains additional independent stipulations sufficient to make it a contract. Apply to it the definitions of a "lease" above quoted. It will be found that by its terms the lessor divests himself of and confers upon the lessee the possession of the land for a definite period. The language used, "This is for the exclusive right to all gravel and sand for the year above named, and excluding all other parties from said premises," is sufficient to exclude even the lessor himself from the premises during the year 1890, and to give to the lessee during that time the exclusive right to enter. Nor can it be said that the right to remove gravel and sand is the right to remove an uncertain and indeterminate quantity. The court has no means of knowing what quantity of gravel and sand may be on the premises. But, during the year 1890, the lessees have the exclusive right to all that may be thereon. If possible for them to remove all of it within the time limited, they have the right to do so. If any remained at the expiration of the term, it would, without doubt, revert to the lessor, but during the existence of the term the right to all is absolute. Our construction of the writing leads to an affirmance of the judgment. Judgment affirmed, with costs.

EQUITABLE FIRE & MARINE INSURANCE CO.

(.....R. L.....)

1. Notice to an insurance company at the time of the issuance of a policy that there is prior insurance will estop it from asserting that the policy is void under a condition against other insurance.
2. A policy of insurance conditioned against other insurance is avoided by the existence of other insurance at the time of its issuance although such other insurance is not in effect at the time of the loss.
3. Avoidance of an insurance policy for breach of a condition against other insurance by the existence of a prior policy is not prevented by the fact that the latter contains a like condition, although a void policy is not a breach of such a condition.
4. A condition against other insurance contained in a policy of insurance is not waived by the issuance of the policy after notice to a mere soliciting agent of the existence of additional insurance.

(July 16, 1902.)

ON DEMURRER to replication in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Overruled as to the first point and sustained as to the others.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Simon S. Lapham and John W. Hogan, for plaintiff:

The requirement for written assent to prior insurance may be waived by an insurance company and such waiver may be shown by acts and representations of its agents at the time of obtaining the policy as well as by conduct of the company.

Notice to the agent is notice to the company. The only proper way to give notice to a corporation is to notify an agent of it, as corporations can act only by and through agents.

Where there are two policies of insurance upon the same property and the second contains a provision against prior insurance without assent, the second insurer cannot set up the prior policy in defense to a suit upon its policy, where the first policy had expired at the time of the loss. New England F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Schettler, 88 Ill. 166, and cases cited.

A second policy of insurance avoids a prior policy upon the same property, where the first policy contains a provision for forfeiture in case of subsequent insurance without assent of company.

If the agent solicited the insurance from the plaintiff and was the sole representative of the defendant company with whom the plaintiff dealt, throughout the entire transaction, taking his application, examining the property, receiving the premium and delivering the policy as alleged in this replication, then the plaintiff was warranted in relying upon the representations of the agent as to the assent of the company to prior insurance as he alleges.

Minnock v. Eureka F. & M. Ins. Co. 90 Mich. 288; National Fire Ins. Co. v. Crane, 16 Md. 260, 77 Am. Dec. 269, and cases cited in note; Jennings v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 148 Mass. 61.

Even if the agent's representations are not effectual to estop the company from setting up the requirement for written assent as to prior insurance, the delivery of the policy itself after full notice constitutes in itself a written assent to such prior insurance, without the unnecessary ceremony of expressly assenting thereto by another writing.

Conditions which enter into the validity of a contract of insurance at its inception may be waived by its agents although they remain in the policy when delivered.

An insurance company cannot be allowed to avoid its contract by setting up a cause of forfeiture which its own agent has been instrumental in producing.

NOTE.—The state of the authorities and the conflict therein on the question of the waiver of a condition in an insurance policy by its issuance 18 L. R. A.

after notice to the insurance agent of the facts to which the condition applies are clearly shown by the opinion of the court.

Stiness, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sues upon a fire insurance policy dated January 10, 1891, for the sum of $1,800. The house and barn covered by the policy were totally destroyed by fire, November 5, 1891. The defendant's second plea sets up a condition that the policy should be void, except as to the interest of the mortgagee of the premises, in case the insured had or should afterwards have other insurance on said property without the assent of the defendant company in writing or in print, and avers that there was other insurance on said property, at the date of the policy, in the Attleboro Mutual Fire Insurance Company, without such assent, whereby the policy became void. To this plea the plaintiff replies—First, that the defendant had notice of the prior insurance at the time of making the contract; second, that there was no other insurance at the time of the loss; third, that as the Attleboro Company's policy had the same provision it became void upon the procurement of the policy in suit; and, fourth, that the plaintiff, before the issuing of the policy, informed the agent of the defendant company that the property was already insured in the Attleboro Company, as alleged in the plea. The defendant moved to strike out the first and fourth replications for certain technical defects, but these having been amended, the case now stands on demurrer to all the replications.

The first question is whether the defendant company is estopped from setting up the clause in question by notice to itself of the prior insurance at the time the policy was issued. The notice is not pleaded strictly as an estoppel, but, since the facts set forth can be shown on trial without special pleading, we see no reason why it may not be set up in the replication with the same legal effect that the fact would have in evidence. The same question was decided in Greene v. Equitable F. & M. Ins. Co., 11 R. I. 434, where it was held that a mistake in a policy, limiting the amount of insurance after due notice to the company of a larger amount, might be shown in evidence by way of estoppel. The ground of the decision was that it would be a kind of fraud for the insurer to insist upon a forfeiture for which they were more blamable than the insured. It would be taking advantage of one's own wrong. We see no reason to question that decision, and following it we must hold the first replication to be good.

As to the second replication, we think it is clear that, as the condition in question relates to the validity of the contract at its inception, it is immaterial what the facts were at the time of the loss. If the policy was invalid at its issue, for want of consent for other insurance, it was invalid altogether. If it was not invalid, then it does not appear to be void at all, and hence it is of no consequence what the fact was at the time of the loss.

To sustain the third replication, we think it must appear that "other insurance," in the sense of the policy, is valid insurance. It has been held that when a policy is void by its own terms it is no insurance and no breach of the condition relating to other insurance. See May, Ins. 2d ed. § 965, and cases cited.

The first policy in this case was valid prior to the date of the policy in suit. If the last policy was invalid, and there has been no subsequent insurance, it is difficult to see upon what ground the first policy is avoided, and the second held, as set up in the replication. With precisely the same clause in each policy the principle is not plain which would select the second as the subsisting policy and avoid the first. There may be good reason for saying that both should be avoided, as a guard against temptation on the part of the insured to obtain what he may suppose to be other good insurance; but we see no good reason for holding that the operation of the clause avoids the first policy and holds the second. In New England F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Schettler, 38 Ill. 166, cited by the plaintiff, it was held that other insurance on the property became void by a removal of the store insured from one lot to another, which was expressly assented to by the plaintiff in error, and hence there was no other insurance on the property to which the policy in suit attached after such consent, which was given upon the payment of a new consideration and increase of rate. The case is therefore quite distinguishable from the case at bar, and its syllabus seems to go beyond the decision. The cases of Carpenter v. Providence Wash. Ins. Co., 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 495, 10 L. ed. 1044, and Punko v. Minnesota Farmers Mut. F. Ins. Assn., 29 Minn. 347, 48 Am. Rep. 216, do indeed support the plaintiff's contention that the first policy was avoided by the issuing of the second, but upon the ground, which would be fatal to the replication, that both policies were avoided. We do not need to pass upon that question in this case, since under neither class of the cases referred to would the replication be good. If both policies are avoided by the operation of the clause in question, it is no answer to the plea to say that the first is void. If the other insurance must be valid insurance, the replication is not well founded in law, since under such a rule the first policy would not be avoided because of the invalidity of the second.

The fourth replication raises a question of greater difficulty, whether the fact that the plaintiff informed the agent of the defendant company, who procured the insurance, of the existence of other insurance, is a sufficient answer to the plea setting up the clause of the policy as to other insurance, and alleging the breach of it. Upon this point we think the tendency and weight of modern decisions are in favor of the plaintiff. In some of these cases, however, it is to be observed that the agents were general agents of the company, having full authority to make contracts of insurance and to issue policies, and consequently standing in the place of the company itself. See German Ins. Co. v. Gray, 43 Kan. 497, 8 L. R. A. 70, 19 Am. St. Rep. 150; American Ins. Co. v. Gallatin, 48 Wis. 36; Berry v. American Cent. Ins. Co. 182 N. Y. 49; Cross v. National F. Ins. Co. 132 N. Y. 133; Minnock v. Eureka F. & M. Ins. Co. 90 Mich. 236,—which were cases of general agents; Hayward v. National F. Ins. Co. 52 Mo. 181, 14 Am. Rep. 400, where the notice was given to the vice president of the company; and National F. Ins. Co. v. Crane, 16 Md. 260, 77 Am. Dec.

289, where the notice was given to the president of the company. Other cases hold that an agent to procure applications for insurance, and to forward them to the company, is an agent of the company who may waive the condition of the policy. Key v. Des Moines Ins. Co. 77 Iowa, 174; Kistler v. Lebanon Mut. Ins. Co. 128 Pa. 558, 5 L. R. A. 646; Farnum v. Phœnix Ins. Co. 88 Cal. 246; Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Wilkinson, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 222, 20 L. ed. 617; Eames v. Home Ins. Co. 94 U. S. 621, 24 L. ed. 298; Russell v. Detroit Mut. F. Ins. Co. 80 Mich. 407.

Most of the decisions of this class are based upon considerations of public policy; that the insured generally looks upon the agent of the company as its full and complete representative, and, in view of the apparent authority with which he is clothed, he must be so regarded, in order to protect the insured from an unconscionable advantage which the company may take from some provision of the policy. Doubtless there have been cases where the insurance companies have taken such advantage of the insured, but, doubtless, too, there have been quite as many cases where the insured have practiced imposition and fraud upon the company. The contract of insurance requires good faith on both sides. If a company cannot protect itself from fraudulent claims, either innocent stockholders must suffer, or all who have property to insure must contribute to such claims by the payment of rates sufficiently high to allow for the chances. There is much room for doubt, therefore, whether public policy requires the adoption of a rule which treats a contract of insurance differently from any other contract in writing. But, however this may be, we recognize the tendency of decision in favor of the insured, and, if this were a new question in this state, we might feel compelled to yield to the weight of authority. Opposed to this line of decisions, Massachusetts has stood almost alone, with a sturdiness characteristic of the commonwealth, and the decision of this court in Wilson v. Conway F. Ins. Co., 4 R. I. 141, was in harmony with the Massachusetts cases. In that case it was held that an agent who is empowered merely to receive applications to transmit to the company, and, if they chose to take the risk, to receive the policy and to issue to the applicant on payment of the premium, is not the agent of the company for the making of applications; that if he is employed by the applicant, or acts for him in drawing up the application, he is the applicant's agent, for whose mistakes the applicant is responsible; and that the company cannot be affected with notice by verbal communications made by an applicant to an agent so authorized. Stability of decision is very important in the administration of the law, and as this doctrine has stood so long in this state, apparently without question, and as it rests upon good reason, and is, moreover, in line with the rule of the state under whose law both these policies were issued, we see no sufficient ground to depart from it. See Batchelder v. Queen Ins. Co. 185 Mass. 449; Lohnes v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 121 Mass. 439. In Massachusetts general agents and officers of a company have authority to waive conditions in a policy. Little v. Phœnix Ins. Co. 123 Mass. 380, 25 Am. Rep. 96; Shawmut Sugar Ref. Co. v. People's Mut. F. Ins. Co. 12 Gray, 535; Priest v. Citizens' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 3 Allen, 602.

The replication in this case simply sets out that the plaintiff informed the agent of the company who applied to him for insurance of the existence of the prior policy. In our opinion, this is not sufficient to amount to a waiver.

The demurrer to the first replication to the second plea must be overruled, and the other demurrers sustained.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

SAVINGS BANK OF ST. PAUL, Appt.,

v.

Danet AUTHIER et al., and E. J. Daly, Respt.

(.....Minn.....)

*A summons directed to the defendant was served upon another person. The latter mailed to the defendant the copy served upon him, and the defendant received it by mail. Held, no service, and judgment having been entered on default, the defendant was entitled to have it set aside as void on motion, without showing a meritorious defense.

(December 27, 1892.)

APPEAL by complainant from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County setting aside a judgment in its favor in an action brought upon a bond conditioned to save it harmless and free from all loss by reason of the filing of mechanics' liens against certain real estate. Affirmed.

Daly was a surety upon the bond of which Authier was principal. The summons seems to have been regularly served upon Authier, and on November 19, 1891, a deputy sheriff of Ramsey county approached one, John E. Dailey, and asked him if his name was Daly. Upon receiving an affirmative reply the deputy handed him a copy of the summons and complaint. Dailey afterward discovered, upon reading the papers, that he was evidently not the person intended to be served, and he thereupon enclosed the summons and complaint in an envelope directed to E. J. Daley, St. Paul, Minnesota, and deposited the same in a letter box. This letter was received by E. J. Daly on December 4, 1891.

NOTE.—This brief case, although it may seem to be too plain for dispute, is reported in connection with the one following to illustrate the subject 18 L. R. A.

of personal service, as to which, see also Wilson v. Trenton, 16 L. R. A. 200, 53 N. J. L. 645.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. O. H. Comfort, for appellant:

Minn. Gen. Stat., chap. 66, § 59, provides that the summons shall be served "by delivering a copy."

This was done, at the latest, on December 4, 1891. It was then the mail carrier delivered it to him under circumstances sufficient to notify him that "service" was intended.

Under chap. 66, § 74, a "summons," which is not "process," but "notice," may be served by mail.

It is "the fact of service which gives jurisdiction and not the evidence of it."

Skillman v. Greenwood, 15 Minn. 102; Mills Lacs County Comrs. v. Morrison, 22 Minn. 179.

The court had jurisdiction of the action and of the parties, including this defendant, at the time the judgment was entered. Such a judgment may be "voidable, but is never void," and this principle needs no citation of authorities in this state.

By continuation of the act of the officer, by J. E. Dailey, the service upon him became service upon this defendant, being coupled with the notice (letter) stating these papers had been served, were intended for defendant, he hoped he would get them, etc.

Defendant consented to this and accepted such service as such continuation, and did not object to or return the papers to any one.

Defendant's neglect to at least attempt return of these papers estops him to say they were not served.

Frear v. Heichert, 34 Minn. 96.

Messrs. Williams & Schoonmaker, for respondent:

"The summons shall be served by delivering a copy thereof to the defendant personally."

Minn. Gen. Stat. 1878, § 59.

Some person must deliver to the defendant personally a copy of the summons, knowing that the paper so delivered is a copy of a summons, and intending to serve the same on the defendant for the purpose of commencing an action against him.

The person making the service must have authority from the plaintiff to make such service, otherwise there is no authority or intent to commence an action, and hence no service.

See Bardwell v. Collins, 9 L. R. A. 152, 44 Minn. 97.

The recognized way of serving process, in the absence of statutory provision, is by delivering a copy and showing to the defendant, if he desires it, the original.

Smith v. Kerr, 49 Hun. 29; Williams v. Von Valkenburg, 16 How. Pr. 153; Goggs v. Huntington, 12 Mees. & W. 503.

The mode of serving prescribed by statute must be strictly followed.

Haffner v. Gunz, 29 Minn. 108.

Even if the judgment be considered only voidable and not absolutely void, still the court was justified in vacating it.

Covert v. Clark, 23 Minn. 539.

Every defendant may insist that legal proceedings against him shall be conducted regularly and according to the law and practice of the courts, as well where he has a defense upon the merits as where he suffers a default to pass against him, and he is never obliged to disclose merits, or allege excuses (except, perhaps, unreasonable delay) when he assails his adversary's proceedings for irregularity or informality.

Mackubin v. Smith, 5 Minn. 367.

Dickinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order setting aside a judgment entered upon default against the above-named respondent with another in the district court. The court was right in setting aside the judgment, for no jurisdiction over the defendant had been acquired by a service of the summons upon him. It was shown so as to leave no room for doubt that the service, upon proof of which the judgment was entered, was really made upon another person,—one John E. Dailey. The latter, discovering the mistake, mailed to the defendant the copy of the summons served upon him, with a letter explaining the matter. The copy so sent by mail was received by the defendant before the entry of the judgment. Within a few days after the entry of the judgment the application was made to set it aside. The facts as to the service being as above stated, it is perfectly useless to try to sustain the judgment, or to oppose the order setting it aside. The transmission of the summons by mail was wholly unauthorized by law as a mode of service, and of no more effect, although the defendant received it, than would have been his finding it in the street if it had been lost. The statute not only prescribes that service shall be made by delivering a copy thereof to the defendant personally, (special provision being, however, made for a different mode of service at the house of his usual abode,) but it in terms declares that the provision with reference to the service by mail of notices and other papers in actions shall not apply to the service of a summons. Gen. Stat. 1878, chap. 66, §§ 59, 78.

The judgment being void for want of jurisdiction, the appellant was entitled to have it set aside, even though he made no showing of a meritorious defense. Haffner v. Gunz, 29 Minn. 108.

As the judgment might properly have been set aside without condition, the appellant has no reason to complain that conditions were imposed upon the respondent not prejudicial to the appellant. He cannot complain that the respondent was allowed to answer, interposing any defense which he might then have.

Order affirmed.

ILLINOIS APPELLATE COURT.

J. Fred TREFTZ, Appt.,

v.

Edward L. STAHL.

(.....Ill. App.)

1. An affidavit is not sufficient as a basis for setting aside of a judgment entered after trial ex parte which states simply that defendant "has fully stated his case to his attorney, who has advised him that he has a good defense on the merits to plaintiff's action."
2. That service of notice of a motion to place a case on the short-cause calendar is defective because the copy was left only with one who merely has desk room in the office which defendant's attorney occupies is waived if such attorney acquires knowledge of the attempted service and with reason to believe that plaintiff's attorney is relying on such service suffers the case to be placed upon such calendar and tried without objection.
3. Knowledge on the part of defendant's attorney of an attempted service upon him of a notice of motion to place a case upon the short-cause calendar by leaving a copy with a co-occupant of the same office will be assumed where it is not positively denied but the affidavits of denial merely deny facts the nonexistence of which is perfectly consistent with such knowledge.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County refusing to set aside a judgment rendered after an ex parte hearing in favor of plaintiff in an action appealed from a Justice's Court. Affirmed.

The Illinois Practice Act requires every case to be placed on the docket in the order of its commencement, and to be called and tried in its order on the docket.

As constituting an exception in certain cases to the provisions of the above Act the Legislature passed the following Act:

Be it enacted by the People of the State of Illinois, represented in the General Assembly: That it shall be the duty of the clerk of each court of record, in this state, to prepare a trial calendar, in addition to the regular trial calendar, of each court, to be known as the "Short-cause Calendar." Upon the plaintiff, his agent or attorney, in any suit at law pending in any court of record, filing an affidavit that he verily believes the trial of said suit will not occupy more than one hour's time, and upon ten days' previous notice to the defendant, his agent or attorney, said suit shall be placed by the clerk upon said "Short-cause Calendar."

NOTE.—The practical importance of the question involved in the above case as to the waiver of defective service of motion papers and the fact that such questions rarely reach courts of last resort, furnish good reason for reporting the above case in this series. In addition to this the decision seems to be quite unusual. The general rule is that service must be personal in the absence of any specified provision as to the mode, and in this 18 L. R. A.

On February 11, 1892, one of the attorneys for plaintiff in this case filed an affidavit stating that he verily believed that the trial of the suit would not occupy more than one hour's time. On the same day a notice was drawn informing defendant's attorney that such affidavit had been filed and that the clerk of court would place the suit on the short-cause calendar for trial as the statute provided. On February 13, 1892, one A. N. Eastman made affidavit that he served the notice by leaving a true copy on February 11, 1892, with a person giving his name as Burdett, in charge of the office of said defendant's attorney. On March 7, 1892, and in the absence of defendant or any attorney representing him, the cause was reached on the short-cause calendar and called for trial, and judgment was entered against defendant.

Subsequently a motion was made by defendant to set aside the verdict and judgment and grant a new trial upon the ground that neither defendant nor his attorney were ever directly or indirectly notified that said cause had been placed on the short-cause calendar for trial, and that the same was improperly and irregularly placed thereon.

In support of said motion an affidavit was filed by defendant in which he stated that he had fully stated his case to his attorney who had advised him that he had a good defense on the merits to the plaintiff's action. That no notice that said cause was to be placed on the short-cause calendar had ever been served on the defendant and that he had no knowledge that said cause had been placed on said calendar or was to be tried at the present term until after it had been called and disposed of by the court.

Also an affidavit of William F. Bigelow, defendant's attorney, stating that deponent had no notice that said cause had been placed on the short-cause calendar and was to be brought to trial at the present term of court. That "he has not now and never has had any business relations with John B. Burdett who has desk room" in the same office with deponent, "but never has been in charge of said office." That both Burdett and deponent "are now and for several months prior hereto have been subtenants, having only desk room in the said room; that deponent never at any time authorized nor requested Burdett to accept service of papers for deponent; that he had no knowledge that said cause had been placed on the short-cause calendar and was to be tried at the present term of court until after it had been called and disposed of."

Also an affidavit of John B. Burdett to the effect that he was a subtenant and had desk case it seems that no mode of service was specified; but service not personal is upheld on the ground that the defect was waived by mere failure to object to its sufficiency.

For the general rule as to what constitutes personal service, see the preceding case of St. Paul Sav. Bank v. Arthur (Minn.), ante, 498; Wilson v. Trenton, 16 L. R. A. 200, and note, 53 N. J. L. 645, reviewing the authorities on the subject.

room in the same office with defendant's attorney; that he had never been connected as an employé or otherwise with such attorney; that he was never authorized nor requested to receive papers or accept service of same for said attorney; that he never had charge of said attorney's office. That "on February 11, a person to deponent unknown, handed deponent the paper (the above-mentioned notice) and at the same time requested deponent to give it to Bigelow. That deponent did not then know or learn the contents of said paper. That he forgot to give the paper to Bigelow or to notify him of its existence, or that he had same in his possession, until about three o'clock on the afternoon of March 7, when he was asked by Bigelow if he had ever received such paper. Also another affidavit by Burdett to the effect that he had desk room in the same room as Bigelow, that he was not an attorney, or engaged in the practice of law, but was a dealer in patented inventions. That he never had charge of Bigelow's office, nor represented to Eastman or any other person that he did have such charge. That he is a total stranger to defendant and is not and never was his agent or attorney.

The motion was overruled and the defendant took this appeal.

Messrs. William F. Bigelow and George A. Gary, for appellant:

To authorize the placing of a case on the short-cause calendar, the statute requires ten days' previous notice to the defendant, his agent or attorney.

8 Ill. Stat. (Starr & C.) p. 1000.

The statute does not specify the mode of service. In such a case the service must be personal.

Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Smith, 78 Ill. 97; St. Louis v. Goebel, 82 Mo. 295; Doulin v. Hettlinger, 57 Ill. 348.

In this case there was no pretense of any personal service on the defendant, his agent or attorney.

There was no authority conferred on the court below, nor on its officials, to place this cause on the short-cause calendar, and that court had no jurisdiction to try the case when reached thereon.

O'Conner v. Mullen, 11 Ill. 60; Chase v. Hathaway, 14 Mass. 222; Keech v. People, 23 Ill. 478; Long v. Thompson, 60 Ill. 27; Gavin v. Wells County Comrs. 104 Ind. 201.

By trying the case without the notice to defendant required by statute, and without his knowledge, he was deprived of his day in court. To this he was entitled, and it means "the day on which the cause is reached for trial in pursuance of the forms and methods prescribed by law."

Ketchum v. Breed, 66 Wis. 92; Ogden v. Davidson, 81 Va. 759.

In trying the case and entering judgment at the time it did the court below itself violated the express provisions of the Practice Act, and its judgment must be void.

Practice Act, chap. 110; Rev. Stat. §§ 15, 17; Clapp v. Rauch, 90 Ill. 468.

How was the circuit court on March 7 last, or how is this court even now, to know that the former on that date had authority, by 18 L. R. A.

virtue of any fortuitous cognition of the notice by Bigelow to then try the case?

Allen v. Strickland, 100 N. C. 225.

The court then knew from Eastman's affidavit that no legal service on defendant, his agent or his attorney, had been made, and that the foundation of its jurisdiction had not been laid.

Authority is jurisdiction.

Anderson, Law Dict. def. Jurisdiction, p. 580.

A judgment rendered without jurisdiction to enter it at the time of its entry is not merely irregular or voidable, but it is void.

Ferguson v. Jones, 8 L. R. A. 620, 17 Or. 204; Alderson v. Marshall, 7 Mont. 288; Davidson v. Clark, Id. 100.

It is clearly established that the copy of the notice left with Burdett did not reach Bigelow until after trial; nor till then did knowledge of its existence reach him through Burdett. This court's theory, therefore, must be that notice in writing or by copy is not necessary.

Allen v. Strickland, supra.

If staying out of court and suffering the case to go on is a waiver, of what use is service of process in any case?

The objection cannot be overcome by the claim that this was not process, but only notice.

Hollingsworth v. Barbour, 29 U. S. 4 Pet. 472, 7 L. ed. 924.

If this court insists upon ruling that, in the absence of an express statutory provision therefor, service upon a stranger, or leaving with a stranger for delivery to the real party, a writ or notice, constitutes service of any kind upon such party, the assertion is respectfully ventured that in such a holding it will enjoy the unique distinction of standing alone among courts.

Fowler v. Mosher, 85 Va. 421; McConkey v. McCraney, 71 Wis. 576; Watertown v. Robinson, 69 Wis. 290; Witt v. Meyer, Id. 598.

Where a statute provides for service but is silent as to the method, personal service is required.

McDermott v. Board of Police for Metropolitan Police Dist. 25 Barb. 686; Rathbun v. Acker, 18 Barb. 898; People v. Lockport & B. R. Co. 13 Hun. 211; St. Louis v. Goebel, 82 Mo. 295; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Smith, 78 Ill. 97.

Even if the notice had been turned over by Burdett to Bigelow on the day of its delivery, the service would have been void and no authority conferred on the circuit court to act.

Harrell v. Mexico Cattle Co. 78 Tex. 612; Ferguson v. Jones, 8 L. R. A. 620, 17 Or. 204; Alderson v. Marshall, 7 Mont. 288; Davidson v. Clark, Id. 100.

The statute does not contemplate and never intended service by proxy and at random, and no advantage whatever can inure to the plaintiff by reason of such service.

Watertown v. Robinson, 69 Wis. 280.

Because of failure of legal service the judgment was and is void.

Windsor v. McVeigh, 98 U. S. 274, 28 L. ed. 914; Smith v. Woolfolk, 115 U. S. 148, 29 L. ed. 857; Ferguson v. Jones, supra; Clapp v. Rauch, 90 Ill. 468; Fisher v. National Bank of Commerce, 78 Ill. 34; Angel v. Plume & A. Mfg. Co. 78 Ill. 412; Grinwald v. Shaw, 79 Ill. 449.

Messrs. Weigley, Bulkley & Gray, for appellee:

Assuming that the service of this notice upon Burdett, a regular occupant of the office with Bigelow, is not a compliance with the statute, the placing of said case upon the short-cause calendar and proceeding with the trial of the same when reached upon said calendar does not make the judgment rendered in the cause a void judgment.

The circuit court had jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter in controversy, and having jurisdiction the judgment entered would not be void, however irregular.

Stempel v. Thomas, 89 Ill. 147; Graceland Cemetery v. People, 92 Ill. 619.

Gary, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is no indication of any merit in the case of the appellant. His affidavit filed to set aside proceedings only states "that he has fully stated his case to his attorney, who has advised him that he has a good defense on the merits to plaintiff's action." Who was the attorney, or what was the statement on which he advised, does not appear. The affidavit should have stated the facts on which he rests a defense. Roberts v. Corby, 86 Ill. 182.

The case was tried ex parte on the short-cause calendar. The service of a copy of the affidavit and notice necessary to get the case upon that calendar may be admitted to be defective, but the indications are strong that the appellant's attorney had knowledge that such service had been made upon a co-occupant of his office.

These indications are in the care with which the attorney swears that he had no notice that the case "had been placed on the short-cause calendar and was to be heard at the then term of court."

If, having the notice and affidavit before him, he kept still, he would not have the notice which he denies, nor is his own affidavit helped out by that of his office companion "that he forgot to give (the paper to the attorney) or to notify him of its existence, or that he had same in his possession," etc.

Notwithstanding all of these denials, the attorney of the appellant may have been fully aware that the affidavit and notice had been left for him at his office, and had good reason to believe that the attorneys of the appellees were relying upon the services as sufficient, and about to proceed in conformity to the notice.

With such knowledge and reason to believe, if the attorney of appellant laid by and suffered the case to go on upon the short-cause calendar without objection, the irregularity of the service was waived. "The rule in cases of mere irregularity requires the party to move at the first opportunity, or show an excuse for not doing so. Where the merits are involved, the rule is not applied with so much rigor." Lawrence v. Jones, 15 Abb. Pr. 110.

Here, as before said, there is no indication of any merit with the appellant.

This view of the case renders it unnecessary to consider whether the motion to set aside the verdict and judgment, actually filed, but not called to the attention of the court during the term at which the case was disposed of, could be granted by the court at a subsequent term. See Prall v. Hunt, 41 Ill. App. 140.

The judgment is affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Indiana, Appl.,

v.

INDIANA & ILLINOIS SOUTHERN
R. CO.

1. The rule that penal statutes are to receive a strict construction is not violated by taking the common-sense view of the statute as a whole and giving effect to the object of the Legislature if a reasonable construction of the words permits it.
2. A statute providing that a "corporation, company, or person" operating a railroad shall place in the passenger depot of such "company" a blackboard upon which such "company or person" shall cause to be written the fact as to whether trains are on time is clearly intended to apply to corporations as well as natural persons although the word "corporation" is not repeated in each clause.
3. The words "each passenger depot . . . located at any station . . . at which there is a telegraph office" at which a railroad company is required by the Indiana Act of 1889 to provide a blackboard on which shall be stated whether a train is on time or not, do not mean merely the station house for passengers but include every station where a train stops if there is a telegraph office at such point at which information is received as to the arrival of trains at such stopping place.

4. What constitutes a passenger depot or a station at a particular place is a question of fact.
5. The penalty for failure to report on a blackboard the time of the arrival of trains provided by Act 1889, § 2, cannot be avoided by the failure to provide a blackboard, which is expressly required to be done by § 1 of the Act.
6. A statute requiring a report on a blackboard as to whether trains are on time at every station where there is a telegraph office is not unconstitutional as class legislation where it applies uniformly to all persons operating railroads and to the same class of stations.
7. A court judicially knows that telegraph lines are maintained, operated,

NOTE.—No similar statute seems to have been adjudicated prior to the above decision upon the 18 L. R. A.

Indiana statute to compel railroad companies to furnish blackboard notices of the time of trains.

and used in connection with railroads, and are necessary to their proper operation.

8. A penalty recoverable by a civil action although called a fine in the statute providing for it is not a fine within the meaning of the Indiana Constitution, art. 8, § 2, providing that "fines assessed for breaches of the penal law of the state" shall go to the common school fund.

9. Giving a prosecuting attorney an interest in a penalty does not prevent due process of law.

10. More than one penalty can be incurred by violating the Indiana Act of 1889, which requires a report at each railroad station at which there is a telegraph office as to whether trains are on time and that "for each violation" in failing to report or making a false report a penalty may be recovered, but there can only be one forfeiture as to one train at any particular station on the same trip.

11. A state statute requiring railroad companies to report at each station at which there is a telegraph office whether trains are on time or not is not a regulation of interstate commerce, although the information to be noted must be received from an agent in another state through the agency of a telegraph company engaged in interstate commerce.

A PPEAL by the state from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Greene County in favor of defendant in a proceeding brought to enforce the statutory penalties for defendant's failure to provide blackboards and note thereon information as to the movements of trains. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. C. Hults, O. B. Harris, John C. McNutt, A. F. Wray, Thomas B. Adams and Isaac Carter for appellant.

Messrs. John T. Hays, H. J. Hays and P. H. Blue, for appellee:

The rules of strict construction control. A court cannot create a penalty by construction, but must avoid it by construction, unless it is brought within the letter and the necessary meaning of the Act creating it.

The statute does not apply to corporations, by reason of the omission of that word.

See Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, § 336; Remington v. State, 1 Or. 281.

It cannot be maintained that the word "corporation" is embraced in the terms "company or person."

It is the duty of the court to avoid a construction which would imply that the Legislature was ignorant of the meaning of the language it employed.

If the Act is valid the penalties are not cumulative.

If the putting up of the blackboard is a part of making the report, so long as that failure continues, it remains one and the same failure, and but one penalty could be assessed; after which a resort might be had to mandamus, whereby the party injured, if any one, could compel the erection of a blackboard.

Upon the question of when penalties will be construed as cumulative, and when not so—

See Parks v. Nashville, O. & St. L. R. Co. 18 Lea, 1.

There can be but one penalty growing out of the provisions of the Act, in failing to report, and another out of the violation of the provision, in making a false report.

The Act is in conflict with § 1, art. 14, of the Federal Constitution, and § 12, art. 1, of the state Constitution.

The Act deprives railroad companies of these great constitutional rights, in this: that it, in effect, offers a bribe to a judicial officer who is intrusted with the administration of justice.

It not only selects that class of citizens who operate railroads best, and enjoins a continuous and arduous duty on them, not enjoined on those who operate railroads poorly, and not enjoined on any other common carrier, but for any failure of this lasting, continuous, and never ending duty, it bribes a public officer, one whose public duties are directly connected with the administration of justice, so that, as to this class, the laws are harshly enforced as against no other class of citizens.

As a class, they are to be arraigned by an officer of the court, who no longer stands as an impartial representative of the state.

As a class, they are arraigned and prosecuted by a judicial officer, who is impelled to a bitter prosecution by the powerful motive of private greed and personal gain.

No other class of citizens is enforced into a compliance with the law by means of the prosecuting attorney getting one half the penalties.

Olds, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by the prosecuting attorney of Greene county, Indiana, to recover penalties under an Act of the Legislature requiring persons and corporations operating railroads to place blackboards in conspicuous places at their stations and write upon them the fact as to whether or not the trains stopping at such stations are on time, and if late, how much.

The complaint consists of numerous paragraphs. A demurrer was addressed to the complaint for want of facts and sustained, exceptions reserved and this appeal prosecuted, and such ruling assigned as error. The error assigned presents the question as to the validity of the statute upon which such action is 18 L. R. A.

based. Section 1 of the statute, approved March 9, 1889, reads as follows: "That every corporation, company, or person operating a railroad within this state shall, immediately after taking effect of this Act, cause to be placed in a conspicuous place in each passenger depot of such company located at any station in this state at which there is a telegraph office, a blackboard at least three feet long and two feet wide, upon which such company or person shall cause to be written, at least twenty minutes before the schedule time for the arrival of each passenger train stopping upon such route at such station, the fact whether such train is on schedule time or not, and if late, how much."

Section 2 provides "that for each violation of the provision of this Act in failing to report or in making a false report, such corporation, company, or person so neglecting or refusing to comply with the provisions of this Act, shall forfeit and pay the sum of twenty-five dollars, to be recovered in a civil action to be prosecuted by the prosecuting attorney of the county in which the neglect or refusal occurs, in the name of the State of Indiana, one half of which shall go to said prosecuting attorney and the remainder shall be paid over to the county in which such proceedings are had, and shall be part of the common school fund."

Numerous objections are urged to the validity of this statute. Some criticism is made in regard to the wording of the statute in that it is indefinite and inoperative for the reason that it provides that a "corporation, company or person" operating a railroad shall place in the passenger depot of such "company" a blackboard, upon which such "company or person" shall cause to be written, etc. It is contended that as it is a penal statute it must receive a strict construction and that nothing can be supplied as intended by the Legislature, to determine its meaning, and therefore the statute does not apply to corporations for the reason that the word "corporation" is omitted, the statute providing that blackboards shall be placed in the company's office and that the company or person shall cause to be written upon the board. The further objection is made that the statute provides that the blackboards shall be placed in each passenger depot located at any station at which there is a telegraph office and that a passenger depot is commonly understood to be a house for the accommodation of passengers, while a station is a place such as a city, town, and intermediate-way stations where trains stop, so that if there is a telegraph office in the city or town where the railroad company has a passenger depot, no difference to whom the telegraph line belongs or by whom operated, or whether it has any connection with the operation of the railroad or not, yet at each passenger depot within such city or town there must be placed a blackboard upon which shall be written the fact whether the trains are on time, and if late, how much.

It is true that penal statutes as a rule are to receive a strict construction, but this rule is not violated by adopting the sense of the words which best harmonize with the object and intent of the Legislature, and the whole context of the statute must be construed together.

Courts are to take a common sense view of the statute as a whole, and if by so doing and giving to the words used a reasonable construction the object of the Legislature can be definitely ascertained and carried out, the statute must be upheld; if not it must fall. See State v. Hirsch, 125 Ind. 207, 9 L. R. A. 170.

The draughtsman was careless in the use of language in constructing this statute. It might have been framed so as to have avoided the criticism urged, but we think the intent and object of the Legislature is clear and certain, notwithstanding it is awkwardly expressed. It is manifest and certain that it was intended to require all persons, whether natural or artificial, who were engaged in operating a railroad in this state to put up in a conspicuous place at each passenger depot provided for the use of passengers traveling upon such railroad, in connection with which depot there was a telegraph office, a blackboard, and to enter upon such blackboard, at least twenty minutes before the schedule time for the arrival of each train, the fact whether such train is on time or not, and if late how much. By "passenger depot" was not meant merely the station house built for the accommodation of passengers, but the grounds prepared and used as depot grounds for the benefit of persons traveling upon the particular railroad, and used by the company at such point in operating it as a common carrier of passengers. It is evident that it was intended that a board should be put up at every station where the train was stopped, if there was a telegraph office at such point, at which office was received information as to the time of the arrival of trains at such stopping place; and it is equally certain that it was not intended to require such notice written if there was not a telegraph office at such place which received information as to the time of the arrival of trains. It is not essential that such telegraph office should be in the house built for passengers, but if there is an office at such stopping place, operated in connection with the railroad, receiving and giving information as to the time of arrival and departure of trains on such road, there would be a liability for failure to write the notice required by the statute. The word "station" as used in the statute is used synonymously with the words "passenger depot," meaning the place, the grounds and the buildings prepared for and used by the traveling public at such point in waiting for, taking, and leaving the trains, and by the company in operating the road at that point. As to just what constitutes a passenger depot or a station at a particular place is a question of fact.

It is next contended that as section two only provides a penalty for failing to report, or in making a false report as to whether a train is on time, or if late, how much, that no penalty can be incurred until a blackboard is put up on which to note the fact as to whether the trains are on time or late, and if late, how much. We cannot concur in this interpretation of the statute. The plain and evident intention of the statute is that the object sought is to require the noting of the fact as to whether trains are on time or not, and if late how much, and the putting up of blackboards is a mere incident.

Section 2178, Rev. Stat. 1881, provides a penalty for failing to sound the engine whistle upon approaching a road crossing, at a distance of not more than one hundred nor less than eighty rods from such crossing; and section 4020, makes it the duty of railroad companies to have attached to each engine a whistle and bell. We do not think that the penalty of section 2178 could be avoided by a failure to comply with section 4020, in providing a whistle and bell for each engine, and yet if the contention of counsel for the appellees be correct, railroad companies might with impunity run engines without any whistle or bell attached, and the persons in charge of the engines would not be liable to the penalty prescribed for failure to sound them. Section 4020 as originally passed (Acts of 1879, p. 173), made it the duty of railroad companies to have attached to each and every locomotive engine a whistle, and made it the duty of the engineer or other person in charge of the engine, on approaching a road crossing, to sound the whistle at a distance of not more than one hundred rods nor less than eighty rods, and to continue to sound it until the engine passed the crossing. Section 2 of the Act provided a penalty of not less than ten nor more than fifty dollars for a violation of the provisions of section 1, and this Act was held to be constitutional in the case of Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Brown, 87 Ind. 45. Indeed, to hold the law under consideration void on the grounds contended for by counsel would be to hold that a party can avoid the penalty prescribed by the statute by a failure or refusal to comply with a duty imposed upon him by the same statute. In other words, the law makes it the duty of persons operating a railroad to put up blackboards at each station where there is a telegraph office and to note on the same the fact as to whether or not each train is on time, and if late, how much, and prescribes a penalty for failure to note on the boards the fact as to whether or not each train is on time, etc. The contention is that the penalty can be avoided by a refusal or neglect to perform the duty of putting up the blackboard for the reason that this duty precedes the entering of the fact as to the time of the trains. We do not think a party can avoid the doing of an act for the omission of which a penalty is prescribed by statute by a failure to do what is necessary to be done in performing the act. If the act had made it the duty of all persons and companies operating railroads within this state to enter upon a blackboard in a conspicuous place at each station where there was a telegraph office, twenty minutes before the schedule time of each train, the fact as to whether or not such train was on time, and if late, how much, and prescribed a penalty for omitting to make such entry, the operators of railroads would have been compelled to have provided the means of carrying out the law and complying with its provisions. The imposing of the duty to do a certain thing carries with it the doing of such things as are necessary to perform the duty commanded. The statute by making it the duty of persons or companies operating railroads to enter the fact as to the time of the arrival of trains upon a blackboard in a conspicuous place at the station imposed upon such persons the necessity and burden of placing blackboards in conspicuous places for they could not make such entries without doing so, unless they were already provided. The duty of putting up blackboards would be imposed if it were not specifically stated in the Act. It is suggested that railroad companies might be compelled by mandate to put up the boards and when compelled to put them up, then they would be liable for the penalty for a failure to enter the fact required on the boards. If the theory of counsel is correct, this would not avoid the objection urged to the law, for if the argument be carried to its legitimate length and the technical and strict construction contended for placed upon the statute, it requires that "such company or person shall cause to be written, at least twenty minutes before the schedule time for the arrival, etc., the fact whether such train is on schedule time, etc.; and if there were blackboards up it might then be said that it required chalk or some other like substance to write upon the board, and there is no provision for compelling the company to provide chalk, and no penalty for failure to provide it, and as it was necessary to have something to write with before you can write, a penalty could not arise for failure to write unless you had something to write with. We do not think statutes should be construed by such a technical rule. The object of the statute is to give notice to the traveling public as to whether or not the trains are on schedule time, and if late how much, and for this purpose it makes it the duty of the company to enter the fact upon a blackboard at all important stations, and provides a penalty for failure to do so, and it is the duty of railroad corporations, companies, and persons operating railroads to provide the necessary means to comply with the law, and to comply with it to avoid the penalty prescribed.

It is suggested that the statute is repugnant to the Constitution on the grounds that it is class legislation and only applies to stations where there is a telegraph office. The law applies alike to all persons operating railroads and to the same class of stations and is uniform in its application. It does not designate at what stations the company shall maintain a telegraph office; that is left to the discretion of the companies to determine at what points along the line of the road it is necessary to maintain telegraph offices to properly operate the road and transact the business of the company, and the statute does not impose on the companies the burden of maintaining an office at points not necessary for the purpose of properly operating the road, but does impose the duty on the companies of designating the fact as to the arrival of trains at all points where it is necessary, and when they do maintain a telegraph office in connection with the road, and this duty is imposed alike on all companies operating railroads. The court judicially knows that telegraph lines are maintained, operated, and used in connection with railroads, and that it is necessary to do so to properly operate a railroad and give advice as to the time of running of trains and the arrival of them at certain points along the line and in directing the running of trains and transacting the business of the road. That the use of the telegraph is generally used and is necessary in connection with a proper system in operating a railroad. The fact that some company may operate a line of road by telephone or some other means of communication does not invalidate the law on account of class legislation, for the Legislature has not seen fit or deemed it necessary to require the duty of any other roads except those operated by means of the telegraph and to require the information noted when there is a telegraph office at their stations. All roads may come within this rule and all companies or persons that do operate a railroad by telegraphic information and have stations at which there is a telegraph office maintained come within its provisions. We do not think the statute subject to the objections urged, that it is class legislation. Hancock v. Yaden, 121 Ind. 366-374, 6 L. R. A. 576.

It is further contended that the statute is in conflict with section 2, art. 8, of the Constitution providing that the common-school fund of the state shall consist of, and be derived from, among other things, "the fines assessed for breaches of the penal law of the state, and from all forfeitures which may accrue." In the case of Burgh v. State, 108 Ind. 182, a question very similar to this was passed upon and decided adversely to the contention of counsel for appellee. The statute, section 6339, Rev. Stat. 1881, provided that, "If any person shall give a false or fraudulent list, schedule or statement required by this Act, he shall be liable to a penalty of not less than fifty dollars, nor more than five thousand dollars, to be recovered in any proper form of action, in the name of the State of Indiana on the relation of the prosecuting attorney. The assessor shall forthwith notify the prosecuting attorney of such delinquency or offense, and he shall prosecute such offense to final judgment and execution, and such fine, when collected, shall be paid into the county treasury for the use of the county, and the prosecuting attorney shall receive 10 per centum commission on all moneys so collected and paid in, and a docket fee of ten dollars, to be taxed and collected with costs in such action," etc., and it was contended that this section was in violation of said sec. 2, art. 8, supra. The court in that case says: "Section 2 of art. 8 of the Constitution provides that fines assessed for breaches of the penal laws of the state shall go into and be a part of the common-school fund. It is contended that as the above section 6339 requires the penalty therein provided to be paid into the county treasury for the use of the county, it is in contravention of the above constitutional provision. The answer is that the constitutional provision has reference to fines assessed in criminal prosecutions, and the penalty provided in section 6339, supra, is not a fine in that sense. It is not to be recovered by a criminal prosecution, but by a civil action. At one place in the section the penalty is spoken of as a fine, but the whole section shows that it is not a fine in the sense in which the word is used in the above section of the Constitution."

There is no difference in these two statutes in so far as the penalty is concerned, for the violation of the Act. Each provides a penalty collectible in the same manner, and if the Legislature may provide that it shall go into the county treasury for the use of the county, it may provide that it may go in any other direction, in so far as this provision of the Constitution is concerned. If the Constitution does not require that such penalty shall go into the school fund, then it may be made a fund for the payment for services of public officers. It is urged that such provision prevents a due process of law, in that it gives to the prosecuting attorney, the officer of the state charged with the prosecution of the action, an interest in the amount recovered. We do not think this objection tenable. It has been the long established system in this state for the prosecuting attorneys to secure a fee taxed against and recovered from the defendant in criminal prosecutions, and his fee depends upon the success of the prosecution. He is likewise allowed a commission for the collection of forfeited cognizance. There can be no difference as regards the effect upon the officer whether he receives a fee to be taxed against and recovered from the defendant which depends upon the successful prosecution of the action and allowing him a certain ten per cent, —or a certain portion of the amount recovered as a compensation for his services. As to whether it is good policy to do either or not is a matter with the Legislature. They have the right, as we think, to do either.

It is further contended that but one penalty can be recovered for the violation of the Act. It seems to us that the statute is clear upon the subject. It provides "that for each violation of the Act, in failing to report, or in making a false report, such corporation, company, or person so neglecting or refusing to comply with the provisions of this Act shall forfeit and pay the sum of twenty-five dollars," etc. The first section makes it the duty of persons operating a railroad, twenty minutes before the schedule time for each passenger train stopping at a station where there is a telegraph office, to note the fact as to whether such train is on time or not, and if late how much. This creates a duty to note the fact in regard to each train stopping at such station; and the second section creates a forfeiture for failing to enter the fact as to any passenger train stopping at such station; also creates a forfeiture for making a false report as to how much the train is late. Of course if there is a failure to make any entry, there would be but one forfeiture as to such train, or if there is a false entry there would be but one forfeiture as to such train. There can only be one forfeiture as to one train at a particular station, during one trip, and that may be either for a failure to make the entry or for making a false entry, whichever may be the fact.

There is a further objection urged to the law, which is, that the statute is void because it assumes to regulate interstate commerce. This objection is stated by one of the learned counsel for the appellee as follows: "It applies in express terms to every corporation, company, or person operating a railroad in this state. It imposes penalties for the failure to give information when the same can only be obtained by the action of telegraph companies over whom such corporations engaged in interstate commerce have no control."

The construction we have heretofore in this opinion given the statute, in so far as it refers to receiving information from a telegraph company over whom the company have no control, avoids the objection urged. The statute was not intended to require the entry upon a blackboard where there was no telegraph operated in connection with the railroad, but at stations where there was a telegraph office in connection with the railroad, furnishing such information as the railroad company might desire in connection with the operation of the road. While the statute deals with persons and corporations engaged in interstate commerce yet we think that the statute is a proper police regulation which in no way interferes with interstate commerce, and is a regulation which is in no way sought to be exercised by the United States, and hence is within the power of the Legislature of the state to enact. It simply imposes on the company or person operating a railroad the burden of ascertaining in advance of the arrival of a train at a particular station the time when it will arrive and note it upon a blackboard for the benefit of the public. This is required to be done when the company or person possesses the information and has the means within its power to convey such information to the point where it is to be noted. It is information possessed by the company itself, and requires only the command of the master to note it. The company or person operates the whole line of road. It is present at every point along the line by its officers and servants. It knows at all times where its trains are and what time they are scheduled to make, and this statute calls upon them to note the facts designated upon blackboards at certain stations in advance of their arrival. The statute simply commands the company to enter at stations in this state the information which it has and which it has the power of communicating at that particular point or station. Counsel cite in support of their position the case of State v. Woodruff S. & P. Coach Co., 114 Ind. 155, and quote from the opinion language holding that in matters of commerce between the states the power of the Federal government is exclusive and supreme. Counsel thus state the proposition: That "this Act imposes penalties on corporations engaged in interstate commerce for failure of telegraph companies to send telegrams from other states," and counsel in support of their position quote from the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Pendleton, 122 U. S. 347, 30 L. ed. 1187, involving the validity of a statute of this state making telegraph companies liable for failure to deliver messages, in which opinion the court says: "In these cases the supreme authority of Congress over the subject of commerce by the telegraph with foreign countries or among the states is affirmed whenever that body chooses to exert its power, and it is also held that the states can impose no impediments to the freedom of that commerce," and in that case the court further holds that "whatever authority the states may possess over the transmission and delivery of messages by telegraph companies within her limits, it does not extend to the delivery of messages in other states."

With the doctrine enunciated in these decisions, while we think it must be conceded some of the language used carries it to the border line, yet we readily yield our assent to it, but the cases referred to enunciated and applied the principles laid down in cases where it involved the rights of the companies as exercised in the discharge of their duties while engaged in interstate commerce, or where the state sought to impose a penalty or tax operating as an impediment to the freedom of commerce. While in this case no such thing is sought to be done, this statute is but a police regulation within this state. The fact that the company or person required to carry it out and comply with the statute are required to bring into use knowledge which they possess or is possessed by other servants situate in another state does not, as we think, impose any restrictions to the freedom of commerce. Indeed, in the communication of the information possessed by the servants of the company at one point on the line of the road to those at another point on the line cannot in itself be termed commerce in the strict sense of the word. Commerce, says Webster, is the exchange or buying and selling of commodities, especially the exchange of merchandise on a large scale between different places or communities; extended trade or traffic; and it is defined in the Century Dictionary as: "Interchange of goods, merchandise, or property of any kind; trade; traffic; used more especially of trade on a large scale, carried on by transportation of merchandise between different countries or between different parts of the same country; distinguished as foreign commerce and internal commerce; as the commerce between Great Britain and the United States, or between New York and Boston; to be engaged in commerce." And when existing or taking place between different states or persons in different states, it is termed interstate commerce. One cannot trade or traffic or buy and sell with himself, though he act by or through his agent or servant, for their acts are all his acts and all result to his benefit. One is not engaged in commerce by passing an article of merchandise from one of his hands to the other or by having one of his servants pass it to another, although it crosses the line between two states in the transit, though he may use the same hands and the same servants in the business of interstate commerce. Railroad companies are engaged in interstate commerce because their railroads are used for the transportation and conducting interstate commerce. Telegraph companies are held to be engaged in interstate commerce as they convey information from citizens of one state to those of another. The railroad company and the telegraph company each occupy contractual relations with other parties in the transportation of articles of merchandise and information or news. One may possess a letter or other writing, deposited with his agent in another state, which may contain information which it is important for him to know in order to intelligently do an act or perform a public duty in this state. In such case we think it cannot be said that he is engaged in commerce or interstate commerce if he go and get the letter and bring it to this state and avail himself of the information, and how can it be different in this respect if he direct his agent to bring the writing to him, nor is it interstate commerce in the discharge of the duties of the master where one servant conveys the information he possessed which belongs to the master to the other servant, even though it be conveyed through a third servant, whether it be a person or a telegraph company who act as the servant of the master in conveying the information. As we have said, the statute is but a regulation for the benefit of the public. It is held that parties in crossing the track of a railroad company must avail themselves of such knowledge as they possess in regard to the time of the running of trains upon the road. A party knowing a train was due at a time he is about crossing a track should use care to avoid injury; so this information to be noted on blackboards is as well for the persons having business across or about the railroad as for those who are traveling upon its trains. If it can be said that this legislation is repugnant to the Constitution by reason of the fact that the information to be noted must be received from an agent in another state through the agency of a telegraph company engaged in interstate commerce, so would legislation requiring signals to be given or watchmen to be kept at certain points upon the railroad in case the superintendent who gave instructions as to the running of trains and the manner in which they were to be run resided in another state, and the direction to the agents or servants operating the road in this state must be communicated to them by means of the telegraph.

In Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 81 L. ed. 508, in speaking of the validity of state legislation relating to railroads, it is said: "The width of the gauge, the character of the grades, the mode of crossing streams by culverts and bridges, the kind of cuts and tunnels, the mode of crossing other highways, the placing of watchmen and signals at points of special danger, the rate of speed at stations and through villages, towns, and cities, small matters naturally and peculiarly within the provision of that law from the authority of which these modern highways of commerce derive their existence, the rules prescribed for their construction and for their management and operation, designed to protect persons and property otherwise endangered by their use are strictly within the limits of the local law. They are not per se regulations of commerce; it is only when they operate as such in the circumstances of their application and conflict with the expressed or presumed will of Congress exerted on the same subject, that they can be required to give way to the supreme authority of the Constitution."

While this statute may be on the border of legislative authority, yet we do not think it attempts to regulate interstate commerce or to interfere with it, or that it places any impediments to the freedom of commerce so as to render it invalid. We have considered and passed upon all the material questions discussed in the case. While the statute is clumsily worded, yet we think its meaning and object are clearly apparent and not subject to the objections urged against it. It is suggested that the blackboards should be put up immediately after the taking effect of the Act, and that some of the violations are alleged to have occurred upon the day the Act took effect, and there was no opportunity given to comply with the law. This is not an objection to the law. Possibly persons would have a reasonable time to comply with the Act in this respect by putting up boards after it went into effect, but we do not intimate an opinion upon this question, as it is not before us.

No objection is urged to the averments of the complaint.

The conclusion we have reached being adverse to the rulings of the circuit court, the judgment must be reversed.

Judgment reversed, with costs, with instructions to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

UNION PACIFIC R. CO., Appl't.

(.....Utah.....)

One maintaining a bathing resort on the shore of a natural body of water, to which he invites the public, must use reasonable care to keep the bottom under the section of water which the bathers use free from everything which might injure their feet, failure to do which, resulting in injury, is actionable negligence.

(November 12, 1892.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Salt Lake County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Williams & VanCott, for appellant:

There is no evidence showing or tending to show that appellant carelessly or negligently permitted a piece of glass to be or remain in the water where the respondent bathed at Garfield Beach.

A preponderance of the evidence shows that the appellant used extraordinary care and prudence to keep said water free of any substances likely to injure the respondent or any other person.

A preponderance of the evidence shows that by the exercise of ordinary care and prudence, said glass could not have been discovered by the appellant.

The law in cases of this kind is clear and well settled, and emphasizes the insufficiency of the evidence to support a verdict in this case.

NOTE.—The above case clearly falls within the general class of cases as to the duty of one who invites people upon his premises for his own profit.

As to the liability of the owner of a summer resort for injuries received on a roller coaster or switch-back operated in such resort by a third person, see the recent case of Knottnerus v. North Park Street R. Co. (Mich.) 17 L. R. A. 722, 18 L. R. A.

Messrs. O. W. Powers, S. H. Lewis and C. Ira Krebs, for respondent:

Gross negligence on the part of defendant was fully proven by defendant's own witnesses.

Their evidence showed that one hundred persons would be unable to watch the people visiting the bathing resort in one day; that only six or eight men were employed around the bath houses; that no one was employed especially to look over the bottom of the lake; that no one was employed especially to see that nothing was thrown into the lake; that the bottom was never raked over between the pavilion and bath houses, where plaintiff was injured.

Blackburn, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit is brought for damages on account of injuries caused by the negligence of the defendant. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff; motion for new trial; motion overruled; and appeal both from the overruling of the motion for a new trial and the judgment.

Several errors are assigned, but the only one insisted upon is that the evidence does not support the verdict and judgment. The complaint, among other things, alleges that defendant conducted a bathing resort known as "Garfield Beach" on the shores of Great Salt Lake. That defendant had exclusive control of the waters of the Great Salt Lake beach, and erected a pier and pavilion thereon, and bathrooms for the use of bathers; and that it advertised said resort, and invited the public there. That the defendant knowingly, negligently, and carelessly permitted a piece of glass bottle to be and remain in said waters at said place; and on said date plaintiff, acting on said general invitation, hired one of said bathrooms, and went into said waters to bathe, and while he was bathing, without any knowledge of said piece of glass, stepped upon the same, and cut and injured his left foot, and in consequence thereof was greatly injured, and suffered great pain of body and mind, to his damage in the sum of $3,000. The answer denies any negligence, injury, or damages. The testimony of the plaintiff is that on June 12, 1890, he went to Garfield Beach, bought a ticket of defendant, and went in the lake to bathe; that while in there he cut his foot badly on a piece of glass lying in the bottom of the lake where the people went to bathe; and that he was laid up a long time, and suffered great pain from the injury. How great the injury was it is not necessary to comment upon, as it is not urged that the damages are excessive. The water was shallow,—about up to the knees. The defendant's testimony shows that it has men in its employ whose duty it was to carefully look over the bottom of the lake where the people bathed, and remove anything that might injure the feet of the bathers; that in the early morning the water was very clear, except when it was windy; and the bottom was clean sand, and everything lying on it could be easily seen, except when the water was stirred by wind, or by many bathers; and that the bottom of the lake was examined a short time before, but not the morning of the injury, nor the morning before; and that every precaution was taken to prevent people from throwing things into the lake where people bathed that might injure the feet of the bathers. It was the duty of the defendant to use reasonable care to keep the bottom of the lake where people bathed free from everything that might injure the feet of the bathers, and the want of such reasonable care is negligence. If the defendant had examined the bottom of the lake the morning of the injury, it, in all probability, would not have occurred. The question was fairly submitted to the jury whether the defendant was guilty of negligence, and it found that it was; and we think the evidence justifies the verdict.

The judgment is affirmed, with costs.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC R. CO., Appt.,

v.

Henrietta FERRIS et al., Resp'ts.

(.....Cal.....)

1. User by the public of one side only of a dedicated street, laid out and mapped with two tracks having a watercourse and double row of trees between them, constitutes an acceptance of the whole dedication.

2. An abutting owner will be enjoined from tearing up the tracks of a railroad lawfully in a highway.

(February 5, 1892.)

APPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enjoin defendants from tearing up tracks which plaintiff had laid on a strip of land which it claimed to be a highway. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the commissioner's opinion.

Mr. John D. Bicknell for appellant.

Mr. E. E. Keech for respondents.

Foots, C., filed the following opinion:

This action was brought by the appellant, a railroad corporation, for the purpose of re-

NOTE.—Public user as acceptance of dedicated highway.

The general current of modern authorities sustains the proposition that the dedication of a highway may be accepted merely by long continued public user, without any formal act of acceptance. Wolfskill v. Los Angeles County, 86 Cal. 405; Eureka v. Croghan, 81 Cal. 524; People v. Reed, 81 Cal. 79; Green v. Canaan, 29 Conn. 157; Willey v. People, 36 Ill. App. 609; Marcy v. Taylor, 19 Ill. 633; Lakeview v. LeHahn, 120 Ill. 92; Green v. Elliott, 86 Ind. 58; Manderschid v. Dubuque, 29 Iowa, 73, 4 Am. Rep. 198; Boss v. Thompson, 78 Ind. 90; Boyer v. State, 18 Ind. 451; Kennedy v. Levan, 23 Minn. 512; Price v. Breckenridge, 92 Mo. 373 (this was a case of a public square); Stevens v. Nashua, 46 N. H. 192; People v. Loehfelme, 102 N. Y. 1; Cook v. Harris, 61 N. Y. 448; McMannis v. Butler, 51 Barb. 426; Holdane v. Coldspring Trustees, 21 N. Y. 474, affirming 23 Barb. 108; Buchanan v. Curtis, 25 Wis. 99; Eastland v. Fogo, 66 Wis. 133.

And such user may be sufficient evidence of the acceptance of the highway to charge the public authorities with liability for failure to keep the road in repair. Green v. Canaan and Boyer v. State, supra.

to the sufficiency of the acceptance as against the person who made the dedication. A distinction is made in some cases between the effect of user as evidence of acceptance as against him and as against the authorities so as to charge them with the burden of repairs.

In Illinois public user is held sufficient evidence of acceptance as against the person making the dedication as is shown by the above-cited Illinois cases.

But it is held not sufficient to charge the public with the duty of maintaining the road. Forbes v. Balenseifer, 74 Ill. 187; Willey v. People, 36 Ill. App. 609.

And in Maine it is held that there must be some proof of acquiescence or adoption by the corporation itself in order to create an obligation on the part of the corporation to repair a highway which has been dedicated. Mayberry v. Standish, 56 Me. 842; State v. Wilson, 42 Me. 24.

And even that repairs by a highway surveyor will not constitute an acceptance because of his lack of authority to accept the way. State v. Bradbury, 40 Me. 154.

In Virginia also it is held that the mere passing over a road by individuals will not constitute an acceptance, and that an acceptance must be by straining the defendants here from continuing to tear up and remove its track from what was claimed by the plaintiff to be a public highway and for such other and further relief as the facts of the case might warrant. The court below decided the case against the plaintiff, dissolved a preliminary injunction that had been granted, and gave judgment for the defendants for costs. From that and an order refusing a new trial the plaintiff has taken this appeal. From the evidence in the record it is clear that findings 1 and 3 are without legal support. It appears that Henrietta Ferris, one of the respondents here, bought, some years prior to this controversy, a piece of land from Mr. Irvine; that in the deed to that land there was specially excepted therefrom a strip of land in front thereof 60 feet wide, which had been offered for dedication as a public highway, and no title to that land ever vested in the said Ferris; that this strip of land so excepted was laid down upon a map properly filed for record in the proper office, as being reserved for a public road, and it does not appear that the person so offering it for dedication has ever in any way sought to revoke it. The idea of the lower court seems to have been that the public had never made use of the side of the road so offered for dedication next to the defendant's land, and therefore she had an appurtenant right of way over it. In this view of the matter we cannot concur. It seems that the persons who bought land from Mr. Irvine, including the defendant Mrs. Ferris, had conformed their fences and hedges to the line of the proposed highway as set out in the map recorded by Irvine describing the public roads he offered for dedication, among which was this one; that, according to the plan agreed upon for the location of this highway, it had a zanja or water ditch running through the middle of it lengthwise, and a double row of eucalyptus trees, one each side of the zanja; that the road as it now stands is so located, and has the zanja and rows of trees as intended. But because the travel along the public road has been, by the choice of the traveling public, almost exclusively, if not entirely, on the other side of the road, and on the 60-foot wide strip of it on the opposite side of the zanja from the defendants' land, the court seems to have concluded that the public never used the 60 feet of the located road as recognized by proprietors of adjoining lands in building their fences and hedges, and therefore as to it there was never any user. This we take to be a mistake. As well might it be said that, if the public travel had been down the center of a road offered for dedication as a public highway, there was never any user of that part which lay on each side of the track used, and between it and the fences of the adjoining proprietors; or where the travel might be diagonally across the located road, from one side to the other, and from one end to the other of it continuously, that the portion of the ground fenced out by adjoining proprietors over which there had been no travel had never been used. A similar view of an abandonment of a public road was urged in Watkins v. Lynch, 71 Cal. 26, but it will be seen from the language which we now quote no such want of user was considered any evidence of an abandonment of the public road: "Any ordinary observer traveling upon the public roads of the more thickly populated portions of this state will often perceive the land on one or both sides of a road-bed, that is fenced out, sowed in grain and pastured by the proprietors of adjoining land; and, while all the travel for many years has been confined to the center of the roadbed, yet we do not see that such acts would of themselves be held to show either an abandonment of the use of the road by the public, or its adverse possession by the person who has thus sowed, reaped, and pastured his stock thereon." So here there is no conflict in the evidence, properly considered, as to the offer of dedication and acceptance and user of this land as a public road. If this is a public road, then, according to the other findings and evidence, the railroad corporation had constructed its road as it had a right to do under section 465, subd. 5, Civil Code, and the de-record in such form as by the laying off of the highway into precincts or appointing surveyors or overseers. Com. v. Kelly, 8 Gratt. 632.

In Vermont also it was decided that the use by the public of a private way to a mill could not make the town chargeable with the duty of repairing it. Page v. Weathersfield, 18 Vt. 424.

In Massachusetts the Statute of 1846, chap. 208, § 1, changed the common-law rule so as to prevent the creation of a highway by dedication. Hayden v. Attleborough, 7 Gray, 338; Bowers v. Suffolk Mfg. Co., 4 Cush. 822.

Whether public user is sufficient to show acceptance is a question for the jury. Riley v. Hammel, 38 Conn. 574; Green v. Canaan, 29 Conn. 157; Hall v. Meriden, 48 Conn. 428; Hartford v. New York & N. E. R. Co., 59 Conn. 250; Manderschid v. Dubuque, 29 Iowa, 73, 4 Am. Rep. 196; Green v. Elliott, 86 Ind. 53.

In England it has been decided that the public is bound to repair all roads dedicated and used by the public although there has been no adoption of them. Rex v. Leake, 5 Barn. & Ad. 469.

This case disapproves of Rex v. St. Benedict, 4 Barn. & Ad. 447, in which it was said that some act of acquiescence or adoption was necessary in order to charge the public with a duty to keep the road 18 L. R. A.

in repair, but in this case there was a qualified right of passage existing without reference to the question of dedication.

The user by the public for fifty years of a street which was a part of the original plot or plan of the town was held evidence of acceptance in Com. v. Moorehead, 118 Pa. 344.

In New Hampshire, under a statute requiring twenty years' user to make a highway public, use by the public for that length of time was held sufficient to constitute an acceptance without any formal act of acceptance or any repairs. Stevens v. Nashua, 46 N. H. 132.

Common user by the public has been declared by some courts to be the very highest kind of evidence of an acceptance. Buchanan v. Curtis, 25 Wis. 99, 8 Am. Rep. 23; Kennedy v. LeVan, 23 Minn. 513.

An acceptance of part of a highway does not necessarily extend beyond that part but actual use is the test. Hall v. Meriden, 48 Conn. 428.

But where the street is conveyed as a whole, acceptance of part is an acceptance of the whole. Derby v. Alling, 40 Conn. 410.

No case similar in its facts to the main case has been discovered B. A. R.

endants had no right to tear up its track. We think the judgment and order should be reversed, and so advise.

Thomas McHENRY, Resp.

(.....Wis.....)

1. A wife cannot become a partner of her husband under the Wisconsin statutes which authorize her to make contracts in relation to her separate estate and in certain emergencies, as in case of her husband's desertion, give her the power of a feme sole.
2. A bill of sale which constitutes a voluntary transfer or assignment of a stock of goods for creditors securing to one of them a preference over all others is in violation of Rev. Stat., § 1693a.

(December 6, 1892.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful conversion of a stock of goods formerly belonging to John H. Hanson and wife, which plaintiff claimed under a bill of sale. Affirmed.

Statement by Pinney, J.:

Action for taking, carrying away, and converting a stock of goods alleged to have been the property of John H. Hanson and Caretha M., his wife, as copartners under the name of Hanson & Co., at West Bend, Wis., and of which property they executed a bill of sale, April 30, 1889, to Daniel K. Green, as the agent of the plaintiff, an Illinois corporation, to secure a debt due to it of $530.89. Green took possession of the property May 2d thereafter as such agent, to sell and dispose of it to pay said debt and others, and expenses of sale; and the bill of sale was filed on the next day thereafter, when the property was seized by the sheriff under a writ of attachment, by direction of the defendant, issued in an action in favor of said McHenry against said John H. Hanson, for a debt of $354.86, for which judgment was recovered, with costs, June 1, 1889, and on an execution thereon the property was sold for $500, and the money was applied to the payment of this judgment. Other writs were issued, and at the time in the hands of the sheriff, some against said Hanson and some against him and his said wife, namely, two against Hanson for about $200, and two against him and his wife for about $300; and it was claimed that the property in question was the property of John H. Hanson, and that the claim of his wife thereto, or to any interest, was fraudulent and void, and it was denied that she had any title to it, as partner or otherwise. Evidence was given to show that the plaintiff first began to deal with the alleged firm of Hanson & Co. February 27, 1889. The order for a bill of goods of that date to plaintiff, to replenish stock, stated, in substance, that Hanson & Co. had just purchased a stock at West Bend, and opened up that day, and was signed, "Hanson & Co., by Mrs M. Hanson, from Barron, Wis." It appeared that she had previously dealt with the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff sold to Hanson & Co. goods to the amount of $530, which remained unpaid. On the 28th of April a letter was written to plaintiff, purporting to be signed, "C. M. Hanson, by J. H. Hanson, her husband," saying "We have got swindled out of $24,000 by a friend of ours," giving some details of a real-estate transaction, and inclosing a bill of sale to be filled up in the name of such party as plaintiff thought best, in order to secure plaintiff and pay certain debts, alleging that the stock was worth $2,000, and urging the plaintiff to give the matter immediate attention. Plaintiff inclosed the bill of sale and letter, May 1st, to Green, to be filled up in his name and to take possession, and they telegraphed J. H. Hanson to that effect. Green went to West Bend, inserted his name in the bill of sale, and took possession, and on the same day the goods were taken on the defendant's attachment, and other attachments soon followed. The bill of sale appeared to have been signed by both Hanson and wife, and recited that in consideration of $2,000, in hand paid by Green, they granted, sold, and conveyed to him the whole of a "stock of drugs, consisting of drugs," etc., "and any and every thing pertaining to and now being in the building on lot one, block one," etc., "in West Bend with the furniture and everything, of whatever nature, pertaining to said stock." The letter accompanying the bill of sale explained its purpose thus: "Please send a responsible party at once, and relieve us of a terrible burden and anxiety, for your interest. We hope you understand our position. It's to get you paid up first, and then pay the rest, as there is more than enough for all. When all is paid, we will take the rest. In selling to you, we shall avoid all trouble, and all can be paid, as your man can close out the stock in a few weeks. You will understand, owing to the swindle, we have no means at present. Neither are we known here. Hence other parties may not be willing to extend any time." Green testified that he went to West Bend and saw Hanson. The bill of sale and letter of instructions had been sent by plaintiff to him at West Bend in Hanson's care and it was opened, and he (Hanson) "mentioned that it would be necessary, as a matter of form, for me to attach [insert] my name to this document; and, thinking he was acting in good faith, I did as he directed. By his request, my name was put in the bill of sale. Nothing more was done until the following day, when I had it registered. He went away that night. I went into the store, under the bill of sale, and the attachment was made the same day." The value of the goods was about the amount of plaintiff's debt. He signed his name to a receipt. The amount he could not tell. Did not know whether it was a note. There was no talk between Hanson and him as to what he was to do with the stock. The defendant testified that prior to February, 1889, he was a druggist, and sold out to J. H. Hanson February 27, and took his note for $350,—the one in suit, upon which the attachment was made; and there was a large proportion of the property there when the attachment was made. The defendant's attachment, judgment, and execution were put in evidence, and a sale of the property in question thereunder was proved, and the proceeds were applied in payment thereof. The other attachments, judgments, and executions were put in evidence, and it was proved that the residue of the proceeds of the sale was applied to them in their order. There was but little evidence, admissible as against the defendant, tending to show that Mrs. C. M. Hanson had ever entered into any partnership agreement with her husband, and none to show that he had any separate estate, or that she ever attempted to manage or exercise any control over the business in question, or had contributed anything to it; but considerable evidence was given, tending to show that the claim that Mrs. Hanson had any real interest in the matter was simulated, and not real, and that her claim as alleged partner was fraudulent, as against her husband's creditors.

Mr. P. O'Meara, for respondent:

Husband and wife cannot enter into partnership between themselves and thus render themselves jointly liable for the contracts of the firm thus established.

Haydock Carriage Co. v. Pier, 74 Wis. 582.

This court will be slow, unless forced by the clear letter of the statute, to hold that husband and wife may carry on business as copartners; for it would greatly increase the opportunities of either to defraud creditors, and it would endanger the separate estate of the wife in the many cases where the husband may desire to get it into his own possession. But the plaintiff entirely failed to show that Mrs. Hanson had one dollar in the property which was attached.

Plaintiff stands in the situation of Mrs. Hanson if she had brought the action in her own name and the burden was upon it to show by the "clearest proof" Mrs. Hanson's interest, if she had any, in the property.

Pinney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the property in controversy, which was seized on execution and sold to satisfy the judgment recovered by the defendant against John H. Hanson, the husband, was the partnership property of Hanson and his wife, Caretha M. Hanson, as the firm of Hanson & Co., and had been previously transferred to Green for the benefit of the plaintiff, and to secure to it and others partnership debts of Hanson & Co., and therefore the seizure and sale of the property in question for the debt of the husband were wrongful, and that the defendant is liable for its value. It is contended that a great part of the property seized was sold to the so-called firm of Hanson & Co. by the plaintiff and that it acquired a title to it, valid as against all but partnership creditors. The question presented is whether husband and wife can become copartners in carrying on a business, under the statute in relation to married women, and, if not, what is the legal result of such an attempt by husband and wife to carry on business as such. Prior to the statute concerning married women, a feme covert might have a separate estate, which courts of equity, only, could recognize and protect; and she might bind it by her engagements or contracts, for the benefit of such estate or on her own account, or for her benefit upon the credit of such estate, which could be enforced only in equity against it, but not by way of judgment or decree as for a personal liability. Her contracts were void at law, and enforceable only in equity against her separate estate. The statute changed the former equitable ownership of her separate estate into a legal one, and, for its better security and protection, provided that her estate should "not be subject to the disposal of her husband," and that, as to subsequently acquired separate estate, it should "not be liable for his debts." It has repeatedly been held, under this statute, that the contracts of a married woman, when necessary or convenient to the proper use and enjoyment of her separate estate, are binding at law, and that all her other contracts and engagements stand, as before the statute, good only in equity, and that the change from an equitable to a legal estate has not, in respect to such other contracts, enlarged her powers or removed the disability of coverture. The power of a married woman to bind herself at law is a restricted one, and limited to the making of such contracts and engagements as are necessary or convenient to the use and enjoyment of her separate estate. Conway v. Smith, 13 Wis. 125; Todd v. Lee, 15 Wis. 365; Beard v. Dedolph, 29 Wis. 136; Haydock Carriage Co. v. Pier, 74 Wis. 582, 585. It has never been held, under this statute, that the wife could contract any debt or obligation, valid at law, not fairly within this restricted power, whatever may have been said in subsequent cases as to her power to acquire and hold property, separate and apart from her husband, with the proceeds of her individual earnings, under section 2343, or either of the preceding sections. And while it is conceded that, separate and apart from her husband, the wife, with her separate estate, not derived from her husband, may engage in and carry on business, and for that purpose contract debts and engagements binding at law, her power to do this without a separate estate exists only in the emergencies specified in section 2344, where her husband shall have deserted her, or shall, from drunkenness, profligacy, or any cause, neglect or refuse to provide for her support or for the support and education of her children, in which event she "shall have the right to transact business in her own name, and to collect the profits of such business," etc., and they will not be subject to her husband's control or interference, or liable for his debts. In other words, in all such cases the wife, without a separate estate, has the rights and powers of a feme sole. The guarded terms of this section show that her right to transact business in her own name, beyond the scope of the power implied from the ownership, use, and enjoyment of a separate estate, is denied, except in the particular emergencies specified. The wife has not, therefore, in our judgment, the power to enter into an agreement of partnership with her husband, nor, as for that matter, with any one else, if she has no separate estate, in respect to which she can be considered as a feme sole, so as to bind herself at law. There is no competent evidence in this case that Mrs. Hanson had any separate estate at the time her husband made the purchases for the store in West Bend, and started business there under the name and style of Hanson & Co.; and as the plaintiff is claiming to recover for the property in question under and through a bill of sale executed by such alleged partnership, as against an execution creditor of the husband, within repeated decisions, the burden of showing that she had a separate estate was on the plaintiff. Stanton v. Kirach, 6 Wis. 838; Gottelmann v. Gitz, 78 Wis. 499, and cases cited. Had it been shown, however, that Mrs. Hanson had a separate estate, we think that the partnership agreement between her and her husband (if any, for there is little more than a scintilla of evidence of one) must be regarded as void, and that the business in question was the sole business of her husband, and the plaintiff's claim is his sole and individual debt. The purpose and policy of the statute concerning the rights of married women, in our judgment, forbid the formation of a continuing business engagement between husband and wife, which shall produce a community of interest, liability, and profit, in which the husband would have, as partner, a right of control and management of the separate estate of the wife, so that he could sell and convert it into money from time to time, draw the firm moneys from the bank, and collect notes and bills receivable and dispose of the proceeds, in the payment of his debts or otherwise, without her knowledge or consent. The making of such an engagement by the wife might be, if put in execution, a conversion of her separate estate into that of her husband. Certainly, it is easy to understand that, with his influence and control as husband, such result would be almost inevitable. The principal purpose of the statute is to give the wife the power and rights of a feme sole as to her separate property, free "from the disposal of her husband," and "not liable to his debts." Manifestly, it was not intended that the Act should receive a construction that would be subversive of the beneficent purposes for which it was enacted, and which would almost necessarily tend to strike down the protection it was intended married women should have under it in the use and enjoyment of their separate estates. At common law a married woman was incapable of forming a partnership, and the marriage of a feme sole partner worked a dissolution of the firm. Story, Partn. §§ 10, 306; 1 Bates, Partn. §§ 135-141. Her right to enter into a partnership, if she has a separate estate, with a person other than her husband, is quite generally recognized, and is assumed to exist in Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Raymond, 27 Wis. 569; but we are not aware of any case where it has been held, under a statute in substance the same as our own, that she may embark her separate estate in partnership ventures with her husband. In the case of Suau v. Caffé, 122 N. Y. 308, 6 L. R. A. 593, it was held that the common-law disability of a married woman to engage in a business as a copartner or jointly with her husband, was removed by an Act "Concerning the liability of husband and wife," which authorized a married woman to carry on any trade or business on her sole and separate account, and that the wife could not escape liability for debts contracted in a partnership with her husband, on the ground of coverture; but the statute in question is much broader than ours, and is unconditional. The case was decided by a mere majority,—three of the judges dissenting,—and is contrary to previous decisions of the supreme and superior courts, and would seem to be in conflict with Hendricks v. Isaacs, 117 N. Y. 411, 6 L. R. A. 559. The view we have taken of the statute is sustained by Lord v. Parker, 3 Allen, 127; Lord v. Davison, Id. 181; Edwards v. Stevens, Id. 815; Plumer v. Lord, 5 Allen, 463; Bowler v. Bradford, 140 Mass. 521; Payne v. Thompson, 44 Ohio St. 192; Hans v. Shaw, 91 Ind. 384, 390; Scarlett v. Snodgrass, 92 Ind. 262; Artman v. Ferguson, 73 Mich. 146, 2 L. R. A. 843, 16 Am. St. Rep. 572; Bassett v. Shepardson, 52 Mich. 3; Carey v. Burruss, 20 W. Va. 571; Cox v. Miller, 54 Tex. 16; Bradstreet v. Baer, 41 Md. 19.

It is not to be supposed that the Legislature intended that such relations and duties as exist between copartners in trade should be devolved on husband and wife, with their necessary incidents, as a possible means of disturbing domestic peace and confidence, or that they might become contentious litigants in an action to wind up, with a receiver in charge of their affairs and resources. The statute evidently intended that the gains the wife should make in the exercise of her limited business powers should be her sole and separate property, and not be in any way subject to the interference, control, or disposal of her husband. The conclusion to which we have arrived is not in conflict with Krouskop v. Shontz, 51 Wis. 204, where the real estate upon which farming was conducted by husband and wife was her sole property, and she was held liable for that reason. No partnership was claimed to exist. Nor is it opposed in principle to Arndt v. Harshaw, 58 Wis. 269; Dayton v. Walsh, 47

Wis. 118, 32 Am. Rep. 757; Brickley v. Walker, 68 Wis. 564, and Barker v. Lynch, 75 Wis. 624,—which are clearly distinguishable from the present case. The necessary result is that there was no copartnership estate or liabilities of Hanson & Co., and all the property and liabilities were those of the husband.

2. Inasmuch as the property in question was the sole property of Hanson, the execution and judgment of the defendant entitled him to impeach the validity of the bill of sale under which the plaintiff claims. The bill of sale was given upon the trusts contained in the letter from Hanson to the plaintiff, which was delivered with it, namely: First, to pay the plaintiff its debt; second, to pay the other creditors, and return the rest to Hanson and wife. The bill of sale was therefore a voluntary transfer or assignment of the stock of goods, etc., in question, for the benefit of or in trust for creditors of Hanson, and was not executed in the manner prescribed by the statute, and fell directly within the condemnation of the statute, section 1694, and of section 1693a, because it gave and secured the plaintiff a preference over all other creditors, contrary to the last-named section. The documents through which the plaintiff claims title created a trust, a trustee, Green, and creditors as cestuis que trustent with an ultimate trust in favor of Hanson and wife. The case is thus brought clearly within the adjudged cases of Winner v. Hoyt, 66 Wis. 227; Maxwell v. Simonton, 81 Wis. 635.

The claim of title of the plaintiff was therefore fraudulent in law, and void, no matter what the intentions of the parties were; and the court properly directed a verdict for the defendant.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

William A. VAIL et al., Appts.,
v.

Warren WINTERSTEIN et al.

(.....Mich.....)

A married woman can enter a firm as a partner of which her husband is not a member and thus bind her separate property for the undertakings of the firm under the Michigan statutes which give her power to carry on business or trade in her own name and upon her sole account.

(December 22, 1892.)

NOTE.—The power of a married woman to form a partnership in business with a third person depends so entirely upon the words of the statutes by which common-law disabilities are removed in whole or in part that the decisions in each state on this question are less likely to be valuable in other states than the decisions on most other questions. Some of the decisions on this subject are included in a note to Artman v. Ferguson (Mich.) 2 L. R. A. 342.

18 L. R. A.

A PPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Sanilac County dismissing as to defendant, Alice A. Tallmadge, the bill filed for the winding up of a partnership concern, for the appointment of a receiver and an accounting, but in other respects granting the prayer of the bill. Reversed as to such dismissal.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George McKay, for appellants:

The complainants, while conceding that a married woman cannot be a partner with her husband, nor a member of the same firm with him (Lord v. Parker, 3 Allen, 127; Artman v. Ferguson, 2 L. R. A. 843, 73 Mich. 146), con-

Partnership between husband and wife involves so radical a change in the common law that very broad language as to the wife's power to contract and carry on business has been held in most cases not sufficient to authorize a partnership with her own husband.

See, on this subject, the preceding case, Fuller & Fuller Co. v. McHenry (Wis.) ante, 512, and the note there referred to, which reviews all the authorities on the question.

tend that in this state where a married woman may engage in business, she may be a member of a firm if her husband is not a member of the same firm, and may be liable as a partner the same as if she were a feme sole.

1 Bates, Partn. § 16; Harris, Contracts of Married Women, 420, 421, §§ 511, 512; Wells, Separate Property of Married Women, chap. 11; Plumer v. Lord, 5 Allen, 460; Abbott v. Jackson, 48 Ark. 216; Newman v. Morris, 53 Miss. 405; Suau v. Caffé, 9 L. R. A. 598, 123 N. Y. 808.

The terms "separate property," "separate estate," "sole property," and "sole estate" are never properly used in the sense of several or individual. These terms had a well-defined meaning in the equitable rules governing the separate estate of a married woman, long before a "legal" separate estate was ever known to our system of laws. In equity, a "separate estate," was an estate over which the husband's marital right of ownership and control was excluded by the terms of the settlement, and it was not liable for his debts.

2 Story, Eq. 12th ed. § 1883; Firemen's Ins. Co. of Albany v. Bay, 4 Barb. 407.

Our Legislature in enacting the Married Woman's Act must be presumed to use the term "separate estate" in the sense already fixed for it by the courts.

The object of the Legislature by this Act was to give the wife the same power, in all respects, over her property that she had before marriage.

Starkweather v. Smith, 6 Mich. 880.

The interest of the wife in the firm property would be her separate estate. The business and her property invested therein would be free from the husband's common-law right of ownership and control. If the husband is not a member of the firm he has no legal right to control the wife's property invested in the business, and cannot directly or indirectly control this portion of her separate estate any more than any other portion. The property invested by her in a firm business does not cease to be her separate estate—if the term "separate estate" is to retain its well-established meaning, and not to be made a synonym for "several" or "individual." In this state a married woman may be bound jointly with another upon a proper consideration.

Post v. Shafer, 63 Mich. 88.

In this state a married woman may engage in any lawful business and may employ all the necessary agents to assist her in the business. For the acts of her agents within the scope of their agency she is necessarily liable.

Rankin v. West, 25 Mich. 195.

She may purchase her entire outfit on credit, or she may borrow the necessary capital and bind herself personally for its repayment.

Tillman v. Shackleton, 15 Mich. 447, 93 Am. Dec. 198.

In this case, then, Mrs. Tallmadge might have engaged in the banking business; she might have employed as her agents, to aid her in the business, the very men who have been her partners; she might have borrowed from each the amount he agreed to contribute to the capital stock of the firm, and she might have bound herself to pay them a stipulated share of the profits in lieu of interest on the borrowed capital.

Beecher v. Bush, 45 Mich. 188, 40 Am. Rep. 465.

If a married woman may engage in business freely, as she may in this state, there seems to be no good reason for saying that she may not stipulate with her agent that he shall also be a principal with her and be subject in every way to the liabilities and vicissitudes of the business. She may be bound jointly upon a proper consideration.

Post v. Shafer, supra.

In Massachusetts it was held that a married woman could not enter into a contract of co-partnership with her husband (Lord v. Parker, 8 Allen, 127), but that she might enter a firm of which her husband was not a member.

Plumer v. Lord, 5 Allen, 460.

In Arkansas a married woman may be a member of a firm with all the rights and subject to all the liabilities of a partner.

Abbott v. Jackson, 48 Ark. 216.

In Mississippi a married woman may be a member of a trading partnership.

Newman v. Morris, 53 Miss. 405.

In Maryland a married woman has no right to contract even in respect to her separate estate except in writing, in which her husband joins. Such a restricted power to contract is not sufficient for the purposes of a partnership.

Bradstreet v. Baer, 41 Md. 19.

In West Virginia, where a married woman cannot engage in trade or business unless she is living separate and apart from her husband, it is held that she cannot be a member of a trading partnership while living with her husband.

W. Va. Code, 2d ed. 1887, p. 607, § 18; Carey v. Burruss, 20 W. Va. 571, 43 Am. Rep. 790.

In Ohio it has been held that a married woman has no power to become a member of a firm.

Swasey v. Antram, 24 Ohio St. 87.

In New York where a married woman is authorized by statute to carry on any trade or business on her sole and separate account, it is held that she may be a member of a firm.

Suau v. Caffé, 9 L. R. A. 598, 123 N. Y. 808.

Mr. George W. Wendock, for appellees:

Alice A. Tallmadge being a married woman at the time of entering into the contract of co-partnership in question in this controversy, could not enter into a contract of co-partnership with any one, and the alleged articles of co-partnership, as to her, are absolutely void. The rule at common law was that by marriage the husband and wife became one person in law, that is the very being or legal existence of the woman is suspended during the marriage, or at least is incorporated or consolidated into that of the husband, under whose wing or protection she performs everything.

1 Bl. Com. p. 442.

This rule of the common law obtains in Michigan, except as modified by the Constitution and statutes of the state.

Artman v. Ferguson, 2 L. R. A. 843, 73 Mich. 146.

A married woman may not become a partner with her husband.

Edward v. McEnhill, 51 Mich. 165; Bassett v. Shepardon, 52 Mich. 8; Artman v. Ferguson, supra.

Artman v. Ferguson, supra, seems to decide the question at issue in this case, and determines that a married woman has no power to enter into a contract of copartnership. The decision of Judge Cooley, in the case of Russell v. People's Sav. Bank, 89 Mich. 672, is to the same effect.

It has been uniformly held that our statutes do not authorize a married woman to become personally liable on an executory promise, except concerning her separate estate. A note given for any other consideration is void.

De Vries v. Conklin, 23 Mich. 255; West v. Laraway, 28 Mich. 464; Emery v. Lord, 26 Mich. 481; Ross v. Walker, 31 Mich. 120; Jenna v. Marble, 37 Mich. 319; Kitchell v. Mudgett, 37 Mich. 81; Carley v. Fox, 38 Mich. 887; Johnson v. Sutherland, 39 Mich. 579; Russell v. People's Sav. Bank, supra; Grants v. Toles, 40 Mich. 725; Kenton Ins. Co. v. McClellan, 43 Mich. 565; Reed v. Buys, 44 Mich. 82; Buhler v. Jennings, 49 Mich. 538; Edwards v. McEnhill, 51 Mich. 165; Schlatterer v. Nickodemus, 51 Mich. 627; *Tompkins v. Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainants Henry W. Wilson and William A. Vail entered into a copartnership with defendants Alice A. Tallmadge and Warren Winterstein under the firm name of Winterstein, Vail & Co. for the purpose of carrying on a general banking business at Marlette, this state. They organized January 1, 1888, and under the terms of the copartnership agreement were to continue to January 1, 1893. They contributed capital stock as follows: Henry W. Wilson $2,000, William A. Vail $3,000, Alice A. Tallmadge $3,000, and Warren Winterstein $4,000, making a capital stock of $12,000, Winterstein becoming the president, and Vail the cashier and bookkeeper. March 30, 1891, a bill was filed in the circuit court in chancery for Sanilac county by Vail and Wilson against the defendants Winterstein and Tallmadge and others, to whom it was alleged conveyances and transfers of firm property had been made in violation of the rights of Vail and Wilson and the creditors of the firm. A receiver was asked for. Immediately after the filing of the bill, a common-law assignment was made by Vail and Wilson in the name of the firm to Thomas W. Dawson, one of the complainants here, of all the firm property for the benefit of all the firm's creditors. In making the assignment, Vail and Wilson assumed that the other members of the firm had disposed of their interests in the firm property, and were by such acts disqualified to act for the firm in any capacity, and that their transferees had no authority to act. An amended bill was subsequently filed by Vail and Wilson and Dawson, the assignee, and joining as defendants with the others John J. Lunau, a transferee of a part of the firm's real estate, and Annie, the wife of Warren Winterstein. A stipulation was thereafter made dismissing the bill as to Margaret Winterstein, Johnson Winterstein, and John J. Lunau. Proofs were taken, and a decree entered reciting in substance that the firm of Winterstein, Vail & Co. had been dissolved by the acts of the partners, and appointing complainant Dawson as receiver. It also recited that certain properties which it had been attempted to transfer to other parties belonged to the firm, and also that Alice A. Tallmadge, at the time of the execution of the partnership agreement, was a married woman, and still so continued. It was therefore decreed that the copartnership be dissolved, placing all the properties in the hands of the receiver, with the right to sue on and collect all the notes, bills, and choses in action belonging to the firm, to collect the rents and avails of all the real estate belonging to the firm, and that Warren Winterstein execute, acknowledge, and deliver to the receiver an assignment of all the personal property belonging to the firm, and that he and his wife make certain conveyances to the receiver. The bill was thereupon dismissed, without costs, as to the defendant Alice A. Tallmadge, and a decree for an accounting to be made.

This appeal raises but the one question whether the defendant Alice A. Tallmadge, being a married woman, could become a member of the firm of Winterstein, Vail & Co., and by such act bind her separate property, so that in the accounting for the benefit of creditors she became liable out of her separate estate to the creditors of the firm? Section 5, art. 16, of the Constitution of this state provides that "the real and personal estate of every female, acquired before marriage, and all property to which she may afterwards become entitled by gift, grant, inheritance, or devise, shall be and remain the inheritance and property of such female, and shall not be liable for the debts, obligations, or engagements of her husband, and may be devised or bequeathed by her as though she were unmarried." Section 6295, How. Stat., provides that "the real and personal estate of every female, acquired before marriage, with all property, real and personal, to which she may afterwards become entitled by gift, grant, inheritance, devise, or any other manner, shall remain the estate and property of such female, and shall not be liable for the debts, obligations, and agreements of her husband, and may be contracted, sold, and transferred, mortgaged, conveyed, devised, and bequeathed by her in the same manner as if she were unmarried." It was held in Edwards v. McEnhill, 51 Mich. 165; Bassett v. Shepardon, 52 Mich. 8; and Artman v. Ferguson, 73 Mich. 146, 2 L. R. A. 343, that a married woman could not become a partner in business with her husband, and make her separate estate liable upon the contracts and engagements of the firm. In the last-named case it was attempted to subject Mrs. Ferguson's separate estate to the payment of the firm's debts and liabilities, the firm being composed of herself and her husband. It was said in that case: "A partnership is a contract of two or more competent persons to place their money, effects, labor, skill, or some or all of them, in lawful commerce or business and to divide the profits and bear the loss in certain proportions. That a married woman may, when she has separate estate, be a co-partner with a person other than her husband, is held in many of the states under the married woman's statutes; but where the statute gives her no power, or only a limited power, to become a partner, the rule of the common law prevails, and she cannot enter a firm." Great stress is laid by defendants' counsel upon the last clause before quoted, insisting that the court intended to hold in that case that a married woman in this state could not become a member of any firm and incur liability binding upon her separate estate. That question was not involved in the case, but related solely to her ability to bind her separate estate in the firm in which her husband was a partner. The reason given for the holding was that it was the purpose of these statutes to secure to a married woman the right to acquire and hold property separate from her husband, and free from his influence and control; and, if she might enter into a business partnership with him, it would subject her property to his control in a manner wholly inconsistent with the separation which it was the purpose of the statutes to secure, and might subject her to an indefinite liability for his engagements. That the important and sacred relations between man and wife which lie at the very foundation of civilized society are not to be disturbed and destroyed by contentions which may arise from such community of property, and a general power of disposal, and a mutual liability for the contracts and obligations of each other.

The question presented by the present record has not been directly disposed of by any of our previous decisions, and the reasons which have been given why a wife may not become a member of a firm with her husband under our statutes are not at all applicable to cases where she seeks to enter a firm conducting business separate from her husband. As was said in the former case, in many of the states married women are permitted to carry on business in this way, and under statutes quite analogous to our own. The statute of Massachusetts provides: "Any married woman may, while married, bargain, sell, and convey her real and personal property which may now be her sole and separate property, or which may hereafter come to her by descent, devise, bequest, or gift of any person except her husband, and enter into any contracts in reference to the same, in the same manner as if she were sole." Stat. 1857, chap. 249, § 2. Section 7, chap. 304, Stat. 1855, of that state provides: "Any married woman may carry on any trade or business and perform any labor or service on her sole and separate account." It was held under these statutes in Lord v. Parker, 3 Allen, 127, that a married woman could not enter into a contract or copartnership with her husband. In Plummer v. Lord, 5 Allen, 480, it was held that, while she could not enter into a firm where her husband was a partner, yet she might engage in business with others as partners. Many of the other states, under quite similar statutes, while holding that a married woman could not be a partner in a firm with her husband, have likewise determined that she might engage her services and property in copartnership undertakings with third parties. The statutes of Massachusetts and many other states expressly confer upon married women the right to carry on trade or business and perform labor or service on their sole and separate accounts. We have no such statutory provision conferring express power, but from the earliest cases since the passage of the Married Woman's Act in 1855 our statutes have been interpreted as giving power to married women to carry on business or trade in their own names and upon their sole accounts. Tilman v. Shackleton, 15 Mich. 447, 98 Am. Dec. 198; Campbell v. White, 22 Mich. 178; Powers v. Russell, 26 Mich. 179; Rankin v. West, 25 Mich. 195. If a married woman may carry on a business in her own name, and appoint agents who may make contracts for her and in her name, we see no reason why these statutes should be interpreted as restrictive of her rights to enter a firm as a partner with others aside from her husband, and thus bind her separate property for such firm's undertakings, as partners in a firm are the agents of each other in a transaction of partnership affairs; and it is conferring no more power upon the partner to bind the sole and separate property of a married woman than such married woman would have the right to contract for through any other agency. We think the great weight of authority under statutes quite similar to our own hold that married women, while incompetent to enter into partnership engagements with their husbands, are free to enter partnership firms with third parties, and bind their separate properties as fully and to the same extent as they might do through any other agency, where they carry on business upon their sole and separate accounts. 1 Bates on Partnership, § 136, states the rule as follows: "Where statutes give a married woman power to sell and contract as to her separate property, and to carry on a business, she may invest it in a partnership, since this is a usual way of carrying on business, and it is no objection that she thereby becomes liable for the acts of others, for the same happens if she owns stock in a company, or employs an agent. Her separate property is still hers, and does not become liable for her husband's debts." Harris on Contracts of Married Women, p. 511, also lays down the following proposition: "If the Legislature has conferred upon the married woman the full, complete, and free power to carry on a separate trade or business, that seems to carry with it, by necessary implication of law, the right to conduct such business upon the same principles, the same system, in the same manner, to the same extent, and at her own option, as fully and freely as any other person, and to say that she cannot form a partnership would be to deny her a valuable right in business relations, which is allowed to other persons. It will not do to say that she is a sole trader, with all the power in relation to her trade and business that she would have if a feme sole, unless she has the liberty to exercise an unrestricted option as to the mode of carrying on such business, provided there be no fraud perpetrated on others. It has been insisted by some that, if she form a partnership, she becomes, by that relation, liable as a partner, and is bound by the debts, either contracted by herself or another member of the firm, and this would often subject her property to the debts and liabilities of another person. But I can see no good reason consistent with the full power as a sole trader why she should not enter into a partnership in business if she thinks her separate interests would be promoted thereby." The court below was therefore in error in dismissing the bill as against Mrs. Tallmadge. In other respects the bill will stand and an accounting to be had, as provided under the decree; the bill to stand against Mrs. Tallmadge the same as the other defendants. The bill, having been dismissed as to the defendants Margaret J. Winterstein, Johnson Winterstein, and John J. Lunau, under stipulation between the parties, will not be disturbed.

The decree of the court below, with these modifications, will be affirmed, and the case remanded to the court below for the purpose of taking an accounting. Complainants will recover their costs of this court.

The other Justices concurred.

v.

WEST VIRGINIA & PITTSBURGH R.
CO., Pff. in Err.

(.....W. Va.....)

1. In an action of trespass against a railroad company for injuries received at a railroad crossing by reason of the failure of the defendant to give the signal required by statute, in order that the plaintiff should recover, he must not only prove that the defendant failed to give the signal required by statute, but that such failure was the proximate cause of his injury.

2. Where negligence is the ground of the action it rests upon the plaintiff to trace the fault for his injury to the defendant, and for this purpose he must show the circumstances under which the injury occurred, and if, from these circumstances so proven by the plaintiff, it appears that the fault was mutual, or, in other words, that contributory negligence is fairly imputable to him, he has, by proving the circumstances, disproved his right to recover, and on the plaintiff's evidence alone the jury should find for the defendant.

3. A traveler on a public road must exercise at least ordinary care and caution. No recovery can be had by the plaintiff where his negligence in any degree contributed to the injury received by colliding with a railroad train at a public crossing, unless the defendant, being aware of the plaintiff's danger, and having the opportunity to avert it, fails to use ordinary caution to do so.

ages for injuries to plaintiff's person and property caused by a collision with defendant's train at a point where defendant's road crossed a public highway, which were alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John Brannon and W. W. Brannon, for plaintiff in error:

If the matter of the statutory signal were of any importance in the case the burden is not upon the defendant to show that the signal was given, but on the contrary it is upon the plaintiff to show that it was not given.

Peoria, D. & E. R. Co. v. Foltz, 18 Ill. App. 535.

If the defendant had failed to give the required alarm in this case, it avails nothing to the plaintiff, for such failure is not the proximate cause of the injury.

If the defendant were liable for injury resulting from fright of plaintiff's horses, there could be no recovery in this action, for the plaintiff in his declaration has ascribed it to the failure of the defendant to give the proper alarm. But a railroad company is not liable for injuries resulting from fright of horses caused by sight of train or noises incident to its movement.

Measrs. G. M. Chidester and W. B. McGary for defendant in error.

English, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action of trespass on the case, brought by William T. Butcher against the West Virginia & Pittsburgh Railroad Company in the circuit court of Lewis county to recover damages for an injury occasioned by a train of cars belonging to the defendant running against a wagon and team of three horses at "Dodson's Crossing" on the line of defendant's road between the village of Jane Lew and town of Weston in said county. The plaintiff, at the time of the collision, was riding in the wagon, and a boy was riding the saddle horse in the team. The declaration contains the usual allegations, and the damages are laid at $2,000. As the regular judge of the circuit court could not preside at the trial, John J. Davis was elected special judge, and presided at the trial. The plea of not guilty was interposed. Issue was joined thereon, and the case was submitted to a jury, who, having heard the evidence and arguments of counsel, found for the plaintiff, and assessed his damages at $2,000 and thereupon the defendant, by its attorney, moved the court to set aside said verdict, and grant it a new trial, upon the ground that the same was contrary to the law and the evidence in the cause, which motion was overruled, and judgment was rendered upon said verdict, to which opinion of the court in overruling said motion the defendant, by its counsel, excepted, and tendered a bill of exception, in which the entire evidence introduced by the plaintiff and the defendant is set forth.

The material facts disclosed by the evidence introduced by the plaintiff are that on the 23d day of May, 1890, the plaintiff was passing along the turnpike road leading from the village of Jane Lew to the town of Weston in a wagon drawn by three horses; that when plaintiff and his team, which was driven by a boy riding one of the horses, was about 200 yards from the Dodson crossing, where the railroad crosses said turnpike, the train came up behind him, and scared his horses, and they ran off. At this point, and from there to the said crossing, the turnpike and railroad ran parallel, and were very close together, and at said crossing said team and the railroad train collided, resulting in cutting and bruising the plaintiff, and mashing and lacerating his left hand to such an extent that it had to be amputated. The evidence shows that the train was running at the speed of 16 miles an hour, which would be about 1 mile in four minutes, and it would run 200 yards in about thirty seconds. After the horses commenced running they must have gone at about the same speed, because they met the locomotive at the crossing, or rather ran into it at that point, although they may have had a little the start of the train. Was the injury complained of caused by the failure of the trainmen to give the statutory signal by blowing the whistle or ringing the bell? Can we say that, if the whistle had been blown for Dodson's crossing at a point 380 yards therefrom, as required by statute, the injury would not have occurred? The plaintiff, when asked, "Where was the train when the team started to run off? How far was it from Dodson's crossing?" answered, "I should say 200 yards, and that when the horses started to run off they were about 200 yards from Dodson's crossing;" so, according to his own statement, the train must have been about opposite to his wagon when they started to run. And he further states that the train came up behind him, and scared his horses, and they ran off; and when asked: How it was that he knew the train was coming. "You say the horses were scared, and there was nothing there to obstruct your view, and the train was running close to the county road?" answered, "The noise of the train behind me scared the horses;" and when asked, "Well, William, were you drinking any that day?" answered, "Yes, sir;" and when asked, "Can you account for them,—how many?" answered, "I know I did not take more than two, and I ain't positive I took two." He further states that Ralph Butcher, a boy seventeen or eighteen years of age, was driving the team, riding the saddle horse, and he (plaintiff) was sitting in the wagon on the seat board, and that the accident occurred immediately on the crossing. We next look to the condition of Ralph Butcher, the driver, and find that Green Waggoner, a witness for the defense, in regard to whose testimony there is no conflict, says that on the 23d of May he went up the road behind plaintiff as far as Van Fleasher's; that there was a young fellow with Butcher; Butcher was on the wagon, and looked like he was drunk; both of them seemed to be tottering along; and when asked to explain to the jury what he meant, answered, "He looked to me like he was drunk;" and when asked, "How was the other fellow?" answered, "He was drunk too," and when asked if he was tottering too, answered, "It looked that way." Harrison Alkire, another witness for the defense, states that he saw them about a quarter of a mile from Dodson's crossing, at Eddy's blacksmith shop. That when Butcher and his young man came up to the shop they ran against the fence, and one of the horses got fastened in the fence. The fore horse got down close to the fence, and got his trace fastened. The young man got off the horse to fix the trace, and fell down in the road. "I would call them drunk. I helped him after he got off his horse, and then he and Mr. Butcher went about their business." That the road was wide enough for two wagons to pass where the horse got fastened. Mr. Eddy, the blacksmith, after speaking of the team running against his fence, states that "Mr. Butcher, after some time, got off of the wagon, and came into the shop, and from his talk and conversation I judged him to be drunk. He could hardly stand up, and had to hold to the side of the shop. The young man was on the saddle horse. He got off of the horse after the team ran into the fence, and he and Harrison Alkire fixed up a trace that had come unfastened, and got the team away from the fence. After that he staggered around, and fell down." And Moses Kittle, another witness for the defense, states that he saw a man and boy passing with a wagon and three horses before they reached Eddy's shop, and heard great hallooing and whooping on one or two occasions, and thought it was cattle coming up the pike; and when he went over to the rise, towards Waggoner's, saw the wagon with three horses in it and two parties away up on the turnpike. There is other evidence on this point, but this is sufficient to clearly indicate not only the condition of the driver but the plaintiff himself, when he was approaching the crossing where the accident occurred, and was not more than one quarter of a mile therefrom. If the plaintiff was sober himself,—which is more than problematical,—he had intrusted the management of his team and wagon in which he was traveling to a young man, who, if he was himself capable of exercising any degree of care or prudent forethought, he must have seen and known was incapable of driving a team with any degree of safety, and who had already shown himself incapable of keeping the horses in the turnpike road.

Under this statement of the case are we warranted in saying that the failure of the trainmen to give the statutory signals for Dodson's crossing constituted the proximate cause of the injury received by the plaintiff? On the contrary, it is very clear that, if the team had traveled at its ordinary gait, it never would have reached the Dodson crossing at the time the train did from the point where the team started to run off. Instead of going at the speed of 8 or 4 miles an hour, it must have gone at the rate of 16 miles an hour. The plaintiff saw the train, and had notice of its approach towards the Dodson crossing when he was 200 yards away from said crossing; and, but for the fact that his driver was unable to control the team, no accident would have resulted. The plaintiff knew the train was approaching, because, when asked if the train whistled at the Courtright crossing, he answered, "Yes, sir; I think they did;" and Mr Woodell, the engineer who was in charge of the train, says he blew the whistle both at Courtright's and for Dodson's crossing, the last whistle being done just a little on this side of Courtright's house, at the whistling post for Dodson's crossing; and, when asked how far it was from Courtright's crossing to Dodson's crossing, replied, "300 yards, or something like it." This, then, would be a point within the 60 rods required by statute for whistling before a crossing is reached. Woodell swears positively that he did blow the whistle for Dodson's crossing. In this statement he is corroborated by the witnesses Morgan, W. H. Jeffries, and P. T. Lorentz. One or two witnesses say the whistle was not blown for Dodson's crossing, and others say they did not hear it. On this point, Lawson, in his work on Rights and Remedies, (vol. 3, § 1184,) says: "Where the evidence is conflicting as to whether the bell was rung or the whistle sounded at a crossing, and there is affirmative testimony that this duty was performed and negative testimony by other witnesses that they did not hear it, the affirmative evidence of the fact should overcome the negative. That the plaintiff did not hear the signal is no evidence that it was not given." But, for the purposes of this case, I regard it as immaterial whether the whistle was blown for Dodson's crossing or not, as all the benefit it would have been to the plaintiff would have been to give him warning of the approach of the train to the crossing, and on this point a witness, T. G. Walker, introduced by the plaintiff states that a man driving along the road sitting on the wagon seat could see the train after it left Jane Lew. Add to this the fact that the plaintiff admits in his testimony that he thinks the train blew its whistle at the Courtright crossing, now if it is true that from his position in the wagon the plaintiff could have seen the train from the time it left Jane Lew, and heard it whistling at Courtright's crossing, and again heard it coming behind him, he must have known it was approaching the Dodson crossing, and he had all the warning he could have had if it had blown for the Dodson crossing. The failure to give the statutory signal, then, was not the proximate cause of the defendant's injury. If I am correct in this conclusion, and it is made to appear that the injury received by the plaintiff was caused by his own negligence, the finding of the jury was erroneous, and the court below erred in refusing to set it aside, because by the language of the statute, (section 61 of chapter 54 of the Code,) which requires such signal to be given, it is provided that "the corporation owning or operating the railroad shall be liable to any party injured for all damages sustained by reason of such neglect;" and it follows that the corporation should not be liable for damage occasioned by the neglect of the plaintiff himself. If it appeared in this case that the plaintiff was in the act of crossing the railroad at Dodson's crossing after looking and listening as the law requires, and that by reason of the failure of the trainmen to give the statutory signal he had no notice of the approach of the train, and, in consequence thereof, his injuries were inflicted, the verdict and judgment complained of might be sustained; but when we can in no manner trace the result to the failure to give such signal, I cannot perceive how said verdict and judgment can be sustained.

The injury to the plaintiff in this case evidently resulted from the fact that the horses attached to his wagon became frightened at the train, and from the further fact that at the time they became so frightened and ran away the plaintiff himself was under the influence of liquor, and the party to whom he had intrusted the management of his team was drunk, and incapable of controlling or managing the horses. Patterson on Railway Accident Law, (page 152,) says: "But the railway is not liable for injuries resulting from the fright of horses on a highway, caused by the mere sight of the train, or by the noises necessarily incident to its movement." This law is reasonable, and, were it not the law, it would be impossible to operate a railroad where it is paralleled by turnpikes and county roads, as was the case in this instance. In the case under consideration there was nothing to obscure the approaching train. The testimony shows that it was visible from the time it left Jane Lew; that it blew its whistle at Courtright's crossing, so that the party in charge of the team, if he had been in a condition to do so, could have dismounted and unhitched or held his team if he had wished to do so. In the case of Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Stinger, 78 Pa. 219, point 5 of syllabus, it was held that "a railroad company having a chartered right to propel their cars by steam are not responsible for injuries resulting from the proper use of such agency;" (6) that "whether alarming a horse, and causing an accident by a rapidly moving train, or sounding a whistle, will make the company liable for damages, depends upon whether it was from want of proper care in those in charge of the train;" (7) "what would be due care in running a train through a sparsely settled rural district might be negligence in approaching a large city;" (10) "one driving an unbroken or vicious horse, or one easily frightened by a locomotive, along a public road running side by side with a railroad, does so at his own peril; the right of the company to move their trains on their road is as high as that of the individual to use the public road." In the case of Flint v. Norwich & W. R. Co., 110 Mass. 232, in an action to recover for injuries caused by the plaintiff's horse becoming frightened by cars on the defendant's railroad, it appeared that the railroad crossed the highway on which the plaintiff was traveling; that the horse became frightened when about five rods from the crossing by the approach of two cars about ten rods therefrom; that the cars were coming on a down grade by force of gravitation at the rate of eight or ten miles an hour; and that no signal was given of their approach. Held, that these facts would not warrant the jury in returning a verdict for the plaintiff. Now, as to the horses attached to the plaintiff's wagon on the day he was injured, our only way of determining whether they were afraid of the cars, and liable to run off when the train approached them, is by the fact stated by the witnesses that they did run off; and the plaintiff himself says, "The train came up below, and frightened my team, and they ran away." There is nothing in the evidence that discloses that the defendant was running its train at an unusual rate of speed; in fact it appears that it was only running at the rate of 16 miles an hour. It does not appear that any unusual or unnecessary noise was being created by escaping steam, or by blowing the whistle, but the horses were frightened at the ordinary noise made by a train in motion; and we must conclude that the plaintiff was driving horses that were unbroken, or those that were easily frightened by a locomotive, and such being the case, the circumstances would be similar in point of fact to the case of Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Stinger, above quoted.

It would be grossly unreasonable to require the conductor of a railroad train to check its speed or stop its progress every time a team of horses on a lateral road showed a disposition to frighten or run away, and the conductor who pursued that course in these days of rush and rapid transit would receive a very small share of the patronage of the traveling community. As to the manner in which this accident occurred there is no conflict between the plaintiff and the engineer, Woodell. The latter says he was standing in the cab, on the right side, looking out,—the only place he could stand,—when he heard something strike the cab, and chains rattling, and then whistled down brakes, and looked out, and saw the lead horse up against the cab, the wagon and two men. That was the first knowledge he had of the approach of the wagon. That Butcher was not hurt until after down brakes was whistled, for just after the horse struck the cab he looked back, and saw Butcher sitting in the wagon. They were on this side of the crossing, in the cut, when they ran against the train in the cut. The wagon upset against the train, and threw plaintiff out between the railroad and the side of the hill. And Butcher, in his testimony, says: "There was a little embankment there, and the horses went in between that and the train. The wagon turned over, and was broken to pieces." And when asked what part of the train struck him, replied that he did not know for certain what part of the train; some of the coaches, he thought. So that it appears from the evidence that the plaintiff's team was not run over by the train at the crossing, but that the team, in its fright, running away, struck the cab, which, as is well known, and as is shown by the evidence, is back of the engine; and the plaintiff was injured by his wagon upsetting and throwing him against one of the coaches. The injury to the plaintiff, then, was not occasioned by the train running against the team, but by the team, in its fright, running against the side of the train. My conclusion, then, is that the fright of the team was the proximate cause of the injury. Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (vol. 2, § 463) states the law as follows: "The rights of a traveler on the highway, at a point where it is crossed on a level by a railroad, are subordinate to those of the railroad company, so far as to require the traveler to give way to any train which is in sight or hearing, though not in such a sense as to give the company a right to block up the highway; for its right is only given for the purpose of travel, not of storing its cars or goods. Both parties are, however, equally bound to use ordinary care,—that is, such care as a prudent man would usually take under similar circumstances,—the one to avoid committing, and the other to avoid receiving, injury." In this instance the engineer was at his post on the right-hand side of the cab, his attention directed to the crossing, which was apparently clear, while the runaway

Team was on the left side of the train, advancing rapidly in the same direction the train was going, but did not reach the crossing until the head of the train had passed, and in consequence the lead horse struck the cab back of the engine, which gave the engineer the first intimation of the presence of the horses and wagon. The train was where it had a right to be, and the frightened horses, by running against it, caused the plaintiff's injury. The fright of the horses was occasioned by the appearance of the moving train, without any unusual noise or emission of steam, so far as appears from the evidence. In the case of Bevel v. Newport News & M. V. R. Co., 84 W. Va. 538, this court held that "the traveler and the company have mutual and reciprocal duties and obligations in such case, [that was where the traveler was crossing the railroad at a regular crossing,] and, though a train has the right of way, the same degree of care and diligence to avoid collision is due to both." Lawson on Rights, Remedies, and Practice, (vol. 8, § 1183,) states the law as follows: "Where, by statute or municipal ordinance, the railroad is required on approaching a crossing to ring a bell or sound a whistle, the omission to do so is negligence rendering the company liable, provided the failure of duty is the proximate cause of the injury, and they are not able to show that the omission was reasonable and prudent." Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, (vol. 1, § 25,) under the heading "Proximate Cause," says: "We now come to the most important and difficult part of the general definition of a right of action upon negligence,—the connection between the negligent act or omission and the damage. No action can be maintained upon an act of negligence unless the breach of duty has been the cause of the damage. The fact that the defendant has been guilty of negligence followed by an accident does not make him liable for the resulting injury unless that was occasioned by the negligence. The connection of cause and effect must be established; and the defendant's breach of duty, and not merely his act, must be the cause of the plaintiff's damage." And in section 26 it is said: "Breach of duty must be the proximate cause. The breach of duty upon which an action is brought must be not only the cause, but the proximate cause, of the damage to the plaintiff. . . . The proximate cause of an event must be understood to be that which, in a natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new cause, produces that event, and without which that event would not have occurred. . . . That is the proximate cause which is most proximate in the order of responsible causation. . . . If it cannot be said that the result would have inevitably occurred by reason of the defendant's negligence, it cannot be found that it did so occur, and plaintiff has not made out his case." See Bigelow, Torts, 608-626.

Now, the question is, Did the failure to whistle for Dodson's crossing, if such failure was clearly proven, have anything whatever to do with frightening the plaintiff's horses? What witness in the case testifies that such failure if it existed, had any effect whatever in causing the plaintiff's injury? If the horses were frightened at the train, and the evidence is that they were 200 yards from the crossing, can any one say that a whistle sounded near them would have had a tendency to quiet them and allay their fears? Surely not. It is, however, too evident that this injury was not caused by any negligence on the part of the defendant. The injury resulted from the fact that the plaintiff went onto this turnpike road, which he knew ran parallel with and very near to the railroad track, and in so doing he intrusted his team to a driver who, by reason of his intoxication, was incapable of controlling it. The horses became frightened at the train passing along without unusual noise. The fright of the horses was the proximate cause of the injury, and not the failure to give the statutory signal. By going onto this road with a team that was afraid of the cars, with a drunken driver, he was guilty of contributory negligence. In the case of Phillips v. Ritchie County, 81 W. Va. 478, this court held that a traveler on a public road must exercise at least ordinary care and caution. No recovery can be had by the plaintiff in an action against a county where his negligence in any degree contributed to the injury, unless the defendant, being aware of the plaintiff's danger, and having the opportunity to avert it, fails to use ordinary caution to do so. In the case of Gerity v. Haley, 29 W. Va. 98, this court held that, "where negligence is the ground of the action, it rests upon the plaintiff to trace the fault of his injury to the defendant, and for this purpose he must show the circumstances under which the injury occurred; and if, from these circumstances, so proven by the plaintiff, it appears that the fault was mutual, or, in other words, that contributory negligence is fairly imputable to him, he has, by proving the circumstances, disproved his right to recover, and on the plaintiff's evidence alone the jury should find for the defendant." Judge Green, in his opinion, quoted this law from Judge Cooley's work on Torts, (page 673,) and, in commenting on it, says: "This, it seems to me, is a correct exposition of the law, and consists with our decisions, though there are to be found in them expressions which, unless the whole case is examined with care, might seem to be inconsistent with the law as above stated;" and this quotation was incorporated in the syllabus.

Numerous other cases might be cited bearing upon the questions involved in this case, but these are regarded as sufficient to show that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover anything from the defendant under the facts disclosed by the testimony; and for these reasons, the judgment complained of must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the case remanded to the Circuit Court of Lewis County for further proceedings to be had therein, and the defendant in error must pay the costs of this writ of error.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

WINNEY
v.
SANDWICH MANUFACTURING CO.,
Appt.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. A petition against a foreign corporation showing that defendant had no agent within the state upon whom personal service could be had between the inception of the right and the commencement of the action is not demurrable on the ground that the cause of action is barred.

2. In an action on a contract against a foreign corporation, service to be good must be made on an agent conducting the business out of which the contract arose.

3. The running of the Statute of Limitations in favor of a foreign corporation depends on the fact of its residence

NOTE.—Right of foreign corporation to plead Statute of Limitations.

In some states it is established that a foreign corporation cannot plead the Statute of Limitations. This is the law in New York. Thompson v. Tioga R. Co. 86 Barb. 79; Mallory v. Tioga R. Co. 8 Keyes, 354; Olcott v. Tioga R. Co. 20 N. Y. 210, 75 Am. Dec. 393.

And even if such corporation has property and an agent subject to service of process within the state it is still denied the right to plead the Statute of Limitations. Rathbun v. Northern Cent. R. Co. 50 N. Y. 656; Boardman v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 157.

These New York decisions overrule the earlier case of Faulkner v. Delaware & R. Canal Co. 1 Denio, 441, which upheld such a plea by a foreign corporation.

In Nevada also the same rule is adopted that prevails in New York and a foreign corporation is not allowed to plead the Statute of Limitations. Robinson v. Imperial Silver Min. Co. 5 Nev. 44; State v. Central Pac. R. Co. 10 Nev. 47; Barstow v. Union Consol. Silver Min. Co. Id. 383.

The Federal courts follow the state decisions in cases arising in these states. Blossburg & C. R. Co. v. Tioga R. Co. 5 Blatchf. 347; Kirby v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 14 Fed. Rep. 231; Tioga R. Co. v. Blossburg & C. R. Co. 37 U. S. 20 Wall. 137, 22 L. ed. 331; Union Consol. Silver Min. Co. v. Taylor, 100 U. S. 37, 25 L. ed. 541.

On the other hand, the right of a foreign corporation to plead the Statute of Limitations was assumed without discussion in Koons v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 23 Iowa, 493; Cobb v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 38 Iowa, 601.

And in Wall v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 60 Iowa, 493, a plea of the Statute of Limitations by a railroad company was upheld where the statute provided for commencing actions against such corporations by service "upon any agent of such corporation . . . wherever found or upon any station, ticket, or other agent of such corporation or person transacting the business thereof in the county where suit is brought. If there be no such agent in said county then service may be had upon an agent thereof transacting said business in any other county."

Likewise in Pennsylvania Co. v. Sloan, 1 Ill. App. 334, a foreign railroad company was allowed to plead the Statute of Limitations under a statute allowing actions against railroad companies in any county where the road runs and service upon "any agent of said company found in said county," and providing that foreign corporations should be subject to all liabilities, etc., imposed upon the corporations of like character organized under the general laws of the state, and should have no other or greater powers.

So in Alabama, California, and Montana it has been held that where a corporation is present in the state by a known place of business and an authorized agent on whom process may be served during the whole period of the Statute of Limitations it is entitled to plead such statute. Huss v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. 66 Ala. 472; Lawrence v. Ballow, 50 Cal. 233; King v. National M. & E. Co. 4 Mont. 1.

The same rule is adopted by the Federal court sitting in Iowa in accordance with the decisions of that state. McCabe v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 4 McCrary, 492, 13 Fed. Rep. 327.

In United States Exp. Co. v. Ware, 37 U. S. 20 Wall. 543, 22 L. ed. 422, on writ of error to the circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska a charge to the jury that an action against a foreign corporation was barred after the statutory period had run if service might have been had at any time during that period upon an agent of the company and otherwise not was held not erroneous. It does not appear that this question had been decided by the state courts of Nebraska.

In Norris v. Atlas S. S. Co., 37 Fed. Rep. 423, it was decided by a circuit court of the United States that under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc., § 401, providing that the exception in the Statute of Limitations as to a person out of the state should not apply while a designation by him of a person within the state on whom service could be made was in force, the statute did not run if before the expiration of the statutory period the person so designated left the state. But, as will be seen by the other decisions above, this exception in the statute does not apply in any case against a foreign corporation in New York.

But a foreign corporation is entitled to the benefit of that provision of the New York Statute of Limitations providing that an action against a non-resident which accrued in another state and is there barred shall not be brought in New York state except in certain specified cases. Penfield v. Chesapeake, O. & S. W. R. Co. 134 U. S. 351, 33 L. ed. 940.

An early decision of the United States Supreme Court held that where the plaintiff in an action was a foreign corporation the members of which were averred to be aliens and British subjects the presumption was that they were residents abroad and if so were within the exception of the statute as to persons "beyond seas." Society for Prop. Gosp. v. Pawlet, 20 U. S. 4 Pet. 430, 7 L. ed. 327.

The change in the doctrine of the United States Supreme Court as to the citizenship of corporations for purposes of jurisdiction whereby the corporation itself is regarded as a legal entity existing at the place of its incorporation without regard to the citizenship or residence of its members has rather strengthened than impaired the above decision, which was made at a time when the residence or citizenship of the members of a corporation was regarded as determining that of the corporation itself.

The main case makes a distinction which is entirely new as to the corporations which may and those which may not plead the statute. But it cannot reconcile the conflict in the decisions because some of them deny that any foreign corporation can plead such statute.

B. A. R.

in the state in such sense that service may be made on it, through its keeping a managing agent therein, and not upon the knowledge or lack of knowledge of one having a cause of action against it as to the presence of such agent, but a foreign manufacturing corporation whose business is such that it can carry it on without a resident general agent cannot set the statutes running by appointing at any time or times an agent in the state upon whom process might be served.

4. It will be presumed on appeal that the jury followed an erroneous instruction allowing interest for a greater period than demanded in the petition although the verdict is much less than the damages demanded.

5. Plaintiff in an action upon a warranty cannot recover interest for a longer period than asked in his petition.

(October 25, 1892.)*

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Franklin County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged breach of warranty of a harvesting machine. Affirmed on condition.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Andrews & Bedell for appellant.

Messrs. Taylor & Evans for appellee.

Kinne, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The original opinion in this case will be found in 60 N. W. Rep. 565. February 28, 1889, plaintiff filed a petition asking damages on an oral contract of warranty made in 1883. An amendment to the petition was filed in March, 1889, alleging that defendant was a foreign corporation; that the contract was made with its agent at Hampton, Iowa; that said agency terminated in 1885, and was never re-established. It pleaded the warranty, the breaches thereof, and that in 1885 defendant agreed to so fix the harvester that it would comply with the warranty; pleaded its refusal so to do; that said agency was terminated immediately thereafter. A demurrer to the petition was sustained, and a substituted petition was filed, which alleged that in 1888 the contract was made with one Coble, then an agent of defendant at Hampton, Iowa; that he ceased to be such agent in July, 1885, and that since that time defendant had never had an agency at said place; that the defendant then was, and ever since continued to be, a nonresident of this state, and plaintiff could not at any time after July 25, 1885, and prior to January 1, 1889, obtain personal service on defendant in this state. Other allegations were made, not necessary to be set out here. A motion to strike the substituted petition was sustained as to a portion not set out herein, and overruled as to the balance. Defendant insists that the motion should have been sustained, because the substituted petition is, in effect, the same as the original petition, to which a demurrer was sustained. One of the grounds of the demurrer was that the cause of action was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

2. The amended petition alleges that defendant is a foreign corporation, having its principal place of business in and being a resident of Illinois, but it does not aver that it was a nonresident of this state. In the substituted petition it is alleged that defendant was a nonresident of the state, and personal service could not have been had on it in this state after 1885. Although defendant was a resident of Illinois, yet, if it had an agency in this state, it would constitute it a resident of Iowa, so as to authorize the service of process on its agent in an action brought against it. Hence it appears from the allegations of the substituted petition that from 1885 to 1889 no action could have been brought against defendant in this state. The substituted petition, thus showing on its face that the action was not barred, was not vulnerable to a demurrer, and hence the motion to strike was properly overruled, so far as it was based on the defense of the Statute of Limitations.

3. The sixth instruction given by the court reads thus: "If you shall find from the evidence that the defendant during the year 1888 had an agent and agency at Hampton, Iowa, for the sale of the reapers and binders, and that in July of said year said agent sold to plaintiff the machine in question, then the original notice in this action could have been served upon such agent or his successor in such agency at any time while such agent or his successor retained the agency and authority to sell such machines, or to settle for any damages arising from warranty on the sale of such machines. But if such agency for the sale or management of the reaping and binding machines was revoked and canceled by the defendant and such agent at such agency at any time, then, and in that case, service of the original notice in this action could not have been legally made upon such agent so as to bind the defendant while such revocation and cancellation existed, even though you should find that defendant had still kept an agent or agency there, whose duties were limited to the sale of his repairs and other implements." Appellant objects to so much of the instruction as is in italics. The instruction seems to mean that service, to be good, would have to be made on an agent engaged in conducting the business out of which the contract arose. To that extent it is correct. State Ins. Co. v. Granger, 62 Iowa, 272; Philp v. Covenant Mut. Ben. Assn. 62 Iowa, 633. In some other respects we think the instruction is erroneous, but appellant does not complain of it.

The court also instructed the jury on the theory that defendant might avail itself of the Statute of Limitations as follows: "If you shall find from the evidence that between the date of the alleged purchase and warranty of the machine in question and the time of the commencement of this action the defendant had one or more general agents located in this state, and that plaintiff knew such fact, or by the exercise of ordinary prudence and diligence he could have ascertained such fact, then, and in that case, you are justified in finding that during the time defendant's said general agents were located in the state, and the plaintiff knew, or by the exercise of ordinary prudence and diligence could have known such fact, that during such time, for the purpose of this suit, the defendant was a resident of this state. But even though you shall find that during said time or a part of such time the defendant did have a general agent or agents located in the state, but that, owing to such fact not being generally known, plaintiff did not know of it, and by the exercise of ordinary prudence and diligence could have known of it, then, and in that case, the mere fact that defendant did have a general agent or agents in the state would not constitute defendant a resident of this state for the purpose of this action." Appellant complains of this instruction, for that the running of the Statute of Limitations is made to depend upon the knowledge that plaintiff had, or by the exercise of ordinary prudence and diligence might have had, of the existence within this state of an agent of the defendant, having general management of its business. This instruction is evidently drawn in view of the provisions of section 2612 of the Code, which reads: "When the action is against a municipal corporation, service may be made on the mayor or clerk, and, if against any other corporation, on any trustee or officer thereof, or on any agent employed in general management of its business," etc. Under the provisions of this section service made on the defendant's agent employed in the general management of its business would be good. Nor need such agent have a fixed or definite place of business or location, but he might be served at any place where found within the state. Centennial Mut. L. Assn. v. Walker, 60 Iowa, 78. But the instruction in effect holds that, though defendant might have an agent in the state, employed in the general management of its business, yet, if such fact was not known to plaintiff, and he could not have ascertained it by the exercise of proper care and diligence, then the Statute of Limitations would not run against plaintiff's cause of action. In other words, the running of the statute is made to depend upon plaintiff's knowledge or lack of knowledge of the fact of the existence of a general agent in the state. We do not think that this is the law. The running of the statute in such a case must depend on the fact of residence of the defendant in such a sense that service of process could be made upon it. If it be to that extent a resident, the statutes would run in its favor, regardless of the fact of plaintiff's knowledge of such residence, if such defense was available in favor of defendant, — a question hereafter discussed.

*A decision was reached in this case and an opinion handed down on December 17, 1891. A rehearing was subsequently granted after which the decision as represented by the opinion given herewith was reached which, to some extent, is in conflict with, and therefore supersedes, the former opinion, and renders its publication unnecessary.

5. The sixth instruction in effect states the law to be that a foreign corporation can set in operation in its favor the Statute of Limitations by establishing an office or agency in this state. In the eighth instruction it is held that such corporation can accomplish the same purpose by having a general agent located in this state if plaintiff knew, or by the exercise of ordinary prudence might know, that such an agent was located in this state. Our statute provides that "the time during which a defendant is a nonresident of the state shall not be included in computing any of the periods of limitations above described." Code, § 2533; Wetmore v. Marsh, 81 Iowa, 677. In Koons v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 23 Iowa, 493, and Cobb v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 38 Iowa, 601, the question as to whether a nonresident corporation could plead the statute was not directly raised. In Wall v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 69 Iowa, 498, it was held that a foreign railroad corporation could avail itself of the defense of the Statute of Limitations. That decision was based upon the ground that, though the corporation was a resident of another state, yet it had a residence in this state for the purpose of being at any time served with process and made amenable in our courts. Without in any way impairing the force of that decision, we may say that we are not inclined to apply the rule there laid down to foreign corporations generally. A railroad company is of necessity obliged to operate its road. It must always have officers and agents in the state where its road is situated, in order to carry on its business. By our statutes it may be brought within the jurisdiction of our courts by service of processes upon its general agent anywhere in this state; also process may be served on its station, ticket, or any other agent, or on any trustee or officer. Code, §§ 2611, 2612. In such cases, then, service of process may always be had on the corporation within the state. Not so in the case at bar. Here is a manufacturing corporation. It may establish an office or agency, and, if it does, process may be served in certain cases upon the agent or clerk employed therein. It may have a general agent in the state, in which case process may be served upon him. It may, however, carry on its business without either establishing an office or agency in the state, or having a general agent therein. Surely, in such a case, it would hardly be contended that the corporation was a resident of the state so as to be served with process; hence it could not avail itself of the defense of the Statute of Limitations. If appellant's theory is good, a foreign corporation can, at its pleasure, and for its own benefit, put in motion the statute. We do not think such result was ever anticipated by the Legislature when it enacted the statute we have quoted. A foreign corporation, whose business in this state is such that it is not incumbent upon it to put itself in position to be at all times subject to the service of process, ought not to be permitted to shield itself behind the Statute of Limitations, because it may at some time or times (perhaps unknown to one having a cause of action against it) have an agent in this state upon whom process could be served. There is a wide distinction between the case of a railroad company, whose officers or agents may always be found within the state, and can readily be reached with process, and a foreign manufacturing corporation, having perhaps a general agent in this state, who may have no settled abiding place, whose relations to the party he serves are not generally known to the public, and the knowledge of whose coming and going must of necessity be limited to a few individuals. This question, so far as it relates to an office or agency in the state by an individual residing in another state, was mentioned, but not decided, in Bellows v. Litchfield, (Iowa) 48 N. W. Rep. 1062. In the view we have taken, appellant not being entitled to avail itself of the defense of the Statute of Limitations, it was not prejudiced by the giving of the sixth and eighth instructions in so far as they referred thereto.

6. In the tenth instruction the court told the jury that they should allow interest on any amount they might find due plaintiff from the date of sale of the machine at 6 per cent per annum. The petition on which the case was tried prayed for judgment with interest from the time of the commencement of the suit. The machine was sold in July, 1883, and the suit was begun in February, 1889, and the verdict was rendered March 22, 1890,—over six years after the machine was sold. If the jury followed the instruction, they allowed the plaintiff interest for over five years, to which he was not entitled under his prayer. We must presume that the jury followed the instruction. It seems to us that, notwithstanding the fact that the petition prayed for $300 damages, and the verdict was for much less than that, the giving of the instruction was prejudicial error.

7. Many other errors are assigned. We have examined them, and found nothing prejudicial to appellant. If appellee within sixty days files a remitter of the interest from date of contract to time of bringing of the suit, the judgment of the court below will be affirmed; otherwise it will be reversed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

LITTLE ROCK & FORT SMITH RAILWAY et al., Appts.,
v.
W. L. CRAVENS.

(.....Ark.....)

A carrier cannot by special contract limit its common-law liability for losses not occasioned by negligence where it does not afford the shipper an opportunity to contract for the service required without such restriction even if he makes the special contract without objection or demand for a different one.

(December 24, 1892.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Johnson County in NOTE.—Right of a common carrier to limit common-law liability by contract in the absence of negligence.

The statement that a common carrier may by contract limit its common-law liability except where it is guilty of negligence has been made in a multitude of cases, and this has been repeatedly declared to be a well-established doctrine. Such a general statement clearly conflicts with the doctrine of the above case. But a careful examination of the numerous cases in which this doctrine has been laid down shows that in them the question of right to refuse the shipper an option to pay to have his goods carried without any limitation of the carrier's liability at reasonable rates was not presented. Among the many such cases are the following: Dorr v. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. 11 N. Y. 485, 62 Am. Dec. 126; Fibel v. Livingston, 64 Barb. 179; Parsons v. Monteath, 13 Barb. 363; Stoddard v. Long Island R. Co. 5 Sandf. 180; Moore v. Evans, 14 Barb. 624; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Railroad, 119 Pa. 577; Grogan v. Adams Exp. Co. 114 Pa. 523, 40 Am. Rep. 360; Van Schaack v. Northern Transp. Co. 3 Bess. 304; Indianapolis, D. & W. R. Co. v. Forsythe (Ind. App.) Feb. 2, 1892; Adams Exp. Co. v. Fendrick, 38 Ind. 150; Cooper v. Berry, 21 Ga. 528; Kallman v. United States Exp. Co. 3 Kan. 205; Grace v. Adams, 100 Mass. 505, 97 Am. Dec. 117, 1 Am. Rep. 131; Christenson v. American Exp. Co. 15 Minn. 270, 2 Am. Rep. 122; Davidson v. Graham, 3 Ohio St. 181; Graham v. Davis, 4 Ohio St. 362, 38 Am. Dec. 285; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Skeels, 8 W. Va. 556.

In numerous other cases where a limitation of liability by contract is held to be allowable the report shows that there was in fact a consideration therefor in a reduction of rates although this was not expressly mentioned by the court as a reason for the decision. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Weekly, 50 Ark. 397; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Morris, 18 L. R. A.

son, 19 Ill. 136; St. Louis & S. E. R. Co. v. Smuck, 49 Ind. 302; Bartlett v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. 94 Ind. 281; Squire v. New York Cent. R. Co. 98 Mass. 239, 38 Am. Dec. 162; Durgin v. American Exp. Co. (N. H.) 9 L. R. A. 453; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Brady, 32 Md. 333; Lowe v. Booth, 13 Price. 329; Morrison v. Phillips & C. Constr. Co. 44 Wis. 405, 28 Am. Rep. 599; Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Payne, 6 L. R. A. 349, 86 Va. 431.

The English doctrine until it was modified by Act of Parliament is generally said to be that the carrier may limit his liability to any extent by contract; but that the English decisions to this effect do not mean to free the carrier from liability to carry the goods without limitation of liability on reasonable terms clearly appears by examination of them.

Thus in Harris v. Packwood, 3 Taunt. 271, in which a special acceptance limiting liability was held allowable, the court says that carriers "will not be insurers unless paid according to value."

So in Wyld v. Pickford, 3 Mees. & W. 443, it is declared that a carrier is entitled by common law to insist upon the full price of carriage and that he may if such price be not paid refuse to carry upon the terms imposed by the common law and insist upon his own.

The other English cases in which special acceptances, as they are termed, limiting liability are upheld are not opposed to this doctrine, but decisions allowing a restriction of the carrier's liability are clearly to be construed as permitting it only in case of a reduction of rates.

So in many American cases where the doctrine of the main case is not clearly stated it is fairly implied.

Thus in Farnham v. Camden & A. R. Co., 55 Pa. 53, in which a limitation of liability was upheld, the court says: "We are to presume, of course, favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of certain cotton which had been burned while in defendants' possession for transportation. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dodge & Johnson, for appellants:

Common carriers have the right to limit their common-law liability by express contract, and the fire-exemption clause is recognized as valid in the courts of this state and throughout the United States.

Taylor v. Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. 82 Ark. 393, 29 Am. Rep. 1; Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Hall, 82 Ark. 870; Taylor v. Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. 39 Ark. 148; Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. v. Talbot, Id. 529; Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. v. Corcoran, 40 Ark. 375; Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. v. Harper, 44 Ark. 209; *St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. The contracts of shipment on their face disclose that there was a good, valid, and reasonable consideration moving from the carriers to the plaintiff, which carried with them a right to limit the carrier's liability, and that was not overcome by any evidence introduced at the trial.

At common law, a carrier is not bound to carry except on its own line.

If carriers agree to carry beyond their lines and assume other duties and obligations not required by law, they have a right to demand a remuneration for the same, and it may be done in any way they see proper, provided it is reasonable and fair.

Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Denver & N. O. R. Co. 110 U. S. 687, 28 L. ed. 291; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Green, 25 Md. 73.

The shipment of plaintiff's cotton was an interstate shipment, for the reason that this cotton was destined to interstate points outside of the state of Arkansas.

There is no law requiring carriers to assume any liability beyond their own line of road.

that the charge for transportation was in proportion to the risk."

And in Judson v. Western R. Corp., 6 Allen. 486, 63 Am. Dec. 648, the court says: "The carrier has not the option to accept or refuse the carriage of the goods at his pleasure, but the person seeking to have them transported can choose whether they shall be carried without any restriction of the carrier's duty as prescribed by law."

And in York Mfg. Co. v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 107, 18 L. ed. 170, the court says the carrier cannot "coerce the owner to yield assent to a limitation of responsibility by making exorbitant charges when such assent is refused," but that he may "fix a rate of charges proportionate to the magnitude of the risks."

Likewise in Graham v. Davis, 4 Ohio St. 362, 62 Am. Dec. 235, the court says the carrier is "still regarded as exercising a public employment and incapable by any act of his own of limiting or evading the responsibility which the law attaches to its exercise."

In a few cases the courts have still more clearly and explicitly announced the doctrine of the main case which, as we have seen, may fairly be regarded as underlying all the decisions, even those in which the general statement of the right of a carrier to limit his liability may seem to deny it.

Thus, in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Dill, 48 Kan. 210, it is expressly declared that a carrier cannot limit his liability unless the contract is freely and fairly made, and that he cannot exact as a condition precedent to carrying goods that the shipper shall sign a contract limiting or changing the common-law liability. Also that if the carrier has two rates, one for the common-law liability and the other for the special contract, the shipper must have real freedom in making his selection.

So in McMillan v. Michigan & N. I. R. Co., 16 Mich. 78, 98 Am. Dec. 208, it is said by Judge Cooley 18 L. R. A.

in the opinion of the court that "subject to reasonable regulations every man has a right to insist that his property, if of such description as the carrier assumes to convey, shall be transported subject to the common-law liability."

Again, in O'Connell v. Adams Exp. Co., 1 Cent. L. J. 186, it is said: "A stipulation limiting the common-law liability of the carrier in order to be binding must be based on a special consideration such as a lower rate of freight or something equivalent."

This is reaffirmed in Dillard v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 2 Lea, 283, deciding that a lower rate of freight or something equivalent thereto will constitute a sufficient consideration for a limitation of liability.

Still more closely parallel with the main case is the decision in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 7 L. R. A. 162, 88 Tenn. 490, that a "fire clause in a bill of lading exempting the carrier from liability for loss by fire is not valid where transportation under the rules of the common law is not offered as an alternative and no reduction of rates is made as a consideration for the exemption."

The same principle in substance is announced in Missouri Pac. R. Co. v. Fagan (Tex.) 2 L. R. A. 75, holding that a common carrier has no right to demand of a shipper a waiver of his rights as a condition precedent to receiving freight.

By statute in some places a limitation of a carrier's liability by contract is prohibited. Thus in Texas, by Rev. Stat., art. 278, and in several other states by similar provisions.

And in England the Act of Parliament allows only such limitations as shall be found by the courts to be "just and reasonable."

The same doctrine on which the main case is based, and which seems clearly to underlie the general current of decisions, appears in cases as to the limitation of the amount of liability, as to which, see notes to Ballou v. Earle (R. I.) 14 L. R. A. 433.

B. A. R.

If then it is done, it must be voluntarily done by special contract and the carrier has the right to exact of the shipper a consideration therefor, because it is an accommodation in many ways. The carrier can charge greater rates, or he can require that in consideration of this routing and through rate his liability shall be limited, but in either event the consideration is a valid one on both sides.

Perkins v. Portland, S. & P. R. Co. 47 Me. 590, 74 Am. Dec. 507; Baltimore & P. S. B. Co. v. Brown, 54 Pa. 82; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Berry, 68 Pa. 277; Evansville & O. R. Co. v. Androscoggin Mills, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 601, 22 L. ed. 726; Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Mineral Springs Mfg. Co. 88 U. S. 16 Wall. 324, 21 L. ed. 801; Cutts v. Brainerd, 42 Vt. 568, 1 Am. Rep. 358; Root v. Great Western R. Co. 45 N. Y. 580; Hill Mfg. Co. v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 104 Mass. 185, 6 Am. Rep. 202.

The carrier thus issuing its through bill of lading is liable for the negligence of succeeding carriers on the line of transportation, whom he employs, to the same extent that he is liable for that of his own line.

Neuell v. Smith, 49 Vt. 265; Bussey v. Memphis & L. R. Co. 4 McCrary, 405; Peete v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 19 Wis. 118; Condict v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 54 N. Y. 502.

The right to make a contract for a through routing and a through rate beyond the terminus of its line carries with it the right to limit the liability on freight so transported beyond the first carrier's line.

Bristol & E. R. Co. v. Collins, 7 H. L. Cas. 218; Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Merriman, 52 Ill. 129, 4 Am. Rep. 590.

The mere receipt of goods directed to a point beyond the carrier's route does not create a special contract to carry to destination, nor does it give the shipper a through rate.

Stewart v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. 3 Fed. Rep. 768; McCarthy v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. 9 Mo. App. 166; Converse v. Norwich & N. Y. Transp. Co. 33 Conn. 166, 6 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 214.

The contracts or bills of lading in this case were all through bills of lading, so stated and disclosed on their face, and not denied or controverted in the evidence.

Denny v. New York Cent. R. Co. 13 Gray, 481, 74 Am. Dec. 645; Hoadley v. Northern Transp. Co. 115 Mass. 304, 15 Am. Rep. 106.

The initial carrier guaranteed the through rate and became liable to plaintiffs for any and all costs or overcharge that defendants' connecting carriers might enforce.

Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Daniels, 49 Ark. 854.

Was the naming and guaranteeing of this through freight of no value or consideration to plaintiff?

When the first carrier has contracted merely to transport to the end of his own line, and there deliver to the connecting carrier, the clause limiting his liability will not support the exemption as a just and reasonable consideration.

Neither party can allege that as to him there was no contract. Such is the general rule as to contracts, and no reason is here shown why it should not apply to those between carriers and the shippers, so long as they are permitted to make their own terms.

Messrs. J. E. Cravens and J. M. Moore, for appellee:

It is urged that the plaintiff's agent filled the blanks in the form furnished him by the station agent without objecting to the terms contained in them, and hence that the plaintiff assented to the stipulation and is estopped to question its validity. This position is not tenable under the evidence, which shows that the station agent had no authority either to change the terms of the contract as to the exemption, or to give a different rate.

Even if the contract is signed, it is not binding upon the customer unless it is just and reasonable in its terms.

Redman, Railway Carriers, 69, 75.

Hemingway, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff sued to recover the value of cotton that was burned, without fault of the defendants, while they held it for shipment. The defense was that the defendants were exempt from liability by the terms of the bills of lading under which they received the cotton. It was alleged in the complaint, and admitted in the answer, that the defendants operated a line of road from Hartman, where the cotton was received, to the several points of consignment, and that they received the cotton under bills of lading containing provisions to the effect that they should not be liable except for losses occasioned by their negligence; but it was alleged that said provisions were void, for the reason that they were without consideration, unfair, unjust, and unreasonable. To sustain his contention he proved that the defendants fixed and published a uniform rate for carrying cotton between said points, and that his shipments were made according to that rate; that the defendants furnished to their agent at Hartman printed forms for bills of lading that were uniform in their terms, and contained the provisions relied upon in this case; and that said agent had no authority to receive, and would not have received, the cotton except under said bills. It is shown that the plaintiff knew that the bills contained the provisions relied upon, and that he made no objection to the rate fixed, or the provisions contained therein. There were other facts proved, but, as we understand the law, they do not affect the case made. There was no serious controversy as to the amount of plaintiff's loss, and it is not now insisted that the verdict was excessive.

The contention is that the court erred in directing the jury upon the law regulating the provisions of the bills of lading, providing for defendants' exemption from their common-law liability, and no objection is made to its directions upon other principles of law. We deem it unnecessary to set out or consider seriatim the several instructions; for, in stating our views of the law, we determine all questions arising upon them that are material in this case. If, upon the case stated, the provisions are deemed valid in law, the defendants have a perfect defense, and the action should be dismissed. On the contrary, if the provisions are deemed invalid in law, the defendants have no defense, and no error in the court's charge could have prejudiced them. That is, the judgment should be reversed or affirmed, according as the contracts are deemed valid or invalid.

It is contended that they were invalid because they were without consideration, but we have not deemed it necessary to enter upon the consideration of this question. The further objection urged to them is that they were unfairly obtained, and are therefore unjust and unreasonable in the eye of the law. To maintain this position it is argued that the plaintiff had an absolute right to demand that defendants receive and carry his cotton under their accountability at common law, but that he could procure them to do it only by accepting the bills offered, and that for this reason his agreement to the conditions of the bills was not fairly obtained, and they should be adjudged unjust, unreasonable, and void. To this the defendants reply that there is nothing to show that the terms of the bills were unjust or unreasonable, and that, as plaintiff understandingly accepted them, he is conclusively bound by them.

There are principles of law pertinent to the case that are well settled, among which may be stated the following: That a carrier is bound to receive and carry all articles tendered him of the kind that he engages in carrying; that in performing that service the law casts upon him the accountability of an insurer, unless he undertakes the service in the particular case under a special contract with the shipper restricting his liability; that the carrier can by no act of his own modify his liability, but that every modification must arise out of a contract fairly made, and just and reasonable in its terms. It follows from the principles stated that the law deems it just and reasonable to hold the carrier to the duty of carrying with the accountability of an insurer, if the shipper so wish; so that the carrier can neither decline to perform the service nor, of his own motion, escape that extreme accountability. He is authorized to contract with the shipper for a restricted liability, but such restriction depends upon the consent of the shipper. He has the right of choice between the common-law undertaking and any special contract that the carrier may wish to make, and the making of a modified contract must represent his choice. But, although his consent is an indispensable element in such contract, it is not conclusive of its validity; for the law will permit the carrier to be released from his common-law liability, not upon every contract to that effect that would be valid if it related to other matters, but only in pursuance of a contract fairly made, the terms of which are deemed just and reasonable. So that, while a carrier claiming an exemption must show a contract providing for it, even this will not avail him, if it appear to be unfair, unjust, or unreasonable. Whether the agreement relied upon in a particular case satisfies the requirement of the law, as regards its terms and the manner of its procurement, must be determined in view of the rights and duties of the parties, the policy of the law in defining them, and the tendency of the contract to conserve or to violate such policy. If an intending shipper should be refused transportation because he would not make a special contract, he might desist from shipping, and hold the carrier for damages. Of this there can be no doubt, and we do not understand that defendants question it. If it were otherwise, the carrier could refuse to perform a service, the performance of which is its primary duty, and justify upon the ground that its intending customer declined to release him from a liability which the wisdom of the law imposes on him; and, while the law will not permit him to restrict his liability, it would thus recognize a restriction due to what, viewed practically, was no less than his compulsion. This, in effect, would authorize him to abrogate a rule of law designed to hold him to a discharge of his duties; and the law does no such foolish thing as to prescribe regulations and vest the party to be regulated with the right to repeal them.

Taking it to be settled that a refusal to carry except upon such condition is a wrong, and that one intending to ship, who declines to do it upon such terms, has a right of action for his damage, we are next to consider what his attitude is if, instead of declining to ship upon the condition, he elects to ship, and accedes to the condition in order to obtain transportation. The law as we have seen, deems it the best policy that the carrier should bear the general liability of an insurer, except where his customer consents to bear a part of the risk, in which case it seems to contemplate that the terms upon which such consent is given will guard and preserve the public interest. But the consent meant is certainly not a constrained submission to terms imposed,—not a consent extorted by what the law characterizes as “dureas,” nor what is practically, as society is organized, the same thing; but it is what Mr. Pomeroy calls an “absolute consent,”—a consent that implies a physical, intellectual, and moral power, freely and deliberately exercised. Consent of a different kind may be, and often is, all that is required to make a contract binding at law, and even in equity; but it cannot make a contract fair, just, or reasonable. As a rule, the validity of a contract in no wise depends upon its fairness, nor the justness or reasonableness of its terms, nor the adequacy of the consideration, provided it rests upon one deemed valuable. Nor will it be invalidated by reason of the fact that the party was in pecuniary or other necessity or distress, provided it was intelligently and freely made, without the use of undue pressure. If the party freely and intelligently elect to make a hard, unequal, and unjust contract, the courts will not make a better one for him, or relieve him of the one made, merely because he was in straitened circumstances, and it seemed to him necessary to make it in order to secure relief. The courts decline to thus hamper the independence of the individual, or limit his right to make his own contracts; such functions pertaining to paternal, and not to free, government. But relief is withheld upon the ground that the party had his choice between not acquiring the benefits accruing under the contract and acquiring them according to its terms, and had intelligently and freely exercised his choice, and elected to take the benefits of the contract. The reason does not apply where the party acquires nothing under the contract, and is constrained to consent to it by reason of the fact that the other party had made this agreement necessary to the enjoyment of an important and apparently indispensable privilege, to which he was already entitled. But even when a party by an unequal or unjust contract, made without duress or misrepresentation, acquires something to which he had no other right, courts of equity have shown a disposition to relieve him where it appeared he was in pecuniary necessity or distress that impelled him to make an undue sacrifice, and advantage was taken of such condition. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 948; Buford v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 82 Ky. 286; Brown v. Hall, 14 R. I. 249, 51 Am. Rep. 375; 1 Whart. Cont. § 170. Upon this principle, contracts to pay unconscionable interest, where no usury laws are in force, and to transfer expectant estates for considerations grossly inadequate, have been declared void. Miller v. Cook, L. R. 10 Eq. 641, and cases supra. Without committing this court to the doctrine of those cases, to the extent of holding that an advantage taken of one's necessities or distress to obtain a hard bargain will afford ground for equitable relief, we think it necessarily and properly deducible from them that it is not fair, just, or reasonable in the eye of the law, to take advantage of one's necessities or distress to obtain a contract by which he releases some valuable right, or assumes some onerous liability,—at least, where it does not appear that he received any corresponding benefit,—and that, while the circumstances might not warrant the avoidance of an ordinary contract, they would defeat such a one as depends for its efficacy upon its fairness and just and reasonable terms.

Applying the principle stated to this class of cases, the question is whether it can be declared, as matter of law, that an intending shipper is under a necessity to agree to a special contract which the carrier proposes as a condition to receiving and carrying his property; and, if so, whether it can be further declared that the carrier takes an unfair advantage of his necessity to obtain the contract.

It is a well-known fact that the prosperity of the public collectively, and of its members individually, depends absolutely upon transportation and transportation agencies, and that the carrying business is mostly concentrated in a few powerful corporations, to a large extent controlling monopolies, natural if not legal, whose position enables them to control it. Circumstances, well understood, that exist without any design of the law, give them the power to shape the carrying business, and impose upon it such conditions as they see fit. Every demand it makes represents the will of its aggregate being, backed up by all its concentrated powers. The public, in meeting such demands, acts separately, and not collectively. The individual stands alone, and can oppose to the demand coming from such concentration of corporate power the influence of but one member of the vast aggregate that comprises the public. Whether he gives the carrier his patronage, or does not, matters but little to the latter; but whether the carrier transports his property promptly and safely will perhaps determine whether he succeeds or fails in business. If he declines the terms proposed, and refrains from shipping, he has no adequate redress. If he sues to recover his damage, he is subjected to all the delay and expense incident to such litigation, and at last recovers only what the law regards as his damage, and must himself stand—what would generally be much greater—the loss which the law deems too remote to estimate as damage. If he withholds his patronage, and attempts by this means to induce the carrier to recede from his terms, he can accomplish nothing; for his business is too small to make his patronage material, and, besides, if his property is to be transported, he must at last deliver it to the exacting carrier, for, from the nature of the business, he can rarely find any other. So that he would only have postponed giving his patronage, and the delay in shipment, that may have been very detrimental to his business, would not be appreciable to the carrier. In considering the relative positions of the parties, Judge Miller thus states his attitude: "He is one individual of a million. He cannot afford to higgie or stand out and seek redress in the courts. His business will not admit such a course. He prefers rather to accept any bill of lading, or sign any paper, the carrier presents; often, indeed, without knowing what the one or the other contains. In most cases, he has no alternative but to do this or abandon his business." New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 879, 21 L. ed. 640.

The Supreme Court of Michigan, with reference to the same subject, thus defines the attitude of railroad companies: "They do, and necessarily must, absorb nearly the entire business of carrying merchandise and property requiring carriage and deposit along and in the vicinity of their route, and competition is virtually destroyed. There is, in a certain sense, a compulsion upon all requiring transportation to employ them; and a restriction of liability by notice is measurably compulsory. There is no mutuality or freedom of choice offered. The person desiring to have goods forwarded is compelled, in reality, to have them carried forward by the company. The obligation is to carry them; and a restriction of the liabilities primarily growing out of that obligation by a notice is an imposition of terms rather than a contract." Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Hale, 6 Mich. 258; Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Eubanks, 48 Ark. 460.

Why, we would ask, is restriction by express agreement, if necessary to obtain transportation, less compulsory, less an imposition of terms, or more in the nature of a contract? The unequal condition of the parties is the same in either case. The necessity of the one to obtain transportation, and the control of it by the other, exist in either case. The only difference between the agreement by notice and that by writing in the bill of lading is that in the one case consent is implied and in the other express; but in either case the party is bound to give it in order to enjoy a privilege of great, and possibly vital, financial importance to him. The agreement in neither case embodies the free and deliberate consent of both parties; for one did what he felt bound to do, while the overmastering influence of the other enabled him to embody his will in a formal contract.

The relative position of the parties must be well understood by both of them,—by the individual desiring to ship property, and the carrier to whom it is offered. The individual feels that transportation is necessary to his success, and that unless he gets it promptly he will suffer inconvenience, and perhaps loss. He regards the probability of loss in transit as remote, and knows that if there is no loss the contract is immaterial. Under such circumstances he will assume the risk of contingent future loss, rather than sustain a loss that is certain and present, as men usually are prone to sacrifice contingent future interest to satisfy present wants. So we think it should be held, as matter of law, that the parties stand upon a footing of inequality, and that individuals desiring to make shipments are under a necessity sufficient, in the ordinary affairs of life, to amount to compulsion, where it is pressed. The question then is, whether, in the case stated, a carrier, in making agreements exempting him from his common-law liability, takes an unfair or unjust advantage of the situation and of his customer's wants. The answer seems plain, in the light of what has already been said. The service is in fact an absolute necessity to the individual. The carrier is by law bound absolutely to perform it. It affects as well the public interest as that of the individual, and the law regulating it, recognizing the unequal footing of the parties, has regard alike to both interests. Great and valuable powers and privileges are conferred upon the carrier, and in return for them, out of regard for the general good, the law exacts that he shall promptly perform it, without damage to property committed to him. He accepts the grant upon those terms, enjoys its benefits, and thereby acquires a controlling influence in the body politic, and then declines to perform the service, except upon the condition that he be released from the accountability he assumed; that is, he will perform the service only upon the condition that his customer carry a risk which, except where his customer prefers to carry it, the wisdom of the law has imposed upon him. This is a plain dereliction of a public duty; and it is a wrong to the customer, since it deprives him of the right to have the service, and to choose whether it be performed at one price without risk to him, or at another partly at his risk.

But it is said that, if the party knowingly consent to a special contract, no one else can object, and that he cannot be heard to say that it was unfair, or that an advantage was taken of him, since he acted freely and intelligently. This, as we have seen, is a mistake, for such contracts affect the interests of the public, and are subject to public regulation; and besides, the circumstances do not warrant the assumption of fact that the party consented freely, but rather show that he submitted to terms that he was bound to accept when the other party deprived him of the opportunity to choose between them and the contract which the law entitled him to demand, for he was, as we have seen, as much entitled to be indemnified against loss in transit as to the service demanded. The law imposes no necessity for an election between the two rights, and the carrier can impose none. But the carrier's refusal to perform the service without a release of his liability takes away the right to choose which the law gives, and forces an election between rights that are not inconsistent. Thus the carrier does a wrong, and thereby creates a necessity for the wronged party to give the consent relied upon; and the question is whether one who does a wrong that places another under the necessity of agreeing to his proposals takes an unfair or unjust advantage in the matter. It is the tyranny of power over dependence, and therefore unfair;

the deprivation of a right, and therefore unjust. The reply that the party knowingly consented under circumstances not constituting duress or fraud, and that this is conclusive against him, is not sufficient in law. If it were, a contract knowingly made to release a carrier from liability for his negligence would be sustained; but we know that the law is otherwise. It overlooks two important features of this class of contracts,—the first, that the individual is at a disadvantage in dealing with the carrier, and is bound by force of circumstances to accept whatever terms are offered, because he has no reasonable or practicable alternative; the second, that such contracts affect the interests of the public, on account of which the law will suffer them to be made only when they are fair, just, and reasonable.

In this case the plaintiff did not object to the contract proposed, or ask for a different one; but if he had, the agent could not, and would not, have entered into any other. Does this affect the case? We think not, but that the case stands just as if the plaintiff had demanded a different contract, and agreed to the one accepted because he could get no other. Carriers do their business in pursuance of a general plan, and of this the public are advised; and when the defendants adopted a plan, and instructed their agent to pursue it, and authorized him to pursue no other, their customers were not called upon to ask a change of the plan, or a departure from its terms, in their particular matters. They had a right to suppose that the agent would not deviate from his instructions, and the evidence shows that in this instance he would not. Besides, if defendants prepared to do business upon one plan only, it should have been in accordance with their common-law liability. The public had a right to that service, promptly performed, and should not have been subjected to any delay incident to preparing to do it, or instructing agents with regard to it. If any customer were to be delayed, such as desired service under special contracts, and not those who desired it under the common-law contract, should have been subjected to the inconvenience.

The case may be stated as follows: The defendants were bound to accept and carry the cotton as insurers. They prepared to do it, and authorized their agent to do it for them, only upon condition that they be exempt from such liability; and the plaintiff, being able to make no other contract for the carriage of his cotton, agreed to the one proposed. They contend that, though the law prescribes that such contracts shall be fair, just, and reasonable, the party's making it is conclusive as to those matters, in the absence of fraud or duress, as defined by law. We do not assent to the position, but hold that, to maintain the policy of the law with reference thereto, such contracts must be the free act of the party, and reflect his choice as between the contract to which the law entitles him and the one relied on. One which it was necessary for him to make by reason of his circumstances, and the carrier's refusal to make any other is not fair to him, and would not be deemed just or reasonable in law, at least without a showing that its terms really conserved his interest. In other words, we think it would violate the policy of the law to permit contracts to be made restricting the carrier's common-law liability, where the carrier does not afford his shippers an opportunity to contract for the service without such restriction. It may be that shippers would prefer cheaper service, with restricted accountability, to more expensive service, with unrestricted accountability; but they are entitled to a choice, and the carrier cannot deprive them of it, either directly or by anything which amounts practically to its deprivation. In support of this conclusion, we cite the case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gilbert, 88 Tenn. 490, 7 L. R. A. 163. But, if we were without a precedent, we think the established principles and policy of the law could not be maintained upon a different conclusion. If carriers could maintain exemptions where the opportunity to make a contract without them was not afforded, the result would be that such contracts would be universal; and it would be better to state the law generally, as it would in fact be in every case, that the carrier was only liable for his negligence. But the law has, in its wisdom, established a different rule, which it is the duty of courts to conserve, rather than overturn.

It follows, upon the views indicated, that the contracts relied upon are invalid, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

ERROR to the District Court of Ottawa County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce the alleged liability of respondents as guarantors of a promissory note. Reversed.

Statement by Horton, Ch. J.:

The Bank of Tescott, a banking corporation, located in Ottawa county, in this state, brought its action against the Kanopolis Creamery Company and others upon a promissory note, of which the following is a copy:

"$950. Kanopolis, Kansas, June 1st, 1888.

"Nine months after date we promise to pay to the order of Western Creamery Building and Supply Company nine hundred fifty dollars, at the Kanopolis State Bank, Kanopolis, Kansas, with interest at the rate of twelve per cent per annum from date until paid. [Signed] Kanopolis Creamery Company. H. C. Waite, President. W. B. Wooley, Secretary. No. 1,120. Due March 1st, 1889." On the back of the note is:

"W. F. Kline, Wm. Vandeventer, H. V. Faris, D. H. Funk, Board of Directors."

Underneath is:

"Tescott, Kansas, August 15th, 1888. For value received, we hereby sell and assign this note to the Bank of Tescott or order, and guaranty payment at maturity; demand, notice of nonpayment, and protest waived. Western Creamery Building and Supply Company."

The petition charged the Kanopolis Creamery Company as a corporation, and sought to hold the creamery company, H. C. Waite, and W. B. Wooley as makers. It charged and sought to hold Kline, Vandeventer, Faris, and Funk as guarantors. It charged F. F. Scidmore, F. L. Scidmore, and M. B. Buell, as partners under the firm name of Western Creamery Building & Supply Company, as indorsers. The two Scidmores and Buell were residents of Ottawa county. The action was brought on the note in Ottawa county, and summons issued against all the other defendants to Ellsworth county, where they reside. The Kanopolis Creamery Company and the Scidmores and Buell did not answer, but made default. All of the other defendants joined in an answer. The answer first denied under oath all of the allegations of the petition, except the incorporation of the Kanopolis Creamery Company. Second, the answer alleged as a defense, in brief, that the Scidmores and Buell came to Kanopolis and promoted a creamery enterprise; that they solicited subscriptions to that end, and all of the defendants became subscribers, as well as many others; it being the object of the promoters, when subscriptions sufficient were made, to incorporate the subscribers, and issue stock to them to the amount of their several subscriptions, the sums so subscribed to be taken by the Scidmores and Buell as payment for the creamery which they were to erect for the intended corporation. Just prior to June 1, 1888, the subscription list was still short $950 of the amount the Scidmores and Buell were to have for the building of the creamery. They then proposed to the several subscribers that the corporation be formed at once; that for the balance of $950 they would take the note of the creamery company itself, and proceed to erect the creamery. Their proposition was accepted. The corporation was formed, and on June 1, 1888, the officers met to give the note. The note was written on the blank form of the Kanopolis Bank. When it came to executing the note, the defendants, who were the officers of the creamery corporation, only intended to give a note of the corporation. F. F. Scidmore was present, and assured them that the only way to make a corporation note was for all the officers and directors of the corporation to sign their names, and attach their official positions to their names. He also assured the defendants that, by signing this note in the manner it is signed, no personal liability would be incurred, but the note would be the note of the corporation alone; that being the note the Scidmores had agreed to take, and the corporation to give. Defendants believing in and trusting to the representations of Scidmore that, in signing the note in the manner and form it is signed, they would not create any personal liability, and that they, as officers of the creamery company, were only giving the note of the company, the Scidmores obtained the paper sued on in this case. To the answer a reply of general denial was made. The case came on for trial before the court and a jury. The court held that, on the face of the paper, it was the note of the Kanopolis Creamery Company, and that Waite and Wooley executed it in their official capacity, and were therefore not liable personally, but that the other defendants were liable as guarantors. The court also held that there was no question in the case except the assignment, which the court permitted to go to the jury. The court excluded all evidence of the second defense set up in the answer, and defendants excepted. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff below. The defendants below, who were held as guarantors, excepted, and bring the case here.

Messrs. LaFerty & Sternberg for plaintiffs in error.

Messrs. Chipman & Malthy for defendant in error.

Horton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On August 15, 1888, the discount committee of the Bank of Tescott accepted the note of the Kanopolis Creamery Company to the Western Creamery Building & Supply Company, of June 1, 1888, for $950, "as collateral." F. F. Scidmore, F. L. Scidmore, and M. B. Buell were partners under the firm name of the Western Creamery Building & Supply Company. This company was also a stockholder in the Kanopolis Creamery Company, a corporation duly organized and existing under the laws of this state. F. L. Scidmore was a director of the Bank of Tescott. F. F. Scidmore was the cashier of the bank, and the discount committee of the bank consisted of F. F. Scidmore, T. E. Scidmore, and T. B. Seers. F. F. Scidmore was the person who secured the note sued on, and knew all the facts and circumstances under which it was executed and delivered, and was present with the discount committee of the bank when that committee acted upon and accepted the same.

Under the rule in Mann v. Second Nat. Bank of Springfield, 80 Kan. 412, we must treat the note as if this action were between the original parties only,—as if no assignment or transfer had been made. The trial court held that the note, upon its face, was the note of the Kanopolis Creamery Company and that Waite and Wooley executed it in their official capacity only, but that the parties who signed upon the back were liable personally as guarantors. If extrinsic evidence were not admissible, the ruling of the trial court would be correct. Under the authorities, if the parties who signed the note on the back, and who composed the board of directors of the Kanopolis Creamery Company, had signed the note upon its face, they could show they made it only in their official capacity, as directors of the corporation. "Where individuals subscribe their proper names to a promissory note, prima facie, they are personally liable, though they add a description of the character in which the note is given; but such presumption of liability may be rebutted, as between the original parties, by proof that the note was in fact given by the makers as agents, with the payee's knowledge." Byles, Bills, Notes & Checks, 27, note 1; Haile v. Peirce, 32 Md. 327, 3 Am. Rep. 139; McWhirt v. McKee, 6 Kan. 412; Talley v. Burtis, 45 Kan. 147. In this case it is claimed that, if extrinsic evidence had been received it would have shown the directors of the Kanopolis Creamery Company—the corporation—signed their names at the instance of F. F. Scidmore, one of the members of the Western Creamery Building & Supply Company, on the back of the note, as officers of the corporation, and for the corporation only. It is claimed that F. F. Scidmore assured these directors that the only way to make a corporation note was for the officers and directors of the corporation to sign their names and affix their official positions thereto, and that the note was thus signed under his direction to bind the corporation, but not the officers individually. If the parties who wrote their names upon the back of the note as directors had signed their names upon the face thereof, they could have shown by extrinsic evidence that they were acting for the corporation only; and we perceive no reason why, as between the original parties or any subsequent holder of the note, accepting the same as collateral, with full notice of all the facts and circumstances connected with the execution and delivery thereof, the same rule will not apply when such signatures are upon the back of the instrument before delivery. In Fullerton v. Hill (Kan.) 29 Pac. Rep. 583, it was ruled that "a stranger to a promissory note, who writes his name across the back thereof before it is delivered to the payee, incurs, prima facie, the liability of the guarantor. But parol proof may be received to show the exact liability of such indorser, by showing the agreement and understanding of the parties at the time of such indorsement." Baker v. Chambles, 4 G. Greene, 428; Whitney v. Stow, 111 Mass. 368; Souhegan Bank v. Boardman, 46 Minn. 293; Metcalf v. Williams, 104 U. S. 93, 26 L. ed. 665; Good v. Martin, 95 U. S. 90, 24 L. ed. 841. "Considerable diversity of decision, it must be admitted, is found in the reported cases, where the record presents the case of a blank indorsement by a third party, made before the instrument is indorsed by the payee, and before it is delivered to take effect; the question being whether the party is to be deemed an original promisor, guarantor, or indorser. Irreconcilable conflict exists in that regard, but there is one principle upon the subject almost universally admitted by them all, and that is that the interpretation of the contract ought in every case to be such as will carry into effect the intention of the parties; and in most cases it is admitted that proof of the facts and circumstances which took place at the time of the transaction are admissible to aid in the interpretation of the language employed." Denton v. Peters, L. R. 5 Q. B. 475; Good v. Martin, supra. We think that the parties who signed as directors had the right, at the trial, to give in evidence to the jury that the note in question was not their note as guarantors, but that it was the note of the Kanopolis Creamery Company only.

The judgment of the District Court will be reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views herein expressed.

All the Justices concur.

1. An easement acquired by grant can-

NOTE.—Effect of nonuser of an easement.

In England and in this country distinction has almost invariably been made between easements acquired by deed and those acquired by prescription.

But there seems no ground for this distinction. 18 L. R. A.

not be extinguished by mere nonuser without anything to show an intention to abandon it.

since prescription is based on the presumption of a grant. Veghte v. Raritan Water Power Co. 19 N. J. Eq. 156.

Mere nonuser will not extinguish the easement.

Mere nonuser of an easement which has been ac-owners is not estopped from asserting his rights therein by the estoppel of a part only of his grantors.

4. The mere existence of a gate in an alley and acquiescence therein by one having an easement by grant in the alley but who does not use it will not be prejudicial to his right unless an adverse claim is brought to his knowledge.
5. The erection of a house and fence without any opening on an alley in which the owner has an easement by grant does not show an intention to abandon the easement.
6. The failure or refusal of a life tenant of premises to which an easement in an alley was made appurtenant by grant to pay taxes and expenses on the alley which she was primarily bound to do will not show any intention of the owners of the fee to abandon the easement unless they knew of such failure or refusal.

(October 1, 1892.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for New York County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enjoin defendant from maintaining a gate at the entrance to an alley, and to compel him to remove an alleged obstruction consisting of a building which he had built over a part of it. Reversed.

Statement by Brown, J.:

The plaintiff is the owner of property in New York known as Nos. 148 and 145

Franklin street bounded easterly by an alleyway. Defendant is the owner of property known as Nos. 189 and 141 Franklin street, bounded westerly by said alley. The common source of title was Alexander L. Stewart. He conveyed Nos. 148 and 145 to plaintiff's grantors, with the "right and privilege of passing and repassing through said alley without hindering, obstructing, or annoying such other persons as may be legally privileged to pass through the same; and subject at all times hereafter to the bearing and paying of a just proportion of the expenses of regulating and repairing the said alley and of such taxes and assessments as may be laid thereon." Nos. 189 and 141 were conveyed to defendant's grantors, with a similar right expressed in similar language; and the further right to extend any building erected or to be erected on the front part of the lot under or over said alley, but so as to leave the same 7 feet 9 inches wide, and not less than one story high in the clear. The alley was 83 feet deep, and at a distance of 62 feet from Franklin street broadened out so that at its rear end, and for a distance of 19 feet therefrom, it was about 21 feet wide. The evidence showed that, in 1836, Smith Harriot acquired title to No. 148, which abutted upon the alley on the west with the easement in the alley. He died in 1844, leaving a will whereby he devised the property to his wife, Mary Ann, for life, and upon her death to his three children, Frederick P., Smith, and Estelle. Mrs. Harriot subsequently acquired title to No. 145. She died quired by prescription or adverse use is nothing more than evidence of an intention to abandon the right, but where the easement has been acquired by grant or its equivalent no length of mere non-user will defeat the right. Curran v. Louisville, 83 Ky. 628.

Interruptions of the user after the lapse of the time which raises the presumption of a grant of the easement furnish evidence of, but do not constitute, an abandonment. Willey v. Norfolk S. R. Co. 96 N. C. 408.

Easements acquired by deed are not lost by mere nonuser. Kuecken v. Volts, 110 Ill. 284.

Neglect to enjoy an easement is no more significant in its bearing upon the rights of the grantee than neglect to enjoy the freehold to which the easement is appurtenant. Day v. Walden, 48 Mich. 583. This was the case of a grant of a water privilege for the use of a mill.

A right of way created by deed cannot be lost by mere nonuser. Wiggins v. McCleary, 49 N. Y. 848.

Nor can it be surrendered by verbal declarations. Longendyk v. Anderson, 59 How. Pr. 1.

To prove the abandonment of an easement created by deed there must be more than proof that it was not exercised by the grantee. Bombaugh v. Miller, 82 Pa. 208.

In this case the plaintiff's use of an alley was not exclusive but concurrent only; his reserved right was spread on the record, and the defendant had notice thereof. It was held that a continuous use was not necessary to preserve the right.

The omission of a party to make use of his right to the use of water does not impair his title or confer any right on another. Pillsbury v. Moore, 44 Me. 154, 60 Am. Dec. 91. This was an action on the case for the continuance of a dam, to the injury of the plaintiff's mill site. At the time when the dam was erected the plaintiff had acquired no prescriptive right; and at the time when the action was brought the defendant had acquired no rights by lapse of time to maintain the dam at its then height. Townsend v. McDonald, 12 N. Y. 381, 64 Am. Dec. 508.

In Butts v. Ihrie, 1 Rawle, 218, it was held that the nonuser for thirty-two years of a privilege to swell water on the land of the grantee did not forfeit the right.

In Nitzell v. Paschall, 8 Rawle, 82, it was held that a privilege devised to swell water back on other lands of the deviser might be resumed although not used for thirty-eight years. In this case Mr. Chief Justice Gibson, thought that lapse of time might be so great as to give rise to a presumption that a license granted by deed had been abandoned; and he supposed that a right acquired by adverse use for twenty years might be lost by nonuser for the same period. But he proceeded to say: "Where it has been acquired by grant, it will not be lost by nonuser in analogy to the Statute of Limitations, unless there were a denial of the title or other act on the adverse party to quicken the owner in the assertion of his right."

This was re-asserted in Erb v. Brown, 60 Pa. 218, where evidence of a parol agreement to give up a right granted by deed to maintain water pipes through certain lands was held to have been properly rejected.

In support of the same principle, see St. Mary's Church v. Miles, 1 Whart. 229, where it was decided that where ground rent had been reserved by deed extinguishment could not be presumed from any length of possession without payment. And see further, to the same effect, Lindeman v. Lindsey, 60 Pa. 93.

Where a street railway company had been granted the right to lay a double track on a certain street in Philadelphia, and actually operated its in 1877, and in 1879 plaintiff purchased both pieces of property. All deeds in plaintiff's chain of title conveyed the same rights in the alley subject to the same duties. The defendant and one James Wilson acquired title to a part of 139 and 141 in 1859, and the balance in 1872. Wilson conveyed his interest to defendant in 1877. Defendant's property was of an average depth exceeding 100 feet, and included a lot about 23 feet by 23, directly in the rear of the alley. The right to build over and under the alley was appurtenant to a lot fronting on Franklin street and 62 feet deep. In 1878 defendant and Wilson erected a four-story brick building across the full width of the alley, and covering 20 feet of the rear thereof. They also maintained a gate at the entrance. This action was brought to compel the removal of the building and the gate, and to enjoin defendant from interfering with plaintiff's easement. The defense was (1) that during the ownership of the Harriots the easement had been abandoned; and (2) that the building had been erected with the knowledge of the owners of 143 and 145, and without objection on their part, and that plaintiff had purchased with knowledge of such facts, and was therefore estopped from asserting any right to use the alley. The trial court found that the owners of 143 and 145, or some of them, knew that the building was being erected over the alley, and made no objection thereto, and that Mary Ann Harriot, Smith Harriot, and the other owners of 143 and 145, by their acts, manifested an intention to abandon, and did abandon, the right to use the alley; and, as a conclusion of law, that plaintiff had failed to establish any right to the easement; and dismissed the complaint.

Further material facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. James C. Carter for appellant.

Mr. John E. Parsons, with Mr. Samuel Riker, for respondent:

The finding of the trial court, that the then owners of the plaintiff's premises had by their acts manifested an intention to abandon, and that they did abandon, the right to use the alley, is supported by overwhelming testimony.

The owners of Nos. 143 and 145 Franklin street having abandoned the right to use the alley before the plaintiff's purchase, such right was thereby extinguished and the plaintiff never acquired a right to use the alley.

The mere nonuser of an easement for twenty years will afford a presumption of a release or extinguishment, but not a very strong one, in a case unaided by circumstances; but if there has been in the mean time some act done by the owner of the land charged with the easement, inconsistent with, or adverse to the existence of the right, a release or extinguishment of the right will be presumed.

The nonuser for less than twenty years will not prove an abandonment of a mill privilege or right of way. Williams v. Nelson, 23 Pick. 141, 84 Am. Dec. 45; French v. Braintree Mfg. Co. 23 Pick. 216; Hurd v. Curtis, 7 Met. 94.

A nonuser of private ways for twenty years affords a presumption that the right never existed, or has been extinguished in favor of some adverse right. To raise the presumption of a release there must be nonuser for such a length of time as would found the presumption of a grant. Webber v. Chapman, 42 N. H. 323, 80 Am. Dec. 111; *Emerson v. Nonuser for nineteen years of an easement acquired by grant and temporary alteration of buildings so as not to require the enjoyment of the easement does not work a forfeiture where others have not been led to change their position or condition. Tyler v. Cooper, 47 Hun. 94.

In Riehle v. Heulings, 38 N. J. Eq. 20, the right to use a passageway had been granted in connection with the conveyance of the lot for the convenience of the owners thereof and it was claimed that the 18 L. R. A.

lane had not been used for twenty-seven years except by permission. It was held that even if this were so the right would not on that account be forfeited.

Mere nonuser for any length of time of an easement created by express grant will not destroy or extinguish it. In order to extinguish it by non-user there must be some conduct on the part of the owner of the servient tenement adverse to and in defiance of the easement and a nonuser must be the result of it and must continue for twenty years. *Dill v. Crain v. Foz, 16 Barb. 187.

The period of time is only material as one element from which the grantee's intention to retain or abandon his easement may be inferred against him, and what period may be sufficient in any particular case must depend on all the accompanying circumstances.

Although the owners of 143 and 145 Franklin street might not have abandoned their right to use the alley, yet they manifested such an appearance of having abandoned it as to induce the owners of 139 and 141 to alter their position, in the reasonable belief that the right was abandoned, and are therefore precluded as against them from claiming that right.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment in this action was first reversed by the general term, but upon a re-argument it was affirmed. The final decision of the court rested upon the authority of Snell v. Levitt, 110 N. Y. 595, 1 L. R. A. 414, and it appears from the general term opinion that the proposition assumed to have been there decided, which was made applicable to this case, was that an easement acquired by grant may be extinguished by actual abandonment or nonuser for a period less than 20 years. That question was not involved in the facts of the case cited, and its consideration was not necessary to its decision. There was in evidence a release in writing of the easement executed by the grantee thereof, who was the plaintiff's the intention of abandonment and the actual non-user must have incurred expenses upon his own estate. The three elements—nonuser, intention to abandon, and damage to the owner of the servient estate—must concur in order to extinguish the easement." Tiedeman, Real Prop. § 605.

The omission for forty years to use a right granted by deed to dig ore on the land of another does not forfeit the privilege without any adverse acts by the owner of the land; and the cultivation of the land by the owner is not adverse enjoyment by the owner. Arnold v. Stevens, 24 Pick. 106, 35 Am. Dec. 305.

Where the right to use four springs by an aqueduct had been granted by deed and the grantee had used only two for fifteen years and at the expiration of that time had taken the other two into the aqueduct, there having been no adverse use on the part of the owner of the servient estate during that period of time, the easement was not destroyed. Owen v. Field, 102 Mass. 112.

A presumption of reconveyance "will be made when it is necessary to clothe a rightful possession with a legal title; but the court must first see that there is nothing but the form of a conveyance wanting. But this presumption in favor of a grant against written evidence of title can never arise from the mere neglect of the owner to assert his right, where there has been no adverse title or enjoyment by those in whose favor the grant is to be presumed." Sutherland, J., in Doe v. Butler, 3 Wend. 149.

Duration of adverse use.

The adverse use by the owner of the premises over which the easement was granted must have continued long enough to create a prescriptive 18 L. R. A. right. Washb. Easem. 4th ed. 717; Cal. Civ. Code, § 811, subd. 4, note; Curran v. Louisville, 83 Ky. 628; Chandler v. Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp. 125 Mass. 549; Weish v. Taylor, 50 Hun, 144.

In Barnes v. Lloyd, 112 Mass. 224, the defendant claimed a right of way from the highway to his land over the intervening land of the plaintiff, the defendant's grantor had received from the owner of both lots a conveyance in 1800 in which was expressly granted a right of way across the lot retained. Subsequently in a conveyance to the plaintiff's grantor a right of way in favor of the defendant's lot was reserved and this reservation had been inserted in all subsequent conveyances down to 1859. Prior to 1870 no use whatever of the right of way had been made by the owners of the defendant's lot and the plaintiff's lot had always been kept fenced both on its road side and on the line with the defendant's lot and across the middle by fences having no opening and the lot itself had been cultivated. The easement was held not to have been extinguished. To the same effect, see Ward v. Ward, 7 Exch. 838.

The intention of the owner of the easement, as indicated by his acts, governs.

It is not so much the duration of the cesser to use the easement as the nature of the act done by the owner thereof or of the adverse act acquiesced in by him, and the intention so indicated that is material. Reg. v. Chorley, 12 Q. B. 515; Pope v. Devereux, 5 Gray, 409.

Where nonuser is evidence of abandonment, it will depend upon the circumstances and is a question of intention. Ward v. Ward, 14 Eng. L. & Eq. 413; Wiggins v. McCleary, 49 N. Y. 348.

grantor, made in consideration of $75 and the grant of a new easement. There was nonuser of the easement in question for upwards of 20 years, and use of the substituted easement during a large part of the same period. The question, therefore, whether nonuser alone for a greater or less period than twenty years would have extinguished the easement was not before the court. Nor is there anything in the opinion to the effect that such question should be answered in the affirmative.

On the contrary, it was said by Judge Earl, in stating the law applicable to the extinguishment of such an easement, that it could not be lost by nonuser for any length of time. All that the court there decided was that the release of the right claimed by plaintiff, followed by nonuser for upwards of twenty years, and use for a long period of a substituted easement, constituted conclusive evidence of its extinguishment, and that the trial court should have so ruled as a question of law. The main reliance of the plaintiff in that case was upon the fact that the release was not recorded, and was therefore void as to him, he being a purchaser without notice. But that claim was not sustained, on the ground that the agreement to give up the easement, and the unequivocal intention thereby expressed to abandon it, were the effectual and material things to be considered, and not the fact that such an agreement was expressed in writing and executed under seal. It was this element in the case that led the learned judge writing the opinion of the court to say that "nonuser for a period of twenty years, under such circumstances as show an intention to abandon and give up the easement, is sufficient to extinguish it; and even an abandonment for a shorter period, under such circumstances as show an intention to give up and release an easement which is acted upon by the owner of the servient tenement, so that it should work harm to him if the easement was thereafter asserted, would operate to extinguish it." The learned general term evidently overlooked the qualifying language of the last sentence quoted. It was applicable to the case then before the court. There was the release and the use of the substituted easement showing an unequivocal intention to abandon, and, in reliance on that act, use of the waters of the spring in question by the grantor of the easement, and those who subsequent to the release had acquired his title. There was therefore a clear case of estoppel, and that an easement created by grant could be extinguished by estoppel was the effect of the language used in reference to an abandonment for a less period than twenty years, which I have quoted from the opinion. In Washburn on Easements (4th ed. p. 707) it is said that the question of abandonment is one of intention, but that time is not a necessary element therein. "A cesser to use, accompanied by an act clearly indicating an intention to abandon the right, would have the same effect as a release, without reference to time." And this proposition is fully sustained by authority. Pope v. Devereux, 5 Gray, 409; Reg. v. Chorley, 12 Q. B. 519; Moore v.

indicating an intention to abandon the right would have the same effect as an express release of the easement without reference to time. Glenn v. Davis, 35 Md. 308, 6 Am. Rep. 389; Vogler v. Geiss, 51 Md. 410; Liggins v. Inge, 7 Bing. 682; Reg. v. Chorley, 12 Q. B. 515.

And a cesser to use for a less period than twenty years accompanied by acts clearly indicating the intent to abandon the right is sufficient. Moore v. Rawson, 3 Barn. & C. 322; Liggins v. Inge, supra; Dyer v. Sanford, 9 Met. 395, 43 Am. Dec. 399; Pope v. Devereux, supra; Snell v. Levitt, 1 L. R. A. 414, 110 N. Y. 595.

In White's Bank of Buffalo v. Nichols, 64 N. Y. 74, Allen, J., said: "It is not easy to define what act of the owner of an easement could operate to extinguish the same but in all cases the act must be judged by the intention indicated by it and nothing short of an intention to abandon the right will operate to extinguish it unless other persons have been led by such acts to treat the servient estate as if free from servitude."

The acts must be of a decisive character; and the question of intention is for the jury. Vogler v. Geiss, supra.

The acts of the owner of the dominant tenement which will prevent him from claiming an easement acquired by grant must conclusively indicate an intention to abandon the easement. Hayford v. Spokefield, 100 Mass. 494; Smyley v. Hastings, 32 N. Y. 224.

In Jamaica Pond Aqueduct Corp. v. Chandler, 121 Mass. 3, a highway had been laid out between the termini of a private way owned by the plaintiff. These facts accompanied by the fact of entire nonuser of the private way would, it was held, be strong though not conclusive evidence of an abandonment.

18 J. R. A.

Where one had, by a window in an ancient wall, an easement of light in the land of another, but pulled down the wall and rebuilt without the window, it was held after seventeen years, the owner of the servient tenement having, in the meantime, so built as to intercept the light, that the easement was lost. Moore v. Rawson, 3 Barn. & C. 322.

In Jennison v. Walker, 11 Gray, 423, the right had been granted by deed to lay and maintain an aqueduct through certain lands. The owner of the servient estate having removed the logs by which the water was conveyed over his lands, and the owner of the dominant estate having made no attempt to renew the enjoyment of the privilege for over thirty years, it was held that it might be inferred that the right had been released by a subsequent, non-appearing deed.

In Farrar v. Cooper, 34 Me. 394, the owner of a right to use water had not used his privilege for some years; and when a dam was erected below him destroying his property he stood by without complaint for the balance of the twenty years. He was held to have lost the right.

In Warbauer v. Randall, 109 Mass. 586, the plaintiff's grantor was permitted to testify that when he owned the easement more than twenty years before, he orally relinquished it to the defendant's grantor and ceased to use it.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Covington, 2 Bush, 526, the railway company had not only ceased to use a portion of its track but had by deed for private use clearly indicated an intention to abandon, and it was held that this portion of the road was forfeited.

In Roanoke Invest. Co. v. Kansas City & S. E. R. Co. (Mo.) Dec. 2, 1891, it was held that mere nonuser of a railroad right of way in the absence of adverse Rawson, 8 Barn. & C. 822; Dyer v. Sanford, 9 Met. 395, 43 Am. Dec. 399; Veghies v. Raritan Water Power Co. 19 N. J. Eq. 143; Crain v. Fox, 16 Barb. 184; Cartwright v. Maplesden, 53 N. Y. 622. Snell v. Levitt is not, therefore, an authority for the proposition that an easement created by grant can be extinguished by nonuser. Under the rule of that case, an intention to abandon must exist in connection with and as a cause of nonuser. The case is distinguished from the one before us, in that there was evidence of an unequivocal act releasing the easement. The learned counsel for the respondent, while not claiming that that case goes further than I have indicated, contends that the evidence of the intention to abandon, which is necessary to sustain the conclusion reached at the trial, exists in the facts found by the court. Giving him the full benefit of that decision, we may examine this case in the light of its authority.

The judgment in this case rests upon two grounds: (1) An estoppel based upon knowledge of the erection of the building and omission to object to it by the owners of Nos. 143 and 145 Franklin street; (2) abandonment of the easement. The trial court found (1) "that the owners of Nos. 143 and 145 Franklin street, or some of them, knew that the building was being erected over the alley, and made no objection to the erection of the same." This finding, if supported by the evidence, is insufficient to create an estoppel. The owners of 143 and 145, at the time of the erection of the building, were the widow and three children of Smith Harriot. The plaintiff has succeeded to the title of all of them; and, if any of the children who were owners of the fee were ignorant of the erection, the act was a wrong to them, and in violation of their rights. The plaintiff, therefore, is not estopped from asserting his rights in the alley unless all his grantors are estopped. The evidence does not show more than that Mrs. Harriot knew that the building was being erected. She was a life tenant, and was in the legal possession of the property. But knowledge on her part did not affect the rights of her children. There is no pretense that her daughter, Mrs. Schilling, ever received any information concerning the building, or had any knowledge of it. Frederick P. Harriot testified that he was first informed of it in the summer of 1885, and Smith Harriot testified that he was informed by his mother that Taylor & Wilson were putting up a building in the rear of the lot, but there is no evidence that he knew at the time of its erection that it was upon any part of the alley, and this might very well have been the effect of the statement on his mind, as the defendant and Wilson owned a lot 28 feet deep, directly in the rear of the alley. Smith Harriot and his brother resided at Cherry Valley in this state, and were rarely in the city of New York. It does not appear that the fact that Mrs. Harriot informed her son that a building was in process of erection was known to Taylor & Wilson, and nothing that any of the owners of No. 143 did in-possession by the servient owner or other acts of such unequivocal nature on the part of the owners of the railroad as evince a clear intention to abandon the easement would not work an extinguishment of the right however acquired. White v. Crawford, 10 Mass. 187; Nitsell v. Paschall, 3 Rawle, 78.

In Pratt v. Sweetser, 38 Me. 344, in an action of trespass, the defendant set up a right of way by prescription over the plaintiff's field to a marsh. It was held that though nonuser for twenty years was evidence of an intention to abandon, it was open to explanation, and that the owner might show that in the omission he had no such intention.

In Steele v. Tiffany, 13 R. L. 570, where the half of a private way created for the common use of the owners of adjoining lots had been appropriated by the owner of one of the lots, it was held that this, added to the fact of a failure to use, clearly indicated an abandonment. See also Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Houghton, 1 L. R. A. 213, and note, 136 Ill. 233.

Public easements.

Judge Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations, §§ 623, 633, lays it down that municipal corporations cannot be considered to be within ordinary limitation statutes. "There may be instances where the nonuser has continued so long and private rights have grown up of such a nature as to amount to an equitable estoppel, or an estoppel in pais on the public, which the courts will enforce upon principles of justice." Brooks v. Riding, 46 Ind. 15; Sims v. Frankfort, 79 Ind. 448.

In Wilder v. St. Paul, 13 Minn. 192, it was said to be a question not free from doubt whether nonuser would bar the right of the public in an easement clearly obtained.

who wrongfully obstructs the streets and alleys of a town or city (Sims v. Frankfort, supra); but the maxim "once a highway always a highway" does not exist except where the right of abutters is involved, (Elliott, Roads & Streets, 558); and the rule does not apply to easements other than streets and alleys such as are not necessary to public convenience. Washb. Easem. 242; Pella v. Scholtz, 24 Iowa, 233, 35 Am. Dec. 729; Callaway County v. Nolley, 31 Mo. 398; Baldwin v. Buffalo, 29 Barb. 398; Georgetown Street Comra. v. Taylor, 2 Bay, 286; Fox v. Hart, 11 Ohio, 414; Rowan v. Portland, 8 R. Mon. 268; Knight v. Heaton, 23 Vt. 430.

While the state may not be barred by the Statute of Limitations from insisting on the use of the highway, yet long acquiescence in a portion thereof and improvement of their property by adjoining owners induced by nonuser and apparent abandonment will estop the state from disturbing long established lines. Hamilton v. State, 106 Ind. 361.

In Henderson v. Central Pass. R. Co., 21 Fed. Rep. 368, it was said that the rules applied to nonuser of an easement held and owned for private use should not be applied with strictness to a right held for the public benefit. In this case it was decided that the nonuser for ten years of a street railway's right of way without the consent of the city was sufficient evidence of abandonment.

Public rights may be lost by unreasonable delay in enforcing them. Abandonment of streets may be presumed from long continued neglect. Derby v. Alling, 40 Conn. 410.

A partial nonuser of a highway and diversion of traffic to another road will not suffice to forfeit the right. Lewiston v. Proctor, 27 Ill. 414.

The easement of the public in a way is not lost by mere nonuser. The placing on the land of duced them to build on the alley. Taylor & Wilson were not the owners of the fee of the alley. They possessed the right to use the easement in common with the owner of the adjoining property. Their deeds conceded the right of equal enjoyment in the owners of such property, and limited them to the enjoyment of the privilege of ingress and egress upon the terms set forth in the instrument. In contemplation of law, the rights in themselves and others, with their limitations, were known to them at the time of the erection of the building. To have shown an estoppel, it was essential for them to have proven that they were induced to erect the building by the conduct or language of their cotenants in the easement in the alley. Here there was no inducement. They were not misled. They acted with the full understanding of the rights of the other owners and of the limitations upon themselves. No defense, therefore, can be based on an estoppel.

The judgment, if it can be sustained, must rest upon the fact of abandonment. The appellant challenges this finding on the ground that it has no support in the evidence, and we are of that opinion. The facts on which it rests are (1) that from 1846 to 1879, when it was torn down by the plaintiff, a gate was maintained by the defendant and his grantors at the entrance to the alley on Franklin street; (2) that, as early as 1842, a brick building was erected on the lot No. 148, extending along the alley 36 feet deep, the easterly wall of which had no opening through which access could be had to the alley, and a high board fence without opening was maintained from the rear of the house to the end of the lot, thus shutting out the owners and occupants of that lot from the alley until 1879, when plaintiff opened a door through the fence; (3) that for 40 years no taxes or assessments on the alley, and no part of the expenses of paving or repairing, had been paid by the owners of 148 and 145, but the same had been paid by the owners of defendant's property; (4) that since 1842 the owners of 148 and 145 had made no use of the alley, but it had been exclusively used by defendant and his grantors. The last fact is, of itself, of no importance. Abandonment necessarily implies nonuser, but nonuser does not create abandonment, no matter how long it continues. There must be found in the facts and circumstances connected with the nonuser an intention on the part of the owner of the easement to give it up, but intention existing, coupled with nonuser, will uphold a finding of abandonment. The evidence in this case is substantially undisputed, and the question is, Do the facts I have referred to show an intention on the part of the plaintiff's grantors to give up and abandon the easement? It is unnecessary to consider these facts in connection with Mrs. Harriot. Although she was the owner of No. 145, and may have intended to and did abandon any right she had in the alley as the owner of that lot, yet as to No. 148 she was but a life tenant, and no act of hers could prejudice or permanent obstructions may have that effect; but using the land for pasturage or the growth of crops is not a sufficient indication of intention that the street shall never be used as such to shut out the public. Bartlett v. Bangor, 87 Me. 460.

The right to a highway may be lost by nonuser for a number of years. Georgetown Street Comrs. v. Taylor, 2 Bay, 232. But in this case there was an exclusive adverse use.

And nonuser for a great number of years is prima facie evidence of a release to the person over whose land it ran. Beardslee v. French, 7 Conn. 125, 18 Am. Dec. 86; Brownell v. Palmer, 22 Conn. 121.

In Brownell v. Palmer, 22 Conn. 107, it was said that the disuse for fifteen years of a private way acquired by prescription would forfeit the right, but it was held unnecessary to determine the effect of nonuser of a public way accompanied by adverse occupation.

It was said in St. Vincent Female Orphan Asylum v. Troy, 12 Hun, 819, citing Corning v. Gould, 16 Wend. 581, that mere nonuser of an easement for twenty years would be termed an abandonment of it. But in this case there was more than nonuser; there was an express surrender followed by nonuser for more than twenty years, of a strip of land within the line of the public highway.

The nonuse of a highway and the constant adverse possession of an individual will establish a prescriptive right. Knight v. Heaton, 22 Vt. 460.

In Alves v. Henderson, 16 B. Mon. 181, it was held that the enclosure and adverse and exclusive possession by an individual of portions of a public ground for more than twenty years would defeat the right of the public.

In Bowen v. Team, 6 Rich. L. 298, nonuser and adverse obstruction for ten years (the statutory 18 L. R. A. period) of a right of way was held to bar the easement.

In Peoria v. Johnston, 56 Ill. 45, the public had, for more than twenty years, ceased to use land dedicated for a highway and the land had been in open and adverse possession of the owner. It was held that the right of the public was extinguished.

This case was cited and its principle followed in Winnetka v. Prouty, 107 Ill. 225, which was a case where a village had been laid out by a plan which failed to give the width of the streets; and the owner of certain blocks fenced them, inclosing land intended for a street. The public acquiesced in his action and built sidewalks and ditches near the land, and for more than twenty years did not use the land inclosed.

In Fox v. Hart, 11 Ohio, 414, it was held that a partial encroachment on a highway by an adjacent owner, continued for eighteen years, did not forfeit the right by nonuser.

In Lane v. Kennedy, 18 Ohio St. 42, a street had been laid out four rods wide but had been opened only part of that width. The plaintiff fenced the portion not used and occupied it for eighteen years. It was held that he could not maintain trespass against the supervisors for removing the fence. The circuit court in this case distinguished between the case of the abandonment of the entire street and the exclusion of the public from a portion of the street.

In Cheek v. Aurora, 32 Ind. 114, there had been a private occupation of a portion of the city street, but the use of the public had not altogether ceased.

To raise a presumption of abandonment of a highway by the public nonuser of the right is necessary for the same period as is required to raise a presumption of dedication. State v. Culver, 65 Mo. 807, 27 Am. Rep. 295. In this case it was held destroy the rights of the owners of the fee of that property, unless done with their knowledge and approval. The erection and maintenance of a gate at the entrance to the alley on Franklin street is not a fact indicating an intention with reference to the easement on the part of the owner of No. 143. It was not their act. It would appear to be important only in connection with an adverse claim or possession on the part of those who erected and maintained it. Abandonment of the easement is not inconsistent with entire and full recognition by the owners of defendant's property of the rights and privileges of the owners of No. 143. But their exclusion from the alley would be a denial of their rights, and could exist only in connection with a claim adverse to such owners. It does not appear that any of the owners of 143 were ever excluded from the alley, or that any claim to the exclusive use by defendant or his grantors was ever made to or brought to their knowledge. But adverse possession, although alluded to in the special term opinion, needs no consideration, as it was not pleaded as a defense, and no finding was made upon it, and none was requested.

The fact of the existence of the gate is of no importance in the case, as evidence of abandonment, in the absence of evidence that it was used to exclude the owner of the adjoining property. It is not denied that no use was made of the alley by the owners of 143, and, as long as there was no occasion on their part to use it, the mere existence of a gate was not notice of any adverse claim on the part of their cotenants. Nor would acquiescence in its existence be prejudicial to their rights, unless an adverse claim was brought to their knowledge. So long as it did not "hinder, obstruct, or annoy others legally privileged to pass through the same," it was not in violation of the terms upon which the easement was granted.

The erection of the house and fence without an opening on the east gives no indication of an intent to abandon the easement. It indicates no more than that the owners of 143 did not use the alley. It is evidence of nonuser, and nothing more. But the nonpayment of taxes and repairs is an act of some significance. Voluntary payment by defendant, of course, amounts to nothing; but if the failure to pay by plaintiff's grantors was coupled with a refusal to pay, on the ground that the easement was not desired, I think it would be sufficient to support a finding of an intent to abandon and give up the right. The owners of No. 143 must be deemed to have known that the privilege in the alley was subject to these payments, and, if for a long term of years they refused to contribute, it would, in connection with the other facts, be strong evidence that the privilege was not desired and was given up. It would be no answer to this fact to say that they were liable under their deed, and could have been sued for half of the taxes and repairs. Perhaps such a suit could have been maintained against them, but certainly the other owners of the easement were not bound to sue them, and defendant has lost none of his rights by a failure to sue. If nonpayment on the part of the owners of No. 143 is evidence of a surrender by them of the easement, the defendant may avail himself in this action of that defense. But the situation was somewhat peculiar. Mrs. Harriot, the widow, was the life tenant of No. 143. Her children had no right to the possession of the property until her death, and therefore no occasion to make use of the alley. She was bound to pay the taxes and repairs, and her children had a right to assume that she would do so. Her failure or refusal to pay the taxes could not, therefore, be regarded as a fact indicating any intention as to the easement on the part of her children, unless they knew of it and approved of it.

While it may be that the children were liable for part of the expenses and taxes between themselves and the owner of the defendant's property, between them and their mother, the life tenant, she was primarily bound to pay them, and they might assume that nonuser of a highway for ten years did not amount to such an abandonment as would justify the owner of the fee in fencing it.

In Kelly Nail & Iron Co. v. Lawrence Furnace Co., 5 L. R. A. 652, 46 Ohio St. 544, it was held that nonuser to work an abandonment of a city street must extend over a period of twenty-one years. In this case the road was almost impassable, no work had been done on it for fifteen years and travel had been substantially diverted to a new road; but this was held not evidence sufficient to show abandonment.

Where a road had been laid out six rods wide but had been used for thirty years four rods wide, it was held that the rights of the public were limited to the extent of the use. Peckham v. Henderson, 27 Barb. 214. To the same effect, substantially, is People v. Cortland County Judges, 24 Wend. 491.

An easement created by implied dedication for a boat landing is abandoned when not used for more than thirty years and when the commerce for whose promotion the easement was created has ceased to exist. Freedom v. Norris (Ind.), May 23, 1891.

In Michigan a highway can be partially discontinued by nonuser and stands against long possession 18 L. R. A.

no better than any other property. Gregory v. Knight, 50 Mich. 61; Lyle v. Lesia, 61 Mich. 16; Coleman v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. 64 Mich. 160. In all these cases the question arose on the true line of the adjoining owner's fence.

The nonuser must continue for the statutory period; but where there is a formal abandonment, and the opening of a new road, the case is different. Lyle v. Lesia, supra.

The principle of the above cases was affirmed in Big Rapids v. Comstock, 65 Mich. 78. In this case the land claimed by the city had been occupied for twenty-five years by a building which encroached 4 1/4 inches on the street as originally laid out and had never been used as a street.

Until a street is required for the public use no mere nonuser will work an abandonment of it. Reilly v. Racine, 51 Wis. 523; State v. Leaver, 62 Wis. 383; Childs v. Nelson, 69 Wis. 125. But after the time arrives when the street is necessary to the public, neglect to open the same may operate as an abandonment by nonuser. Reilly v. Racine, supra.

See, in connection with this as to adverse possession of highway, Meyer v. Graham (Neb.) 18 L. R. A. 146, and note thereto. A. P. W.

that she would do so. Mrs. Harriot, as the owner of 145 and life tenant of 143, was bound to pay one half, while her children were liable only for such proportion as was properly chargeable to No. 143. Now, it does not appear that any demand was ever made upon Mrs. Harriot's children to pay their share of the expenses and taxes in the alley, nor does it appear that Mrs. Schilling or Frederick Harriot ever knew that their mother refused to pay them. The only evidence is that Smith Harriot was informed by his mother that she had been advised not to pay them, and that she did not pay them. But he was not charged with any duty in reference to the property by his brother and sister, and his knowledge then acquired cannot be imputed to them. In the absence of any refusal on the part of the children to pay, the payment by defendant was voluntary, and, of course, gives him no right to the property. I think, therefore, that the children of Mrs. Harriot had a right to assume that their mother would pay these taxes and expenses, and, in the absence of any evidence that they knew she had refused so to do, the mere fact of nonpayment is no evidence that they intended to give up and abandon the use of the alley. Mrs. Harriot did not die until 1877, and two years later her children conveyed No. 143 to plaintiff, with the easement. As to Mrs. Schilling and Robert Harriot, there is no evidence to support the finding of the court.

This conclusion leaves the case to rest entirely upon the fact of nonuser; and, the easement having been created by deed, that is not sufficient to sustain the finding that it had been given up and was extinguished. A person who acquires title by deed to an easement appurtenant to land has the same right of property therein as he has in the land, and it is no more necessary that he should make use of it to maintain his title than it is that he should actually occupy or cultivate the land. Hence his title is not affected by nonuser, and, unless there is shown against him some adverse possession or loss of title in some of the ways recognized by law, he may rely on the existence of his property, with full assurance that when the occasion arises for its use and enjoyment he will find his rights therein absolute and unimpaired. We do not deem it necessary to consider the question whether the plaintiff made out a case which would justify a court in adjudging that the building should be removed, or whether complete indemnity could be obtained by an award for the damages sustained. As a new trial must be had, the evidence thereon may not be the same as is contained on the record before us, and, should occasion arise for the consideration of that question, the trial court is the proper tribunal to determine it in the first instance.

The judgment must be reversed, and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event. All concur, except Follett, Ch. J., not voting.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Frederick P. FORSTER, Respt.,

v.

(.....N. Y.)

1. A lien or incumbrance on land would be created by filing a map of a proposed street across it by virtue of a statute denying compensation for any buildings subsequently erected thereon if such statute were valid.
2. A statute denying compensation for any building erected on land after filing a map of a proposed street across it, although proceedings to open the street or condemn the land have not been begun and perhaps never will be, is unconstitutional as depriving the owner of property without just compensation.

(January 17, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court of the City of New York in favor of plaintiff upon a case submitted to it without action for the determination of defendant's liability to specifically perform a contract to purchase real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—Protection of private rights from interference by public.

No more important questions arise at this time than those which touch the power of the state over the citizen, and these in practice relate mostly to his property rights. It is certain that the trend of modern decisions, with which the main case is in full harmony, has been toward an enlargement of the rights of the citizen or at least toward their fuller protection. As an instance of this may be noted the recent decisions in Buffalo v. Pratt, 15 L. R. A. 413, 131 N. Y. 233, in which by practically overruling the previous decisions in that state the property right of the owner of the fee of a street was protected from the practical confiscation which would have been justified by the doctrine of the earlier cases.

A similar instance appears in Rumsey v. New York & N. E. R. Co., 15 L. R. A. 613, 133 N. Y. 79, in which case the rights of a riparian owner were protected against a taking without compensation by building a railroad embankment along the water front, although to give this protection it was necessary to overrule a decision of the same court which had stood for a generation.

Again the elevated railroad cases have equitably established the rights of abutting owners by limiting or distinguishing the doctrine of earlier cases which if applied to this class of cases would have produced great injustice. The same tendency is shown by the cases on the subject of injury to an abutter's easements of light, air and access by vacating a street, changing grade, etc., which are fully reviewed in the note to Selden v. Jacksonville

Mr. Rollin H. Lynde, for appellant:

The filing of the maps, covering the lot in question, pursuant to Laws 1886, chap. 681, 2 Laws 1882, chap. 419, §§ 672, 677, 958, and amendments thereto, gave to the city of New York such rights and interests, and created such a restriction upon the property, that respondent was unable, after the filing of said maps, to convey said lot by "a full covenant and warranty deed," "in fee simple, free from any lien or incumbrance."

The statute was clearly intended to prohibit, from the time the map should be made and filed, any owner from building on the site of any street laid out on the map, except at the risk of not being paid for such building.

Re Wall Street Widening, 17 Barb. 617; Re Furman Street, 17 Wend. 659.

All that is beneficial in property arises from its use and the fruits of that use, and whatever deprives a person of them deprives him of all that is desirable or valuable in the title or possession.

Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 141, 24 L. ed. 90.

If there was any taking by the city of any right in said lot respondent cannot convey a good title, in fee simple, free from any lien or incumbrance.

Seaman v. Hicks, 8 Paige, 655, 4 L. ed. 580; Suburban Rapid Transit Co. v. New York, 128 N. Y. 510.

By the filing of said map an incumbrance was created for the benefit of the city.

1 Bouvier, Law Dict. p. 696; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 242; 3 Washb. Real Prop. *659, § 14.

Covenants restricting the use of lands are incumbrances.

Wetmore v. Bruce, 118 N. Y. 819; Raynor v. Lyon, 46 Hun, 227.

By the filing of said map the city of New York has acquired a lien which gives it the right to take said lot for street purposes without making any allowance for improvements.

Rochester, H. & L. R. Co. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 110 N. Y. 128; Suburban Rapid Transit R. Co. v. New York, supra.

The right of the city of New York to open streets in accordance with maps to be filed, without compensation to property owners for improvements made after the filing of said maps, has existed unquestioned since 1818, and the provisions of §§ 677 and 958 are not unconstitutional.

Mr. Henry A. Forster, for respondent:

Section 677 of the Consolidation Act is unconstitutional because it deprives the plaintiff of the right to build on his lot, which is the only purpose for which it is adapted and from which it derives its chief value, and by thus depriving the plaintiff of the beneficial use of his property deprives him of his property without due process of law.

By conferring upon the city an option to take or destroy a building on the land covered by a proposed street without compensation, if the city sees fit to open the street, the statute prevents the use of the land for building purposes.

If the practical effect of a statute is the accomplishment of some end which the Legislature would not have power to accomplish directly, or if it effects a result indirectly which could not be done directly, it is unconstitutional.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question in this case is in respect to the plaintiff's rights under a contract made by him with the defendant June 18, 1891, whereby he agreed to sell and the defendant to purchase a parcel of vacant land in the City of New York, at a price specified, subject to, but without assuming a mortgage thereon of $4,000. The plaintiff on his part agreed to convey the premises to the defendant by a full covenant warranty deed, sufficient to vest the title in fee simple free from any lien or incumbrance except the mortgage. At the time stipulated in the contract the plaintiff tendered to the defendant a deed in the required form and containing the proper covenants, which the defendant declined to accept for the reason that, upon searching the title, he had discovered that there was such an incumbrance upon the land that the plaintiff was unable to convey a good title as required by the contract. The facts were agreed upon and submitted to the general term under the provisions of section 1279 of the Code, where it was held that no lien or incumbrance, aside from the mortgage, existed or attached to the land by reason of the facts so stated, and directed judgment for the plaintiff that the defendant accept the deed tendered and pay the purchase price. The facts, so far as they are material, to the point involved, are these: On the 18th of October, 1890, the department of parks of the city of New York, under the provisions of chapter 681 of the Laws of 1886, filed a map of a proposed street or avenue which entirely covers the plaintiff's lot. The map so filed complies strictly, with respect to form and substance, with all the provisions of law on the subject. The proposed street has not been opened and no proceedings have been taken to open it or to acquire the title to plaintiff's land by condemnation. Section 677 of the Consolidation Act provides as follows with reference to damages for taking lands for such streets when the same are finally opened: "No compensation shall be allowed for any building, erection, or construction which at any time subsequent to the filing of the maps, plans, or profiles mentioned in section 672 of the Act, may be built, erected or placed in part or in whole, upon or through any street, avenue, road, public square or place exhibited upon such maps, plans or profiles." The plaintiff's vacant lot derives almost its entire value from the fact that it is possible to use it for building purposes. The facts, therefore, present two questions: (1) whether, assuming the statute to be valid, a lien or incumbrance was created and attached to the land in question by the filing of the map by the park department; and (2) whether the Legislature had power under the Constitution to enact, as it virtually did, that whenever land thus exhibited upon the map is taken for street purposes, at any time after the filing thereof, no compensation shall be made to the owner for any improvements put upon the land during the time between the filing of the map and the condemnation proceeding.

An incumbrance is said to import every right to or interest in the land, which may subsist in another, to the diminution of the value of the land, but consistent with the power to pass the fee by a conveyance. 1 Bouvier, Law Dict. p. 696; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 242; 8 Washb. Real Prop. 659, § 14.

Any right existing in another to use the land, or whereby the use by the owner is restricted, is an incumbrance within the legal meaning of the term. Wetmore v. Bruce, 118 N. Y. 819.

It was conceded by the general term that the public authorities might or might not appropriate the land according to their pleasure, notwithstanding the filing of the map, and further that in case the owner, after the map was filed, made improvements upon it he did so at the peril of losing the enhanced value of the land resulting therefrom. These propositions seem to be correct, but we are constrained to differ with that court in the conclusion that such a situation does not impair the value of the property and amount to an incumbrance within the meaning of the contract. If the law was valid it virtually imposed a restriction upon the use of the property because it enacted that it could not be used for building purposes, except at the risk to the owner of losing the cost of the building at some time in the future. We are also constrained to differ with the general term in regard to the validity of the statute in so far as it enacts that the owner of land exhibited upon the maps is not entitled to compensation for improvements subsequently made. This statute is of somewhat ancient origin, and it was said in some of the cases that it was at first enacted at the solicitation of the landowners in order to enhance the value of their property. Re Furman Street, 17 Wend. 658; Re Wall Street, 17 Barb. 639; Seaman v. Hicks, 8 Paige, 660, 4 L. ed. 582.

However that may be, in the aspect in which the question is now presented, we think it is in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution for the protection and security of private property. The constitutional guarantees against the appropriation of private property for public use, except upon just compensation, as well as that against depriving the owner of its enjoyment and possession without due process of law, have been the subject of much judicial discussion in the manifold aspects in which the questions have been presented in the numerous cases. These provisions have been so thoroughly expounded, and their application, meaning and practical scope so minutely explained, that it would be very difficult to suggest now any views which could be called new, and a restatement of propositions, so often before sanctioned by courts and judicial writers, is quite needless. This case is governed by a few principles so well settled and understood that they are elementary, and nothing can be added to their force or application by illustration or extended discussion. The validity of a law is to be determined by its purpose and its reasonable and practical effect and operation, though enacted under the guise of some general power, which the Legislature may lawfully exercise, but which may be and frequently is used in such a manner as to encroach, by design or otherwise, upon the positive restraints of the Constitution. What the Legislature cannot do directly, it cannot do indirectly, as the Constitution guards as effectually against insidious approaches as an open and direct attack. Whenever a law deprives the owner of the beneficial use and free enjoyment of his property, or imposes restraints upon such use and enjoyment that materially affect its value, without legal process or compensation, it deprives him of his property within the meaning of the Constitution. All that is beneficial in property arises from its use and the fruits of that use, and whatever deprives a person of them deprives him of all that is desirable or valuable in the title and possession. It is not necessary, in order to render a statute obnoxious to the restraints of the Constitution, that it must in terms or in effect authorize an actual physical taking of the property or the thing itself, so long as it affects its free use and enjoyment, or the power of disposition at the will of the owner. Though the police and other powers of government may sometimes incidentally affect property rights, according to established usages and recognized principles familiar to courts, yet even these powers are not without limitations, as they can be exercised only to promote the public good, and are always subject to judicial scrutiny. Wynehamer v. People, 18 N. Y. 878; People v. Budd, 117 N. Y. 1, 5 L. R. A. 559; Gilman v. Tucker, 128 N. Y. 190, 16 L. R. A. 804; People v. Albertson, 55 N. Y. 50; Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 636; People v. Otis, 90 N. Y. 48; People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 889; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 141, 24 L. ed. 90; Henderson v. Wickham, 92 U. S. 259, 275, 23 L. ed. 543, 550; Brimmer v. Reiman, 188 U. S. 78, 84 L. ed. 862; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 83 L. ed. 970; Bohan v. Port Jervis Gas Light Co. 122 N. Y. 18, 9 L. R. A. 711; Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 207, 670.

As the plaintiff in the case at bar was virtually deprived of the right to build upon his lot by the statute in question, and as this circumstance obviously impaired its value and interfered with his power of disposition, it was to that extent void as to him, and created no incumbrance upon it.

It follows that the judgment of the general term was correct in its result, though we have not been able to concur in the grounds upon which it was made, and in affirming its action, we have preferred to place our reasons upon other grounds.

The judgment should be affirmed.

All concur.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

C. M. HERNDON

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE CO. OF LONDON, Appt.

(.....N. C.)

1. The right to file a petition to rehear a case in the supreme court, given by Code, § 966, does not extend to the right to require the court to consider the rehearing contrary to its rules.
2. The Legislature cannot give the right to a rehearing in the supreme court contrary to its rules where the Constitution creates the court and provides that the legislative, executive, and supreme judicial powers of the government shall be separate and distinct and also that the General Assembly may regulate methods of proceeding in "courts below the supreme court."

PETITION for rehearing of an appeal from a judgment of the Superior Court for Durham County in favor of plaintiff in an action upon a policy of fire insurance, which had been affirmed by the Supreme Court. Dismissed.

The grounds of the motion sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. John W. Hinsdale and George V. Strong for petitioners.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a motion by defendant to rehear this cause, argued before the court in bank, upon the ground that rule 53,* which requires the indorsement of a member of the court before a rehearing is granted, is contrary to law. The moving party contends that the Code, § 966, gives the losing party an absolute right to file a petition to rehear, and that it must be considered by the whole court. If it be conceded that this section is conclusive, and bears the construction placed upon it, the mover is out of court, on his own showing, as this motion is not made in vacation, nor within the first twenty days of this term. But, passing by that vital objection, if "filing," within the meaning of that statute, is to be construed as meaning that every petition to rehear must perforce be considered by every member of the court it would virtually almost double the business of this court. We pay counsel who appear here the compliment of believing their contention sound and just when they present a cause for our decision. If, when this court

*Among the requirements of that rule are the following: "Such petition shall be accompanied with the certificate of at least two members of the bar, who have no interest in the subject-matter, and have never been of counsel for either party to the suit, that they have carefully examined the case and the law bearing upon the same, and the authorities cited in the opinion, and that in their opinion the decision is erroneous, and in what respect it is erroneous. The petition shall be sent to the clerk of this court, who shall indorse thereon the time when it was received, and deliver the same to the justice designated by the petitioner; but the petition shall not be filed until he or one of his associate justices shall indorse thereon that the case is a proper one to be reheard."

comes to a different conclusion, the statute gives the losing party a right to file a petition to rehear, and to have that petition considered by the court as a body, and the court can in no way restrict such a right, there would be few cases in which such petitions would not be filed. Counsel in the argument generously conceded that, while the entire court must consider such petition, it would not necessarily be compelled to hear argument. But we fail to see the logic of that concession, if the filing of a petition, and the right to have it considered by the whole court, belong by statutory right to every one who loses a case in this court.

Section 966* of the Code was enacted long prior to the Constitution of 1868, which made a vital change in the powers of this court, as has been pointed out in several decisions of this court, and reaffirmed recently in Horton v. Green, 104 N. C. 400. The supreme court was originally created in 1818 by legislative enactment, and remained till 1868, as to its powers, its duties, its rules, even as to its very existence, subject to control by the Legislature, which could abolish or modify it, since it had created it. By the Constitution of 1868, art. 4, the supreme court was first established as an organic body, and its powers defined. In article 1, § 8, it is provided: "The legislative, executive, and supreme judicial powers of the government ought to be forever separate and distinct from each other." Article 4, § 12, of the Constitution provides that the General Assembly may "regulate by law, when necessary, the methods of proceeding, in the exercise of their powers, of all the courts below the supreme court, so far as the same may be done without conflict with other provisions of this Constitution." As was said by this court in Horton v. Green, supra, when construing these sections, "to the judgment and experience of this court alone is delegated, by the organic law, the power of establishing rules to regulate its procedure, and provide for the dispatch of business coming before it." When the first republican Constitution of North Carolina was framed, at Halifax, in 1776, a large element viewed with distrust the then untried experiment of a government of the people by themselves. As a consequence the whole government was vested in a Legislature, to whose supposed superior wisdom was confided the selection of the entire executive and judicial departments; and, as a further check, one branch of the Legislature was chosen, not by the people at large, but by those possessed of a certain amount of landed property. With the progress of ideas, the Constitution of 1835 intrusted the selection of the governor to the people. A subsequent amendment gave the Senate to the popular vote. The Constitution of 1868 gave the direct election of the judiciary and the heads of the several executive departments to the people, without the intermediary of a legislative selection, and made the three departments of the government co-ordinate, but independent of each other. Each of the three is now equally based upon the broad basis of the popular will. This brief review of the development of popular government in North Carolina is not inappropriate. The members of this court receive, like the Legislature and the executive, their mandate from the people. The same organic law which gives the Legislature power to make rules and regulations for the orderly and regular dispatch of business in its sessions, free from the control or interference of the executive or of this court, gives the same power over its own procedure to this court, free from interference from either of the other co-ordinate branches of government. Neither body has shown any disposition to encroach upon the constitutional prerogatives of this court. But, as their right to do so has been raised by the argument in this case, it is due to the dignity of the court to pass upon the claim to legislative interference put forward by counsel.

Section 966 of the Code was originally adopted, as already stated, under the old Constitution, when the Legislature both created the court, and passed rules for its procedure. It was brought forward in the Code probably by inadvertence, since now the court owes its existence to the Constitution, and its rules are prescribed by itself. But so unobjectionable was this section in itself that the new court, though not recognizing legislative power to enact it, adopted it verbatim, and it now stands as rule 52 of the court. That it has never borne the construction placed upon it by counsel is shown by the fact that even under the old Constitution the court did restrict the right of rehearing, almost from the very beginning, by refusing to reconsider any case unless the petition was concurred in by two other members of the bar of this court, who had no interest in the cause, and who should certify that they had carefully examined the whole case, and that there was error in the opinion of the court. As in those early days the bar of the supreme court consisted of a very few lawyers, mostly gentlemen of long experience, this served as a reasonable restriction. With the opening of railroads, and the increase of the supreme court bar, it became less difficult to procure the signatures of two additional counsel. The court, in Watson v. Dodd, 72 N. C. 240, referred to the readiness with which "two amiable and accommodating gentlemen" would certify that there was error in an opinion which it had cost the five members of the court hours of thought and conscientious labor to elaborate. But notwithstanding this, and many similar reminders, the tide of applications to rehear swelled so rapidly that in 92 N. C. 850, (February, 1885,) years before any of the present members of the court occupied a seat on this bench, it became necessary to adopt the rule now complained of, "that no petition to rehear shall be docketed until one of the justices of the supreme court shall have indorsed thereon that in his opinion the case is a proper one to be heard." This rule has since been modified, very properly, by requiring that the justice who makes such certificate shall be one of those who concurred in the opinion sought to be reheard, and giving the petitioner the right to direct the clerk to which justice to forward his application for a rehearing. Our attention was also called on the argument to the fact that the word "docketed" in the rule now reads "filed," but construed with the context the meaning is the same. Construing rules 52 and 53 together, we understand that now, as always, any one dissatisfied with a decision of this court can at the same term, or in vacation, or within the first twenty days of the next term, "file with the clerk" a petition to rehear. Formerly, before that petition could be considered at all by the court, the certificate of two disinterested counsel was required. That proving insufficient, in 1885 the present rule was adopted, requiring, in addition thereto, the certificate of one of the justices of the court. When that is obtained the case is "filed for hearing" or docketed. The restriction is a reasonable one, since, if the petitioner, making his own selection of the justice, cannot present a case which will satisfy one member of the court upon an ex parte brief, that the case is a proper one even to be reargued, he will hardly persuade the full bench, when there is opposing counsel, that there was error in the former opinion. These restrictions upon an unlimited freedom of rehearing have been proven by experience to be absolutely necessary. To five men is committed, in the last resort, the litigation of a state whose population already aggregates nearly two millions of people, and whose numbers, whose wealth, and, consequently, whose volume of litigation, will steadily increase. If the losing party in this court can, at his unrestricted will, command the consideration of his application for a second hearing by the entire bench, as is contended on the argument in this case, it will not be long before a first hearing in other cases equally deserving will become almost an impossibility. Other suitors are entitled to a prompt hearing, and in justice to them, and not for the ease and comfort of the court, we must adhere to the rule conceived and adopted by the prudent, able, and conservative judges—Smith, Ashe, and Merrimon—who composed this court in 1885, that "no case can be filed [for rehearing] till indorsed by a justice of the court as a suitable and fit one to be reheard." Errors are committed by all courts, but they are by no means so numerous and alarming as they must seem to counsel who lose their causes. They must reflect that they have against them the opinion of the opposite counsel, and of the five disinterested lawyers who have heard the cause debated, (or at least a majority of them.) The court cannot spend its time in winnowing "chopped-over straw" when there is always a vast mass of new cases demanding prompt as well as careful consideration. The Constitution guarantees a right of appeal, but that does not give a right to a second hearing, any more than it does the right to a third or a tenth hearing. The petitioner has had his day in court. He is entitled, by constitutional right, to no more. When the court is satisfied by the certificate of two disinterested counsel, and by the further certificate of a member of the court who concurred in the opinion, and who has been selected by the petitioner to examine into his application, that the cause is a fit one to be reargued, it will defer the argument of appeals which as yet have had no hearing, and give time and place again to the argument of one which has already been heard and determined. But it is only under such circumstances that this will be done. This is due to the party who has gained the cause, and who has a reasonable claim to rely upon the calm and deliberate judgment of a court of last resort as a finality. It is due to the counsel and suitors in appeals yet unheard, who should not be postponed till other causes are argued again and again. And it is due, also, to the dignity of the court, that its decisions should not be lightly called in question by every loser of a case at its bar. To the calm, unbiased judgment of the court must be left the determination of what restrictions justice to others and to the applicant requires should be placed upon the grant of a rehearing. It knows none better now than the one in force in nearly, if not all, appellate courts, of requiring the indorsement of the applications by one of its own members.

Petition dismissed.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, EASTERN DISTRICT OF NORTH CAROLINA.

Re Simon W. SANDERS.

(62 Fed. Rep. 802.)

A state statute prohibiting the sale of seed unless the year in which it is grown is plainly marked on each package except on a sale of seed in open bulk by farmers to other farmers or gardeners is void as to seed brought from another state and sold in original packages.

(November 14, 1892.)

PETITION of Simon W. Sanders for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain his discharge from the custody of the sheriff of New Hanover County. Discharge granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Alfred Russell and D. L. Russell for petitioner.

Mr. John D. Bellamy, Jr., for the State:

The Act is an exercise by the state of the police power to protect its citizens from fraud.

That the power to establish police regulations, in the American Constitutional system, has been left with the individual states cannot be disputed.

Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 706; Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23; License Cases, 46 U. S. 5 How. 504, 12 L. ed. 256; United States v. Dewitt, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 41, 19 L. ed. 593; Henderson v. New York, 93 U. S. 259, 23 L. ed. 543.

What is this power? It is the power vested in the Legislature, to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws, statutes, and ordinances, either with penalties or without, not repugnant to the Constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of the Commonwealth and of the subjects of the same.

Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 705.

The power is located in the states and all that the Federal authority can do is to see that the states do not, under cover of this power, obstruct the exercise of the power confided to the nation.

Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 706.

If the Act complained of affects commerce, but does not regulate it, it is valid.

It is a reasonable exercise of the police power of the state for a legislative Act of Kentucky to require all illuminating oils to be inspected and to have branded on the casks "Standard Oil" or "unsafe for illuminating purposes."

Patterson v. Kentucky, supra.

The court held in Turner v. Maryland, 107 U. S. 88, 27 L. ed. 870, that a statute of Maryland forbidding the exportation of tobacco except in hogshead inspected and passed as required by the Act, is valid.

The state has power to pass laws making it penal to introduce paupers and criminals within its borders.

Goff, Circuit Judge, delivered the following opinion:

Simon W. Sanders presents his application for the writ of habeas corpus. In substance, it alleges that petitioner is restrained of his liberty by the sheriff of New Hanover county, North Carolina, who detains petitioner by reason of a certain mittimus or warrant issued by a justice of the peace in and for said county and state, founded upon a judgment of conviction rendered by the justice for the violation of a certain statute of the state of North Carolina, passed by the General Assembly of that state on the 5th day of March, 1891, entitled "An Act to Protect Seed Buyers in North Carolina," being chapter 381 of the Acts of the General Assembly of North Carolina for the year 1891, in this: that petitioner, as the agent of D. M. Ferry & Co., a firm composed of citizens of the state of Michigan, and doing business in that state, exposed to sale and sold at Wilmington, in North Carolina, certain seeds, which were shipped to petitioner from the state of Michigan by said firm of D. M. Ferry & Co., to be sold by him as their agent. It also alleges that the seeds so sold by petitioner were in the original packages as received from the state of Michigan, and it admits that the packages were not marked as required by the statute alluded to. Petitioner claims that the Act of the General Assembly of North Carolina, by virtue of which he was convicted, in so far as it applies to the act done by him, is in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and that, therefore, no lawful conviction is possible under it, and that consequently he is restrained of his liberty wrongfully. The writ, as prayed for, was issued on the 8th day of March, 1892. The sheriff made return to the writ on the 24th day of March, 1893, admitting that he had petitioner in his custody, and that he held him in accordance with the terms of a warrant of commitment from a justice of the peace for the state and county mentioned. With his return the sheriff files a certified transcript of the record of the court of the justice, showing the trial, conviction, and commitment of the petitioner, from which it appears that the facts relative to the sale of the seed are correctly set forth in the petition filed in this manner. The sheriff, at the time he filed his return to the writ, produced before the court the petitioner, who was represented by counsel, and, there being no appearance for the sheriff nor for the state of North Carolina by counsel, the court ordered that the hearing of the matter involved in this proceeding be postponed until the next term of the circuit court of the United States at Wilmington, N. C., and committed the petitioner to the custody of the marshal of that district. At the spring term, 1892, of the circuit court at Wilmington the matters arising on the writ and return were argued by counsel for petitioner, for the sheriff, and the state of North Carolina, and submitted to the court.

The petitioner, as a member of the firm of S. W. Sanders & Co., of Wilmington, N. C., contracted with D. M. Ferry & Co., of Detroit, Mich., to sell for them garden, flower, and field seeds on certain terms and conditions set forth in a contract dated October 30, 1891. The seeds ordered were duly shipped by D. M. Ferry & Co., from Detroit, received by S. W. Sanders & Co., at Wilmington, and portions of them sold by petitioner. On the 5th day of March, 1891, the General Assembly of North Carolina passed an Act of which the following is a copy:

"An Act to Protect Seed Buyers in North Carolina. The General Assembly of North Carolina do enact: Section 1. That any person or persons doing business in the state, who shall sell seed, or offer for sale any vegetable or garden seed, that are not plainly marked upon each package or bag containing such seed the year in which said seed were grown, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than ten dollars or more than fifty dollars, or imprisoned not more than thirty days, for each and every offense; provided, that the provisions of the Act shall not apply to farmers selling seed in open bulk to other farmers or gardeners. Sec. 2. That any person or persons who shall, with intention to deceive, wrongfully mark or label, as to date, any package or bag containing garden or vegetable seed, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than ten or more than fifty dollars, or imprisoned not less than ten or more than thirty days. Sec. 3. That this Act shall be in force from and after the 1st day of September, 1891. Ratified this, the 5th day of March, 1891."

The seeds so sent by D. M. Ferry & Co., were in packages which were not marked with the year when the seeds were grown, as was required by this statute, and the sales made by the petitioner were in the original packages received from Michigan. Petitioner claims that this statute is a regulation of commerce among the states, the power to make which is not possessed by the Legislature of a state, but is, by article 1, § 8, cl. 8, of the Constitution of the United States, vested exclusively in the Congress provided for by that instrument. Counsel for the state of North Carolina contends that the Act mentioned, while it may affect commerce, is not a regulation thereof, but is simply the exercise by the state of its police power to protect its citizens from fraud. The clause of the Constitution above cited reads as follows: "The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states and with the Indian tribes." The need of a national regulation of commerce among the states was one of the most influential causes leading to the formation of the Constitution of the United States, the desire being to secure uniformity of the commercial regulations against discriminating or burdensome state legislation. It is now well established that Congress has the exclusive right to regulate commerce, and that the grant to Congress in the Constitution relating to that subject carried with it the whole matter, leaving nothing for the state to act upon in cases where the subject is national in character. Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23; Cook v. Pennsylvania, 97 U. S. 566, 24 L. ed. 1015; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Fuller, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 560, 21 L. ed. 710; Henderson v. Wickham, 92 U. S. 259, 23 L. ed. 543; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Huen, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. ed. 527; Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 108, 34 L. ed. 132.

Is this Act of the General Assembly of North Carolina, as applied to the sale in question, a regulation of interstate commerce? If so, it is void. The fact that Congress has not legislated on this particular subject—has not especially regulated this character of commerce—does not authorize the state Legislature to regulate it, but shows that Congress intends such sales to be free in all the states, and not to be restricted or burdened by any state statute. Philadelphia & S. M. S. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 336, 30 L. ed. 120; Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 125 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 700.

In Robbins v. Shelby County Tax. Dist., 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 684, the court says: "The power granted to Congress to regulate commerce among the states being exclusive when the subjects are national in their character, or admit only of one uniform system of regulation, the failure of Congress to exercise that power in any case is an expression of its will that the subject shall be left free from restrictions or impositions upon it by the several states."

The meaning of the decisions of the Supreme Court on this question is expressed by William Draper Lewis in his recent instructive work entitled "The Federal Power over Commerce, and Its Effect on State Action," (page 128):

"Whenever the subject effected by state laws is in its nature national, or requires one uniform rule or plan of regulation, then the inaction of Congress is evidence to the court of its intention that the commerce in this respect shall be free and untrammelled; but when the subject, from its local nature, does not seem to require a uniform rule of regulation, the inaction of Congress is evidence to the court that that body is willing that the states can effect such subjects in the legitimate exercise of their reserved powers."

In one of the early cases in which this clause of the Constitution received careful consideration, (Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 447, 6 L. ed. 688,) Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the court, used this language: "What, then, is the just extent of a power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states? This question was considered in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23, in which it was declared to be complete in itself, and to acknowledge no limitations other than are prescribed by the Constitution. The power is coextensive with the subject on which it acts, and cannot be stopped at the external boundary of a state, but must enter its interior.

If this power reaches the interior of a state, and may be there exercised, it must be capable of authorizing the sale of those articles which it introduces. Commerce is intercourse. One of its most ordinary ingredients is traffic. It is inconceivable that the power to authorize this traffic, when given in the most comprehensive terms, with the intent that its efficacy should be complete, should cease at the point when its continuance is indispensable to its value. To what purpose should the power to allow importation be given, unaccompanied with the power to authorize a sale of the thing imported? Sale is the object of importation, and is an essential ingredient of that intercourse of which importation constitutes a part. It is as essential an ingredient, as indispensable to the existence of the entire thing, then, as importation itself. It must be considered as a component part of the power to regulate commerce. Congress has a right, not only to authorize importation, but to authorize the importer to sell."

If Congress should pass an Act requiring all seed sold in packages to be marked with the year in which the same were grown, and prohibiting the sale unless so marked, regardless of the country where grown, including imported and domestic seeds, as this Act does, it would be the exercise by Congress of the power granted by the Constitution, and a regulation of commerce among the states. The difficulty of honestly complying with such legislation would be presented to the consideration of that body as a reason why the statute should be amended or repealed. If this be true, (and can it be doubted that Congress has the constitutional right to legislate on this subject?) and if the conclusion I reach is correct, that Congress has exclusive jurisdiction of such regulation, does it not follow that this legislation by the General Assembly of North Carolina is unconstitutional and void? If the states can legislate, as to the matter of the North Carolina statute, because of the absence of legislation by Congress on the subject, as was claimed by counsel in the argument, would not the provisions of that Act be held to be so unreasonable, such a burden on the business of the country, and so interfere with the rights and privileges of the citizens thereof, as to render it void? It virtually prohibits the sale in North Carolina of seed imported from foreign countries, for the packages would not be marked, and our dealers could not truthfully mark them as required by that statute. It prevents the sale in North Carolina of seed lawfully carried into that state in the mails of the United States, sent by dealers residing and doing business in other states, who pay to the government of the United States, the postage or freight for the transportation of the same, under laws passed by Congress. It favors the grower and dealer in seeds doing business in North Carolina to the detriment of the growers and dealers of all the other states, for the farmers of North Carolina are, in effect, regarded as growers and dealers in seeds, and exempted from the requirements of the law, and it would follow that all persons desiring to purchase from them would be "farmers or gardeners." It would thereby permit a certain portion of the citizens of that state to engage in that business, and prohibit all the rest from so doing. Why should the farmers of North Carolina be permitted to sell seed in open bulk to other farmers or gardeners, and the petitioner, or D. M. Ferry & Co., or any citizen who desires to engage in that traffic, be prohibited from so doing? How does this protect seed buyers? What is meant by "open bulk?" The natural meaning of the words is, "in the mass; exposed to view; not tied or sealed up." Used in the connection they are in this Act, they do not relate to the quantity that may be sold, nor does the statute restrict it to an ounce or less, or require a bushel or more to be sold. Any quantity of any garden or vegetable seed, not in a package or bag, but in open bulk, may be sold by a farmer to other farmers or gardeners, without the mark relating to the year when grown. The effect of this is that all dealers must sell their seeds through farmers, or be excluded from the market. The farmer may sell seeds, free from any restrictions or marks, but any one else selling the same kind of seeds, even if from the same original mass or bulk, if the same be in packages or bags, must have plainly marked upon them the year when grown,—the words that give purity to the contents, and eliminate all fraud from the sale. This statute virtually prevents the importation into the state of North Carolina of all garden and vegetable seeds in paper packages or bags, for sale in the packages in which imported, and destroys that extensive and useful trade, so far as that state is concerned. If one state can do this, all can. If North Carolina can impose this burden, other states can and will impose similar or heavier ones, to the great damage of a commerce in which not only this petitioner and D. M. Ferry & Co. are interested, but in which many citizens of many of the states have invested their means, and to which they have devoted their time and energies. In Ex parte Kieffer, 40 Fed. Rep. 899, Mr. Justice Brewer says: "The moment you find any Act of the Legislature or any ordinance of a city which prevents the free exchange of lawful articles of commerce between the states, you find an Act or ordinance which contravenes the commercial clause of the United States Constitution."

It was argued that the statute in question is but the legitimate exercise of the police power of the state. What is the "police power," conceded to and proper to be exercised by the state? About this eminent jurists have differed, and have found it difficult to draw the line between it and the powers granted to the general government. Mr. Justice Strong, in delivering the opinion of the court in Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. ed. 527, said on this subject: "It is generally said to extend to making regulations promotive of domestic order, morals, health, and safety. As was said in Thorpe v. Rutland & B. R. Co., 27 Vt. 149: 'It extends to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons, and the protection of all property, within the state, according to sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas which being of universal application, it must of course be within the range of legislative action to define the mode and manner in which every one may so use his own as not to injure others.' It was further said that by the general police power of a state persons and property are subjected to all kinds of restraint and burdens in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the state, of the perfect right of the Legislature to do which no question ever was, or, upon acknowledged general principles, ever can be, made so far as national persons are concerned."

It may also be admitted that the police power of a state justifies the adoption of precautionary measures against social evils. Under it a state may legislate to prevent the spread of crime, or pauperism, or disturbance of the peace. It may exclude from its limits convicts, paupers, idiots, and lunatics, and persons likely to become a public charge, as well as persons afflicted with contagious or infectious diseases; a right founded, as intimated in the Passenger Cases, 48 U. S. 7 How. 283, 12 L. ed. 702, by Mr. Justice Grier, in the sacred law of self-defense. The same principle, it may also be conceded, would justify the exclusion of property dangerous to the property of citizens of the state; for example, animals having contagious and infectious diseases. All these exertions of power are in immediate connection with the protection of persons and property against noxious acts of other persons, or such a use of property as is injurious to the property of others. They are self-defensive. I do not deem it necessary to review the cases on this subject. It was really disposed of in Gibbons v. Ogden, the reasoning of Chief Justice Marshall being, to my mind, conclusive, and, as expressed in said case, never having been departed from in matters where exclusive jurisdiction is given to Congress. As he well says: "The nullity of an Act inconsistent with the Constitution is produced by the declaration that the Constitution is supreme."

Mr. Justice Miller, in Henderson v. Wickham, 92 U. S. 529, 28 L. ed. 548, on this question says: "It is clear, from the nature of our complex form of government, that whenever the statute of a state invades the domain of legislation which belongs exclusively to the Congress of the United States, it is void, no matter under what class of powers it may fall, or how closely allied to powers conceded to belong to the states."

I conclude that the police power of a state cannot be held to embrace a subject confided exclusively to Congress by the Constitution of the United States. If the subject-matter of state legislation is included in the exclusive grant of commercial power to Congress, then the state enactment is void, even if it passed in the exercise of the police power of the state. The authorities in support of this are numerous, and from them I cite Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. ed. 527; Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 47, 35 L. ed. 649; Leisy v. Hardin, 185 U. S. 108, 34 L. ed. 182.

Other questions are submitted by counsel for petitioner, but holding as I do on the matters I have mentioned, I do not find it necessary to pass upon them.

For the reasons that I have given I conclude that the Act of the General Assembly of the state of North Carolina entitled "An Act to Protect Seed Buyers in North Carolina," being chapter 381 of the Acts for the year 1891, is inoperative and void, and that the petitioner is in custody in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

I therefore order that he be discharged from custody.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

Frederick KUEHN, Appt.,
v.

City of MILWAUKEE et al., Repts.

(.....Wis.....)

1. An injury to a public fishery in navigable waters which affects all alike who fish in that locality will not sustain a private suit by a fisherman who has no special privilege or right to fish at the place affected.
2. The fact that a fisherman's nets were damaged and fish which he had caught therein were killed on a single occasion by garbage deposited by a city in a navigable lake which was driven into and upon his nets by the winds and waves, where there is nothing to show danger of a repetition of these injuries, will not give him a right to sue in equity to prevent such deposits of garbage whereby a public nuisance is created to the destruction of a common fishery.

(December 6, 1892.)

APPEAL by complainant from an order of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County denying an injunction to restrain defendants from depositing garbage in Lake Michigan. Affirmed.

Statement by Lyon, Ch. J.:

This is an action in equity, brought by the plaintiff against the city of Milwaukee and one Richardson to restrain them from depositing in Lake Michigan the garbage collected in said city. Richardson was the contractor with the city to deposit such garbage in the lake. He made no answer to the complaint, and no further reference need be made to him. It is alleged in the complaint and certain affidavits presented by the plaintiff that plaintiff is, and for thirty years and more last past has been, a resident and taxpayer in the city of Milwaukee, and during all that time has pursued the avocation of a fisherman, occupying as his fishing grounds "a place about twenty or more miles square, situated east of the central part of the shore line of the city of Milwaukee." That on or about December 30, 1891, he located and placed his nets, as he was accustomed to do, "in the waters of Lake Michigan, at the point aforesaid," and the same remained there until January 5, 1892. The nets were located about ten miles from the shore. That at and before the above dates the city collected garbage accumulating therein, and dumped it into the lake near where the plaintiff's nets were located, and such garbage was driven by the winds and waves into and upon such nets, and greatly damaged the same, killing the fish that had been caught therein. And, further, that the depositing of such garbage in the lake drove the fish from such fishing grounds, and destroyed the plaintiff's business, as well as that of all others engaged there in fishing. The complaint contains many averments showing that the dumping of such garbage in the lake created a public nuisance. The answer of the city admits the dumping of the garbage in the lake, but alleges that it was only a temporary expedient to get rid of it until some better plan could be adopted and put in operation. It satisfactorily appears that, just before the plaintiff's nets were thus injured, the persons in charge of the city garbage boat were compelled by stress of weather to empty one boat load of garbage more directly east of the city, and nearer the shore, than usual, and in the neighborhood of plaintiff's nets. On the complaint and certain affidavits the plaintiff moved for a temporary injunction as prayed in the complaint. The answer of the city and several affidavits were read in opposition to the motion. For reasons stated in a written opinion on file, the circuit court denied the motion. In that opinion, after stating the facts, and holding that the dumping of the city garbage in the lake created a public nuisance of a most grievous character, the court proceeded to give the reasons for denying the motion, as follows: "But has the plaintiff shown himself entitled to have this nuisance abated at his instance? It is not necessary to go beyond this state for instruction upon this point. Our own supreme court has settled the law as to the cases in which a private citizen may sue to restrain a public nuisance, and in which he may not, with as much certainty as any court in the country. The plaintiff in such case must show not only that he is affected by the public nuisance, in common with the other citizens of the state or of the neighborhood. He must show, beyond that, that he is affected in some way different from other citizens, and the difference must be a difference in kind, and not a difference in degree: that is to say, his injury must differ from the injury generally suffered, not only as to the amount of injury, but as to the kind of injury, suffered. The plaintiff in this case shows that he is one of a large number of fishermen affected by this alleged nuisance, and it is abundantly clear that he has no special privilege or right to fish in Lake Michigan; that every other man who is so disposed may become a fisherman in the same lake, and in the same parts of the lake, where he plies his vocation. Furthermore, he shows that a very considerable number of men are so engaged. In what respect does his injury differ from that of the general public? He has no special interest, which others have not, affected by this nuisance. He has no property, which others have not, damaged by this nuisance. He sets up no riparian rights as an owner of a portion of the shore; and, in short, he shows no special injury to himself, or to his business, which is not common to all the fishermen engaged in fishing along the west shore of Lake Michigan, and in the neighborhood of the city of Milwaukee. It has been held that a party having the right to travel along the highway, the same having been obstructed, can bring no suit to abate or restrain that nuisance unless he is thereby prevented from having access to and from his own premises situated along that highway. No matter how much he may be under the necessity of traveling the highway, still he cannot bring this action unless he has occasion to use the highway in a way that others have no occasion, namely, in getting to and from his own premises. So, too, people affected by the pollution of the waters of the river can none of them bring a suit of this nature, unless it be one whose land or whose permanent business is located along the bank of the river, and is thus injured in a manner not common to the whole public. To be brief, however glad I would be to restrain the continuance of this great nuisance, which is already dangerous, and threatens to become intolerable, and however much I may sympathize with the solicitude of the general public to get rid of it, I must hold that this plaintiff has not shown himself qualified to prosecute this action, and must therefore refuse the injunction prayed for." The plaintiff appeals from the order denying such temporary injunction.

Mr. George E. Sutherland, for appellant:

By putting down his nets in these public fishing grounds plaintiff did not thereby abandon the property he had in his nets or lose his property right therein. They were still his nets. Grace v. Willets, 50 N. J. L. 414; Colchester v. Brooks, 7 Q. B. 339; Suttler v. Van Dervoer, 47 Hun, 866; Metzger v. Post, 44 N. J. L. 74, 43 Am. Rep. 841.

By occupying fishing grounds, plaintiff, by such occupancy, came to possess certain rights, certain interests, which others not occupying the fishing grounds did not possess.

By his occupancy the plaintiff acquired a qualified property in the thing occupied (2 Kent, Com. 847); and the destruction of this occupancy was a special damage.

The least injury to an individual, such as an expense of time, or money, or labor, entitles the plaintiff to maintain the action.

Mere nominal damage is sufficient.

Every individual who receives actual damage from a nuisance, may maintain a private suit for his own injury, although there may be many others in the same situation.

Injunction is the proper remedy to restrain the corruption of waters.

The injunction will be granted to prevent the corruption of water, "causing any injury to the plaintiff in any rightful use of the water . . . as by rendering it unfit for fish to live in" (Gould, Waters, p. 786, § 544); and the same rule holds whether the waters are navigable or unnavigable.

Defendant disclaims the intention of continuing the nuisance, if it be a nuisance, and is using due diligence for its removal. Such being the case, the injunction was properly refused.

This being so, before an injunction can be sustained in behalf of the plaintiff, he must show a special injury to himself different in degree and kind from that suffered in common by the public, and peculiar to himself. This he has not done.

Miles*, 4 Maule & S. 101; Hill v. Boston, 123 Mass. 844, 23 Am. Rep. 332.

The material averments of fact upon which the plaintiff founds his claim for an injunction are denied in the answer. The injunction therefore should be refused.

Lyon, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We think the motion for a temporary injunction was properly denied, for the reasons stated in the above extract from the opinion of the learned circuit judge. Those reasons are so clearly and accurately stated therein that but little need be added. Any citizen of the state has a lawful right, in common with all other citizens, to fish in the waters of Lake Michigan. Because the right is common to the whole public, such waters are a common fishery. Wright v. Mulvaney, 78 Wis. 89, 9 L. R. A. 807. Any act which interferes with the enjoyment of that right in any particular locality may be a nuisance; but, if it affects all alike who fish in that locality it is a public, and not a private, nuisance, and no private individual can maintain an action in equity to enjoin its continuance. This is elementary law, recognized and enforced by all courts. It is repeatedly asserted in the numerous cases cited by the learned counsel for plaintiff in support of his claim that an injunction ought to issue in this case. The injury here complained of is the damage to the nets of plaintiff, and the killing of the fish which had been caught therein, on the single occasion mentioned in the complaint, and the destruction of the fishing business in that locality. There is no averment that the plaintiff ever before placed his nets where he placed them on December 30, 1891, or that he ever intended to locate them again in that precise place, or that his nets had been thus damaged or fish therein killed at any other time, or that there was any danger of a repetition of injuries of the same character by like means. So far, then, as injury to such property is concerned, whatever remedy at law the plaintiff may have to recover damages therefor, it is clear he has none in equity.

Neither has he any such right to any specific portion of the lake as will support his action for an injunction. The field of his operations contained 400 square miles or more; and there is nothing in the motion papers to show that he acquired, by occupancy or otherwise, or ever attempted to so acquire, any rights in any particular portion of such field which did not belong equally to every other citizen who, finding the particular place vacant, chose to locate his nets there. The only other injury of which the plaintiff complains is the destruction of the fishing industry in such twenty miles square of Lake Michigan. It is obvious that such alleged injury is common to every person engaged in fishing in that territory. The case shows that there are many such persons.

Many of the cases cited by counsel for plaintiff have been examined. It is believed that none of them conflict with the views herein expressed. They relate to the interruption of the use of navigable streams for the transportation of private property; to conflicting claims to ice formed in such streams; and to conflicting questions of riparian rights; and nearly all of them are actions at law for damages. As already observed, we find nothing in any of them in conflict with the rules of law above indicated, which controlled the decision of the circuit court. Such decision is the more satisfactory in view of the fact that the city has ceased entirely to dump its garbage into the lake, and has made other and permanent arrangements for the disposition of it. At least, it was so stated in the argument, and not denied.

The order of the Circuit Court denying the injunction is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

L. C. NORMAN, State Auditor, Appt.,
v.

KENTUCKY BOARD OF MANAGERS of the World's Columbian Exposition.

(.....Ky.....)

1. The state auditor has not only the right but the duty to question the validity of a legislative appropriation on the ground that it is unconstitutional when he is called upon for a warrant upon the treasurer under such appropriation.
2. An appropriation to exhibit the resources and progress of the state at the World's Columbian Exposition is for a public or governmental purpose.
3. Constitutional requirements as to a vote on the "final passage" of a bill apply to amendments concurred in after the bill has passed both Houses by the House in which the bill was originally passed.
4. A court takes judicial notice of and determines for itself the law.

NOTE.—For constitutionality of legislative appropriations for public exhibitions, see Daggett v. Colgan, 14 L. R. A. 474, 23 Cal. 53. See also note to the same case on the general subject of appropriations of public money.

For presumption of proper passage of statute, see note to People v. McElroy (Mich.) 2 L. R. A. 609, 18 L. R. A.

5. The presumption that a statute has been constitutionally enacted when it has been enrolled, signed by the presiding officer of each House and approved by the governor, is not conclusive in a proceeding by mandamus to enforce it where facts showing that the bill was not constitutionally passed are alleged by the answer and admitted by demurrer.

(Fryor, J., dissents.)

(December 9, 1892.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Franklin County in favor of complainants in a proceeding for a writ of mandamus to compel defendant to issue warrants on the state treasurer for the amounts of certain appropriations which had been made by the state Legislature for the use of complainants. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Knott & Edelen, William Goebel, and Halm & Bruce for appellants.

Messrs. Humphrey & Davie and W. P. D. Bush for appellees.

Holt, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions in this case are of supreme importance. The president of the State Board of Managers of the World's Columbian Exposition presented a proper order to the appellant, the state auditor, for a warrant upon the state treasurer for a portion of the $100,000 claimed to have been appropriated by an Act of the Legislature to make an exhibit of the resources of our state at the exposition. The auditor, acting no doubt from a conscientious desire to properly discharge his duty, and under the advice of the attorney-general, who is by law his legal adviser in such matters, refused it, and this is an action for a mandamus to compel him to give it.

It is said, in limine, that he has no personal interest in the matter, and, being a ministerial officer, cannot refuse to issue it upon the ground that the Legislature could not constitutionally make the appropriation, or that the Act was not constitutionally passed,—in short, that his only duty was obedience, and that he has no standing in court. It is a general rule that a court will not listen to one who says a legislative Act is unconstitutional unless his rights are involved, or he has a right to question it. Section 230 of our new Constitution, however, says: "No money shall be drawn from the state treasury except in pursuance of appropriations made by law;" and our statute forbids the issue by the auditor of a warrant upon the treasury "unless the money to pay the same has been appropriated by law." Gen. Stat. chap. 6, art 1, § 6. If the Act of the Legislature be void for want of power to pass it, or because it was not passed in the manner required by the Constitution, then it is not law; and the auditor is vested with such power, and occupies such a position, that it is not only his right, but his duty, whenever he is called upon to order the payment of money out of the treasury, to inquire whether it is being done legally. He is, in a certain sense, a trustee; and the public interest requires that his office should give him the right to question the validity of a legislative Act under which, by means of his warrant, the public money is to be expended.

The right to the mandamus is denied by him, first, upon the ground that the Legislature has no power to make the appropriation. It is urged that it is not for a public or governmental purpose. Our Constitution says: "Taxes shall be levied and collected for public purposes only." It is often difficult to draw the line which bounds constitutional taxation, or to determine whether the purpose is one in aid of which the taxing power may be invoked, or the money thus raised expended. If it be doubtful, and the Legislature has seen proper to exercise the power, the judiciary should not interfere. The doubt is then to be solved in favor of the legislative action. The object in this instance, however, is to exhibit the resources and progress of the state. It is not to promote the interest of one or a few individuals, and perhaps incidentally that of the public; but the purpose is public in character, and calculated and intended to benefit the entire state. Our Legislature has repeatedly, heretofore, and running through many years, appropriated money for like purposes, and its power to do so is now for the first time questioned. It was done in 1876 for the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia, and later for the one at New Orleans. This was well known to the framers of our present Constitution, adopted in 1891; and, had it been intended to forbid the exercise of the power by the Legislature for such purposes, it would no doubt have been done, in unmistakable terms. In our opinion, it contains no such provision. It is not a loaning of the credit of the state, and therefore forbidden by it. The commissioners selected to expend the money are merely the state's agents to do so, and provide the exhibit for the benefit of its people. The Legislature had the power to provide the means for such a purpose, but in doing so was bound to act in conformity to the Constitution.

The troublesome question in the case is whether it has done so, and what are the duty and power of this court as the parties present themselves. The auditor claims that it has not, and this is the second ground of his defense. Section 46 of our Constitution provides: "No bill shall become a law unless, on its final passage, it receives the votes of at least two fifths of the members elected to each House, and a majority of the members voting, the vote to be taken by yeas and nays, and entered in the journal: provided, any Act or resolution for the appropriation of money or the creation of debt shall, on its final passage, receive the votes of a majority of all the members elected to each House." The Act originated in Senate, and passed that body, upon a yeas and nays vote, entered upon its journal, by the required majority. It then went to the other House, where, after being amended, it passed, upon a like vote, entered upon its journal, by a like majority. It then came back to the Senate, where the amendments were concurred in without a yeas and nays vote, and without the vote of a majority of the members elected. It is conceded by the counsel for the appellees, and seems plain, that this mode of proceeding did not conform to the Constitution. It complied with it in neither letter nor spirit. The object of the section above cited was to have the assent of a majority of all the members elected to each House to all the provisions of the Act, and that this should appear by a yeas and nays vote entered upon its journal. If a bill, after passing one House in the proper manner, and then, after amendment, passing the other House in like manner, could come back to the House in which it originated, and be adopted by a majority of those voting, or a quorum, it would defeat this object, and render the section ineffectual. Let us look at it practically. An appropriation bill of $100 originates in the Senate, and is properly passed. It goes to the House, where it is amended by making the sum $10,000, and is then properly passed by it. It returns to the Senate for concurrence, and is adopted, as amended, by a majority of those present, without a yeas and nays vote. Can it be well contended that this would be a compliance with the Constitution? If so, then there being thirty-eight senators, it would require twenty, or a majority of them to pass a bill for a trifle; but, after being amended in the House so as to perhaps bankrupt the treasury, it could be concurred in by the Senate by the votes of eleven members, or a majority of a quorum; and in case of the House, with its 100 members, it would require fifty-one to pass the bill, if it originated there, but only twenty-six, or a majority of a quorum, to concur in it after it had been changed in like manner by the Senate. Further illustration seems needless.

It is true it has been held that the "final passage" of a bill means when it first passes the body, and not when it returns to it, after amendment, for adoption; and it is said that the constitutional provision as to the number of votes, and the entry of the yeas and nays vote on the journal, does not apply to amendments, or the reports of conference committees. If so, then no matter how material the change, a majority vote of a quorum may pass the bill. The words "final passage," as used in our Constitution, mean final passage. They do not mean some passage before the final one, but the last one. They do not mean the passage of a part of a bill, or what is first introduced, and which may, by reason of amendment, become the least important. If so, then the body may pass what is practically a new bill in a manner counter to both the letter and spirit of the Constitution. When the bill was voted on in the Senate, as amended, and after its return from the House, there never was any further action by the Senate. It was the final vote, and therefore its final passage; and, being so, a majority vote of all the members elected, with an entry by yeas and nays vote upon the journal, was necessary to its constitutional enactment. The bill, as approved by the speakers of the two Houses and by the governor, never was passed by the Senate, by a majority of all its members, nor by a yeas and nays vote.

It is said, however, upon the one side, that, having been enrolled, signed by the presiding officer of each House, and approved by the governor, the Act must be conclusively presumed to have been constitutionally enacted; that public policy requires this rule, else confusion will result, by our statute law being reduced from a state of certainty to one of doubt. Upon the other side, it is urged, with equal ability, that a prima facie case only is thereby presented, and that resort may be had to the journals of the Legislature, which are required by the Constitution to be kept, and are kept, under the supervision of all the members, as to the truth of the matter. Each position is supported by numerous authorities, and, whether the one rule or the other obtains, more or less abuse and danger may result. There is some dynamite either way, but perhaps not as much in the latter as some apprehend, as the party questioning the enrolled and approved Act must at the outset overcome a prima facie case. The first view is the English one, where there is no written constitution. It has been followed by our supreme court, and by at least nine of the supreme courts of the states. The weight of authority in this country, as declared in perhaps as many as nineteen states, is, however, the other way. All agree that the enrolled and approved bill cannot be impeached by loose papers or parol evidence. Public policy forbids it. Too much mischief would result. A review or citation of the numerous cases is unnecessary. They have been examined. The most, if not all, of them will be found cited in the notes on page 185 of Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, and to the case of Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 62, 86 L. ed. 801. It is not necessary, however, to a proper determination of this case, to decide this question. It would, at most, be settling a mere rule of evidence, not prescribed by constitution or statute, and subject to exception and modification by the courts. If it had heretofore been prescribed, it would not control this case. Here no property rights have become fixed, no interests vested, but two parties, each the agent of the state, are contending for the control of a fund, and we must consider this case as it is presented.

The court is asked to exercise its power, and compel the auditor to comply with an Act of the Legislature which the Constitution requires should be passed in a certain way. If the answer of the auditor merely averred that it was not a law, or denied its existence, or that it had not been constitutionally passed, this would be merely pleading a legal conclusion. It would need no denial. The failure to do so would not be an admission of its truth. A court takes judicial notice of, and determines for itself, the law. You cannot aver or prove a public statute. Thus, although a pleading may purport to state its terms or effect, but do so incorrectly, a demurrer does not admit the averment. Pennie v. Reis, 182 U. S. 464, 33 L. ed. 426; Interstate Land Co. v. Maxwell Land Grant Co. 139 U. S. 569, 35 L. ed. 278. The court tries the question as one of law, and a demurrer admits as true only averments of facts well pleaded, and not legal conclusions. The answer of the auditor, however, sets out the facts connected with the passage of the Act. It states what was done, and what was not done. It avers the facts connected with its passage, and files as a part of it a copy made by the public printer of the journal of the Senate relating to it. These facts as to the manner of its passage were admitted by a general demurrer. They show the Act, when it came back to the Senate after amendment, was not voted for by a majority of all the senators, and that a yeas and nays vote was not taken. It was not, therefore, constitutionally passed; and yet the court is asked by the appellees to use its power to enforce it by mandamus, when by their demurrer to the answer, and failure to plead, they are to be regarded as agreeing that this is true. A court, when asked to exercise its power by means of mandamus, should regard the substance, and not the shadow. Its use is confined to those cases where the law has given no specific remedy, and where, in justice and good government, there ought to be one. It is summary in character, and may be resorted to when injustice is about to be done. A court should, in its discretion, grant it only when it is essential to this end. The petitioner must have a clear right, and no other appropriate remedy to prevent injustice and wrong. It is defined in our Civil Code as an order "to perform an act, or omit to do an act, the performance or omission of which is enjoined by law," and is the instrument of a court of law, much as an injunction is that of a court of equity. Cases may be found where it has been refused, in the exercise of a proper discretion, although the petitioner had a clear legal right and it is to be granted or withheld, in the discretion of the court, as the purposes of justice may require. This being the end and object of the writ, it should not be granted to afford relief which the party claims by virtue of an Act confessed by him to be unconstitutional. The attitude of appellees, and the nature of the relief asked, must be considered. Although the appellees, like the auditor, represent the state, yet they demur to the answers, saying, "You cannot go behind the enrolled bill, nor consider the admitted facts set out in the answer;" the intended effect of this being to prevent a decision as to the validity of the Act. Their action cannot be disregarded when asking this writ. The provision of the Constitution is mandatory; and, when this court is called upon to exercise a power, respect for a co-ordinate department of the government cannot be suffered to override the fundamental law, by virtue of which both act and exist. A constitutional rule is not only for the Legislature, but this and all other courts. We must exercise our power with fidelity to it; and, when we are urged to hold that the signatures to the Act import what is confessed by the party asking relief to be untrue, and to enforce as law an act plainly in violation of the Constitution, the court, in the exercise of its discretion in the use of this writ, should withhold it. Our personal wishes in the matter cannot be consulted. If the people desire this appropriation made, the Legislature will doubtless do so; but nothing connected with the matter is more important to all than that it shall be done according to law. It is manifest the answer cannot be truthfully denied. This was, in substance, admitted upon the argument of the cause by the appellee's counsel. Under this state of case, it is proper to reverse the judgment, with directions to dismiss the petition, and it is so ordered.

Lewis and Bennett, JJ., concur in the decision.

Bennett, J., concurring:

The appellees, as World's Fair commissioners, filed their petition in the Franklin circuit court, against the appellant, as auditor, to compel him to issue his warrant upon the treasury for the sum of $25,000, upon their vouchers, approved by the governor, for that sum, alleging that the auditor was directed to issue the warrant by the Act of the Legislature making the appropriation. The auditor, in his answer, alleged that the bill making the appropriation of $100,000 to the World's Fair originated in the Senate, and passed that body upon the call of the yeas and nays, which were entered in the journal by a constitutional majority; that the House refused to pass the bill as it came from the Senate but passed it with amendments, and then the bill and house amendments were sent to the Senate, and that body concurred in the house amendments, but not by a constitutional majority, nor by the yeas and nays entered in the journal; that the bill was therefore unconstitutional and void. The appellants, by their demurrer to the answer, admitted the allegations of fact to be true, and insisted that, notwithstanding the truth of the allegations, the bill being prima facie regular and valid, the auditor, whose duty was in this particular mandatory, was a ministerial officer, and could not refuse obedience to the law's mandate because there was some latent infirmity in the bill that rendered it invalid. The chancellor, upon the hearing upon the agreed facts, adjudged that the auditor, acting in a ministerial capacity, should issue his warrant, because he had no right, as a ministerial officer, to question the constitutionality of the bill; it being prima facie valid. The auditor appeals.

The auditor relies upon section 46 of the Constitution, which reads as follows: "No bill shall be considered for final passage unless the same has been reported by a committee, and printed for the use of the members. Every bill shall be read at length on three different days in each House; but the second and third readings may be dispensed with by a majority of all the members elected to the House in which the bill is pending. . . . No bill shall become a law unless, on its final passage, it receives the votes of at least two fifths of the members elected to each House, and a majority of the members voting, the vote to be taken by yeas and nays, and entered in the journal: provided, any Act or resolution for the appropriation of money, or the creation of a debt, shall, on its final passage, receive a majority of all the members elected to each House."

There is a history of abuses and wrongs in the legislative department, under the old Constitution, that caused the section supra to be ingrafted in the Constitution, and adopted by the people, to wit, it had become a frequent practice under the old Constitution, to pass bills as reported by the committee, by their titles, and by a vice voce vote; the bills never having been read for the information of the members, only the few and faithful understanding that they contained large appropriations, grants, monopolies, and other iniquities. It was intended by said section to prevent the repetition of these methods, and to secure honest and enlightened legislation. Therefore it was provided that the bill should be printed for the use of the members; that it should be read at length on three different days in each House, unless the second and third readings were dispensed with by a majority of all the members elected to the House in which the bill is pending. But the reading of the bill at least once cannot be dispensed with. Then, if the members feel fully advised, they may dispense with the other two. Also, no general bill can become a law unless it receives on its final passage the votes of at least two fifths of all the members elected to each House, and that number must be a ma-majority of those voting, and the vote must be taken by the yeas and nays, and entered in the journal. Also, a bill for the appropriation of money or the creation of a debt must receive, on its final passage, a majority of all the members of each House, the vote to be taken by yeas and nays, and entered in the journal. Now, there can be no doubt that each of these provisions, requiring, on the final passage of the bill, at least two fifths or a majority of the votes, as the case may be, of all the members elected to each House, to be taken by yeas and nays, and entered in the journal, is mandatory, and, unless each of them is complied with, the bill is not constitutionally enacted. This court, in the case of Varney v. Justice, 88 Ky. 601, says, in reference to the mandatory character of constitutional provisions: When the "language [of the Constitution] gives a direction as to the manner of exercising a power, it was intended that the power should be exercised in the manner directed, and in no other manner. It is an instrument of words, granting powers, restraining powers, and reserving rights. These words are fundamental words, meaning the thing itself; they breathe no spirit except the spirit to be found in them. To say that these words are directory merely, is to license a violation of the instrument every day and every hour." Now, as the appropriation to the World's Fair is an appropriation in the sense of the Constitution, the bill, in order to be constitutionally passed, should receive, on its final passage fifty-one votes in the House, supposing the whole number of members to be one hundred, and twenty in the Senate, supposing the whole number of senators to be thirty-eight. So the question is, What is the final passage of a bill? And does the final passage of a bill include the adoption of an amendment by either House that is sent to it by the other House? It seems to be clear that the final passage of a bill is the vote by which the bill becomes a law, when signed by both speakers and the governor; and that this definition includes all amendments there can be no manner of doubt, as one illustration will show: Say the House appropriates $50, and the bill is sent to the Senate for concurrence in the appropriation, but it does not concur in that appropriation, but increases it to $100, and sends it back to the House for its concurrence in that sum. The bill is not as yet a law. The Senate has refused to concur in the house bill, but increases the sum, and asks the House to concur in appropriating that sum. Unless the House does concur, the bill is not a law. Therefore, it takes the action of the House to appropriate $100, and it is then finally passed, and becomes a law, appropriating $100. It is then enrolled as one bill. No amendment appears. So to say that the last action of the House is not the final passage of the bill is clearly a mistake. Such a construction would restore, in full panoply, the evils that existed under the old Constitution, instead of suppressing them forever; for not less than fifty-one members of the House could vote away $50 of the people's money; but the Senate, by amendment, could raise that sum to $50,000 and the House, by a mere majority of a quorum, could concur in the amendment, thus defeating and nullifying the provision supra.

The next question is, Can the auditor, conceding his duty, under the bill, to be purely ministerial, raise the question as to the validity of the bill, or be justified in refusing to issue the warrant? It seems that, when a law commands an officer to do a certain thing, it is mandatory, and the officer cannot rightfully refuse obedience, if the law is prima facie regular and valid. Public policy requires that this rule be strictly adhered to; for to allow a ministerial officer to call in question a law prima facie valid, that it is made his duty to execute, would license him to interrupt and defeat the administration of the government, at his pleasure. The clerk of this court, if such principle was tolerated, might refuse to-day to read or sign the orders, because in his opinion the law requiring him to perform that duty was invalid by reason of some latent infirmity in it. Mr. Mechem on Public Officers (sec. 523) states the rule correctly upon this subject, as follows: "It is not within the scope of the duties of a ministerial officer to pass upon the validity of laws, instructions, or proceedings prima facie valid, and requiring his action. His only duty in such a case is obedience; and, as will be seen hereafter, he cannot excuse himself by undertaking to show the unconstitutionality or other invalidity of the law, or the irregularity of the proceedings." The rule thus announced is fully sustained by the leading cases of the United States, and is eminently conservative. This court has, time and again, recognized the right of the auditor to resist the mandate of the Legislature upon the ground that it had no constitutional authority to require it; but in all such cases, as admitted by one of the counsel for appellant, the infirmity was suggested by the bill itself. But the question here is unlike any that has been reported. Here, on the one side, is the auditor, the financial officer of the state, required to pay to the agents of the state certain moneys to be expended in a certain way,—not to pay debts or to discharge obligations incurred. No rights of third persons have intervened, but the contest is between the officers, as to whether the money should be handed over to be expended in behalf of the state; and the auditor refuses to pay it upon the ground that the bill, although regular and valid upon its face, is, on account of the failure to do certain things required by the Constitution, unconstitutional and void. The agents admit, upon demurrer, the facts, and one of their counsel admits, in his argument before the court, that the bill, by reason of the said noncompliance with the provisions of the Constitution in the particulars pointed out by the auditor, and as suggested by the governor in his veto of a similar bill, is unconstitutional and void. So for us to say to the auditor that he must pay out the people's money, notwithstanding the bill to do so is unconstitutional and void, and no rights of third parties have intervened, making it just and equitable to do so, would be a travesty upon justice, and self-stultification. All the members of the court agreeing that the bill is unconstitutional, and three agreeing that the auditor, under the circumstances, has the right to withhold his warrant on that account, the judgment ought to be reversed, with directions to dismiss the petition.

Pryor, J., dissenting:

On the 9th of February, 1892, and during the present legislative session, a bill was introduced in the Senate entitled "A Bill to Provide for the Collection and Exhibition of the Resources and Evidences of the Progress of the State of Kentucky at the World's Fair Columbian Exposition of 1893." The bill contained an appropriation of $100,000 for that purpose, and placed that sum under the control of a board of managers, who were required to execute a bond for the faithful discharge of their duties, and to draw the money from the treasury of the state, upon the warrant of the auditor, on proper vouchers first approved by the governor, etc. The bill passed the Senate in the manner required by the Constitution, and, that fact having been announced to the House, that body considered and passed the bill in like manner, with an amendment, and then returned the bill to the Senate, where it originated, when that body suspended the rules, and concurred in the amendment; but on this amendment no vote was taken by a call of the yeas and nays, and, in so far as appears from the senate journal, without a majority voting for the bill as amended. The 40th section of the Constitution provides that "each House of the General Assembly shall keep and publish daily a journal of its proceedings, and the yeas and nays of the members on any question shall, at the desire of any two of the members elected, be entered on the journal." The 46th section provides that "no bill shall be considered for final passage unless the same has been reported by a committee, and printed for the use of the members. Every bill shall be read at length on three different days in each House, but the second and third readings may be dispensed with by a majority of all the members elected to the House in which the bill is pending. But, whenever a committee refuses or fails to report a bill submitted to it in a reasonable time, the same may be called up by any member, and be considered in the same manner it would have been considered if it had been reported. No bill shall become a law unless, on its final passage, it receives the votes of at least two fifths of the members elected to each House, and a majority of the members voting; the vote to be taken by yeas and nays, and entered in the journal: provided, any Act or resolution for the appropriation of money or the creation of debt shall, on its final passage, receive the votes of a majority of all the members elected to each House." It appears, therefore, that the bill, as it originated in the Senate, was passed by the constitutional vote, and in the manner prescribed by the Constitution, and, when sent to the House, the bill, as amended, passed that body as required by the Constitution, but on its return to the Senate, as amended, there was no call of the yeas and nays by that body, but a concurrence only in the amendment: and what the vote was, does not appear. Section 56 of the Constitution provides that "no bill shall become a law until the same shall have been signed by the presiding officer of each of the two Houses, in open session; and, before such officer shall have affixed his signature to any bill, he shall suspend all other business, declare that such bill will now be read, and that he will sign the same, to the end that it may become a law. The bill shall then be read at length, and compared; and, if correctly enrolled, he shall, in the presence of the House, in open session, and before any other business is entertained, affix his signature, which fact shall be noted in the journal, and the bill immediately sent to the other House. When it reaches the other House, the presiding officer thereof shall immediately suspend all other business, announce the reception of the bill, and the same proceeding shall thereupon be observed, in every respect, as in the House in which it was first signed; . . . and thereupon the clerk of the latter House shall immediately present the same to the governor for his signature and approval." The governor, on the presentation of a bill to him after it has received the signature of each speaker, either approves the bill, or returns it, with his objection, to the House in which it originated, or, if he fails to return the bill within ten days, (Sundays excepted,) it becomes a law, unless a legislative adjournment prevents it; and in that event he must disapprove it within ten days after the adjournment, by having his veto spread upon the register kept by the secretary of state. The bill in question was approved by the governor, and has been deposited with the archives of state as the enrolled bill, and as the law of the land. I have been thus careful in setting forth these various provisions of the Constitution, as from them originates this litigation between the auditor and the board of managers of the fund appropriated.

It is insisted by the one side that by section 46 of the Constitution, just quoted, the "final passage of a bill" means the vote on the bill after it has been perfected by amendments or otherwise, and in a condition to become a law; that is, "final passage" means the last vote on the bill. On the other hand, it is maintained that when a bill has passed either House by a two-fifths vote, or by a majority vote of all the members when money is appropriated, it must be regarded as the final passage of the bill; that is, there can only be one passage of a bill, and that is its final passage, and subsequent amendments, whether formal or substantial, can be adopted by the vote of a majority of a quorum. The board, by its president, W. L. Dulaney, in accordance with the provisions of the bill, presented to the auditor his vouchers, properly approved by the governor, and demanded a part of the sum appropriated to defray expenditures connected with Kentucky's exhibit at the World's Fair; and the auditor refused payment on the ground that the bill was unconstitutional, for two reasons: First, the bill having been amended by the House, a mere concurrence in the amendment by the Senate, without a call of the yeas and nays, showing that a majority of the Senate voted for the bill as amended, is in violation of section 46 of the Constitution; second, the Legislature had no power, even by a majority vote, to make such an appropriation. The auditor having challenged in this manner the validity of the bill, the board of managers instituted these proceedings in the Franklin circuit court for a mandamus requiring him to issue his warrant on the treasury for the sums specified in the vouchers presented to him. The answer filed by the auditor sets forth in detail the legislative proceedings as to the manner in which the bill was passed; that the journal of the Senate fails to show the yeas and nays vote on the bill as amended by the House, or that a majority of the senators voted for the bill as amended. A demurrer was sustained to the answer, and the case comes to this court with the admission made by the demurrer, and also, as a matter of fact, that the journals will show that no vote was taken in the Senate by a call of the yeas and nays on the bill as amended by the House, and nothing on the face of the senate journal showing that a majority of the Senate voted for the amendment.

It was argued that the auditor, being a ministerial officer, could not raise the constitutional question as to the manner in which the Act passed. It is true that neither he nor his bondsmen would have been liable if payment had been made, and the Act held (as it has been) unconstitutional; but I think it equally clear, under numerous decisions of this court that it is not only his right, but his duty, to contest every claim in regard to which he is required to draw his warrant on the treasury, when, in his opinion, it is not properly verified, or has not been allowed or appropriated according to law. He is the trustee of the state's funds, and to such an extent that not one cent can be drawn from the treasury without his warrant; and his persistency in refusing to pay this claim not only attests his fidelity and efficiency as an official, but his defense, in which he is sustained by my associates, has saved to the state an expenditure from the treasury, under a void unconstitutional enactment, the sum of $100,000.

I do not believe his defense in response to the petition for a mandamus is available, and shall proceed to give my reasons for dissenting from the principal opinion.

I shall assume without any discussion, as the entire questions have been considered in consultation, that the Legislature had the power, under the Constitution, to pass the bill, and the only objection to its validity as a law is that the bill was not passed in the manner provided by the Constitution. It is contended by my associates that the demurrer, as well as the agreed facts, admit the bill was not passed in conformity to the Constitution, and by this admission the appellees have in some manner deprived themselves of the right to a mandamus. In other words, that a party may come into court, and, in a litigation involving the construction of constitutional provisions, by admitting that a bill was not read for the first time, or that the yeas and nays were not called as provided by the Constitution, he admits the unconstitutionality of the Act, and will not be heard to say that the journals of either House, showing that fact, are no evidence, as against the enrolled bill. The appellees only admitted the truth, and, if a denial had been made as to what the journals would show in that particular, it would have been false; for they do show that the yeas and nays were not called when the amendment in the House was concurred in by the Senate. Therefore, the question is, Can the journals be introduced as evidence to contradict or to nullify the enrolled bill? It is plain that the constitutionality of an Act cannot be determined by the admissions of a party, and when brought in question, where evidence is offered to show the Act to be void, the highest and best evidence must be adduced; and, if the journal of the Senate is incompetent for that purpose, the admission that it is competent would not make it so.

Mr. Justice Cooley says the court will not act upon the admission of parties that an Act was not passed in accordance with the Constitution. Const. Lim. 6th ed. p. 168, note. See also Legg v. Annapolis, 42 Md. 203, for a discussion of this question. If the issue had been made by a denial, the auditor would have offered to introduce the journals; and, upon the objection of the appellees as to the competency of the testimony, the identical question would have been made that was raised by the demurrer. If the appellees had not filed a demurrer, nor replied to the answer of the auditor, and submitted the case in that condition, the court would have been compelled to hold that the answer constituted no defense. The appellees have done nothing to waive their legal right. They come into court with a clear legal right to demand of the auditor this money, and it is the auditor setting up a defense based upon incompetent testimony which is taken hold of by my associates as evidencing such an unconscientious claim as to justify them in denying a remedy for the enforcement of a clear legal right; and to do this they go back, not at the instance of the appellees, but at the instance of the auditor, to see whether the journals establish the truth of the facts alleged by the defense,—facts the appellees admit to exist; and admitting the truth in regard to a matter over which they had no control, and that is incompetent testimony for any purpose on this issue, they are denied a remedy to which they would have been entitled but for this incompetent testimony. This is based on the idea that the appellees have an interest in this controversy; and, if this be true, they have no standing in court, and the case should be dismissed on that ground. I can see nothing in the argument sustaining this view, and it is at last a decision, in effect, that you may declare a law invalid by reason of the Legislature failing to pass a law in the manner required by the Constitution; and the question arises, Is the validity of the Acto be determined by the enrolled bill, or by the journals of the Senate, showing the manner of its passage? It is contended, on the one hand, that where the journals show that the Constitution has not been complied with on the passage of a bill, the bill is a nullity; and, on the other, it is argued that the manner of passing bills is exclusively within the province of the Legislature, in the exercise of the power conferred by the Constitution, and that when a bill is authenticated in the manner provided by section 56 of the Constitution, and promulgated as the law, it is conclusive evidence of its existence as a law, although the requirements of the Constitution as to the manner of its passage may not have been complied with. It is not claimed that the two speakers can sign a bill, either in or out of session, and have it approved by the governor, and that this makes it a law, although it may never have been introduced. To do this you must impute corruption and fraud to both speakers and the executive—a case that would never arise, and too futile in its suggestions to deserve notice in an opinion.

Shall the courts, when a bill has been signed by the speaker of each House, and declared a law in the presence of the members of each body, approved by the governor, and filed with the archives of state as the law of the land, look to this enrolled bill as conclusive of the fact that the bill was properly passed, and leave the co-ordinate branch of the government, whose duty it is to pass laws, when acting within the scope of its power, responsible to its constituency for the manner of its exercise? The case of Auditor v. Haycraft, 14 Bush, 284, is relied on by each party as sustaining the view they respectively present. The writer of this dissent wrote the opinion of the court in that case. The pleadings in that case raise no such question, and all the court said was that "no inquiry will or can be instituted, as the case is presented, for the purpose of ascertaining the manner in which the enactment was passed." "There has been no pleading filed by the state or auditor presenting any such issue, and we must therefore adjudge it was constitutionally enacted, and cannot take judicial notice at the mere suggestion of counsel, as to the votes cast for or against the measure on its final passage. If a bill of this character did not receive the vote of a majority of the members, the only mode of reaching the question is by an allegation of fact in an appropriate pleading, and the journals offered as evidence to sustain the defense." This was not done in that case, nor the journals offered so that an objection might be made to them as evidence; and, from a casual reading of the opinion, it will be seen the question was not decided or discussed.

The importance of this question cannot be overestimated; and this court is not urged, for the first time in the judicial proceedings of the state, by appropriate pleadings, to adjudge an Act unconstitutional, by reference to the legislative journals, when we have before us the enrolled bill, authenticated as the Constitution requires. If the validity of the bill was assailed for the want of power on the part of the Legislature to enact it, a judicial question would at once arise; and I would not feel that I was invading the domain of a co-ordinate branch of the government, as supreme in its jurisdiction as the judiciary, when determining the extent of legislative power. It is manifest that there is a marked distinction between determining a law to be in violation of the Constitution, and in adjudging that it has not been passed in the mode required by that instrument. In defining the powers of government, the Constitution gives to the Legislature the sole power to make the laws, and to judge of their expediency, and upon the judicial department devolves the duty of interpreting those laws, when made; and I can perceive but little necessity for a distribution of the powers of government, if the judiciary can be called on to determine, in the first place, whether an Act was passed in accordance with the mode prescribed by the Constitution, and then determine the power of the Legislature to enact the law. This bill has been promulgated by the Legislature, with its validity as a law attested by the signature of the speaker of each House, and its approval by the governor. It may be properly said that judicial opinions, from able lawyers and courts, as to the power of a court to go behind an enrolled bill in order to determine the manner of its passage, are such as to cause a doubt as to any conclusion the judicial mind may reach on the question, but, when the cases decided are carefully analyzed, it will be found that the decided weight of authority is that an enrolled bill, attested, as in this case, in the manner provided by the Constitution, becomes a perfect law, and its validity cannot be questioned except on the ground that the Legislature had no power to enact it. The cases opposed to this view are based, some of them, on the idea that certain provisions of their state Constitutions are mandatory, and others not; many of them following the earlier cases rendered by the Supreme Court of New York, that have been overruled, and the cases from the supreme court of Illinois, that by its recent utterance intimates strongly that the enrolled bill is the best evidence of what is the statute law of the state. It is difficult to perceive why every provision of a Constitution is not mandatory, and to be so adjudged, unless it is made directory, in express terms; and if left open to judicial interpretation, as ordinary legislative enactments, then the provision in question becomes either mandatory or directory, as it may appear to the mind of the judge called upon to interpret it, and with such uncertainty there would be no uniformity in the construction of constitutional provisions. Mr. Justice Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, says: "But the courts tread upon very dangerous ground when they venture to apply the rules which distinguish directory and mandatory statutes to the provisions of a constitution. It is the province of an instrument of this solemn and permanent character to establish those fundamental maxims, and fix those unvarying rules, by which all departments of the government must at all times shape their conduct; and if it descend to prescribe mere rules of order, in unessential matters, it is lowering the proper dignity of such an instrument, and usurping the proper province of ordinary legislation." Regarding, therefore, every provision of a constitution mandatory, it furnishes no reason for holding that the journals of either House are the best evidence to the courts and the people of the validity of the bill. Some test, however, must be had, and the citizen, who is presumed to know the law, must have the means of knowing when a law has been enacted; and while no case, reported or unreported, in this state is to be found, deciding this question, there has, in effect, been a practical construction as to what constitutes the evidence of the passage of laws, by the manner in which our statutes are published and verified by the enrolled bill. Our statute laws have been embodied for years in what is known as the "Revised and General Statutes" and published "Acts of the Legislature." When the law, as found in the statute book, is claimed not to be the law enacted by the Legislature, resort is had to the enrolled bill; and I venture the assertion that the able revisers of our statutes and codes of practice never at any time consulted the legislative journals, with a view of ascertaining whether the enactments they were publishing as laws to guide the people had been constitutionally passed, and for the reason the enrolled bill was the best evidence of that fact; and, although there has been no decision on the question, this raises a strong presumption as to the manner in which such constitutional provisions have been interpreted.

What is the evidence upon which this court is asked to pronounce this law unconstitutional? Section 40 of the Constitution provides: "Each House of the General Assembly shall keep and publish daily a journal of its proceedings; and the yeas and nays of the members on any question shall, at the desire of any two of the members elected, be entered on the journal." This journal is kept by the clerk or his assistant; is not signed, or required to be signed, by any one. Its second and third readings are dispensed with in almost every instance where a motion is made. It is not required to be attested in any manner whatever. Can it be that the framers of the Constitution contemplated that journals kept in this way are to be regarded as records containing such absolute verity as to be looked to by the courts for the purpose of nullifying a legislative enactment that has been attested and approved in the mode prescribed by section 56 of the Organic Law? This bill was signed by the presiding officer of each House, in open session; and, before the speaker signed the bill, he suspended all other business, declared that such bill "will now be read," and he "will sign the same, to the end that it may become a law." It is then read and compared, and found to be correct. He affixes his signature, in the presence of the House, in open session. And, when this is done, to say that such solemn acts, after the bill has been filed with the secretary of state as the law, are to be disregarded by reason of entries in the legislative journals, "would shake," as Chief Justice Beasley said in deciding a similar question, "the stability of all written law to its very foundations." State v. Young, 82 N. J. L. 37. If a court can leave the enrolled bill, and search for evidence in the journals to nullify it, this rule of evidence would apply, not only to the passage of laws enacted since the present Constitution was adopted, but the manner of passing every statute since the Constitution of 1849 would be subjected to judicial investigation; and whether involving the right of property, or enacted for the punishment of crime, with an issue raised as to the manner of its passage, the court would be compelled to look into the journals of either House, or allow the litigant to do so, for the purpose of determining whether or not the enactment was passed in the mode prescribed by the organic law. The Constitution of 1849 contains this provision: "No bill shall have the force of a law until, on three several days, it be read over in each House of the General Assembly, and free discussion allowed thereon, unless, in cases of urgency, four fifths of the House where the bill shall be depending may deem it expedient to dispense with this rule." If, therefore, the journals of the Legislature, under the Constitution of 1849-50, fail to show that the bill was not read three several days, and the reading had not been dispensed with, it is not a law, or, if the journals show affirmatively that the bill was only read two days, and the third reading not dispensed with, the same disastrous results must follow; and, according to the majority opinion, if, under the present Constitution, the governor and the House had coincided with the views of the Senate, all the bills where the yeas and nays had not been called on the original bills, or the bills as amended, would necessarily, when assailed, be adjudged null and void, although authenticated as the Constitution requires.

The fear of the consequences resulting from such a rule does not alone induce me to regard the enrolled bill conclusive as to the valid passage of a bill. It is because it is a certain and fixed test, and is the highest evidence of what the Legislature has done. The laws embodied in our statutes come from the enrolled bills. All the rights of the citizen, derived under statutory enactments, depend on the verity of the enrolled bills. The published laws are verified by them, and every statutory right becomes endangered when you present other evidence to show that an enrolled bill is not the law. Many of the decisions on this question evidence great ability, and, with provisions in their constitutions in many respects similar to ours, they hold, in discussing the right to go back to the journals of either House, that the enrolled bill is conclusive. In the case of State v. Young, reported in 82 N. J. L. 37, the court, in speaking of the journals as evidence, said: "In the nature of things, they must be constructed out of loose and hasty memoranda, made in the pressure of business and amid the distractions of a numerous assembly. There is required not a single guarantee to their accuracy or to their truth. No one need vouch for them, and it is not enjoined that they should be either approved, copied or recorded." Again: "The Legislature has . . . adopted a method of certifying its own acts in a authentic form. . . . To the correctness of the present bill, for example, we have the signature of the presiding officer of each House. In its present form, it was exhibited to the governor as the bill which had been enacted, and as such received his approval, as is evidenced by his signature. It was then immediately made public by being filed in the office of the secretary of state. These are the sanctions which the Legislature has provided for the authentication of its own acts, both to the public and to the judicial tribunals, and the question is therefore presented, whether such authentication must not be deemed conclusive. . . . This question, in my opinion, must be answered in the affirmative. How can it be otherwise? The body that passes a law must of necessity promulgate it in some form." And, continuing, the court said: "In the frame of our state government the recipients and organs of this threefold power are the Legislature, the executive, and judiciary, and they are co-ordinate—in all things equal and independent; each, within its sphere, is the trusted agent of the public. With what propriety, then, is it claimed that the judicial branch can erect itself into the custodian of the good faith of the legislative department? . . . But the proposition is, whether, when the Legislature has certified to a mere matter of fact, relating to its own conduct and within its own cognizance, the courts of the state are at liberty to inquire into or dispute the veracity of that certificate. I can discover nothing in the provisions of the Constitution, or in the general principles of government, which will justify the assumption of such superior authority."

In the case of State v. Swift, reported in 10 Nev. 176, 21 Am. Rep. 721, from the state of Nevada, where a provision of the state Constitution is analogous to ours, providing "that the reading of a bill by sections on its final passage shall in no case be dispensed with, and the vote on the final passage of every bill or joint resolution shall be taken by yeas and nays, to be entered on the journals of each House," etc., the court held that the official copy of a statute duly enrolled and authenticated is conclusive evidence of the law, and the court cannot resort to the journals of the Legislature, nor to any other extrinsic evidence, to ascertain whether the statute was duly enacted. That court, in response to the argument in favor of receiving the journals as evidence, said: "The hope of doing good [that is, by correcting mistakes in enrolled bills by the journals] by the course suggested is more than overbalanced by the danger of doing harm, and therefore presents no equivalent for the incalculable disadvantage of reducing the statute law from a state of certainty to one of everlasting doubt." To the same effect is the case of People v. Devlin, 33 N. Y. 269, 88 Am. Dec. 877.

In an opinion delivered by Mr Justice Harlan, of the Supreme Court and concurred in by his associates, (the case, of Field v. Clark, 148 U. S. 649, 36 L. ed. 294,) many of the cases on this question were referred to; and in an able and exhaustive discussion of the points involved in that case, the court held: "The signing by the speaker of the House of Representatives, and by the president of the Senate, in open session, of an enrolled bill, is an official attestation by the two Houses of such bill as one that has passed Congress. It is a declaration by the two Houses, through their presiding officers, to the president, that the bill thus attested has received, in due form, the sanction of the legislative branch of the government, and that it is delivered to him in obedience to the constitutional requirement that all bills which pass Congress shall be presented to him. And when a bill, thus attested, receives his approval, and is deposited in the public archives, its authentication as a bill that has passed Congress should be deemed complete and unimpeachable." In response to the argument that was made in that case, and also urged before us, that some supervision was necessary, otherwise the officers of the respective Houses and the members might purposely defeat the popular will, the court said: "But this possibility is too remote to be seriously considered in the present inquiry. . . . Judicial action based upon such a suggestion is forbidden by the respect due to a co-ordinate branch of the government. The evils that may result from the recognition of the principle that an enrolled Act in the custody of the secretary of state, attested by the signatures of the presiding officers of the two Houses of Congress, and the approval of the president, is conclusive evidence that it was passed by Congress according to the forms of the Constitution, would be far less than those that would certainly result from a rule making the validity of congressional enactments depend on the manner in which the journals of the respective Houses are kept by the subordinate officers charged with the duty of keeping them." The court also said: "In regard to certain matters expressly required by the Constitution to be entered on the journal,—to what extent the validity of legislative action may be affected by the failure to have those matters entered on the journal—we need not inquire. No such question is presented for determination." It is therefore argued that the precise question presented here was not before the court in Field v. Clark. Still it is evident the court was not inclined to recognize the doctrine found in the Illinois and other cases as sound. The provision of the Constitution of Illinois is "that all bills, before they can become laws, shall be read three several times in each House, and shall be passed by a vote of a majority of all the members elect." The supreme court of that state, in People v. Starns, 35 Ill. 121, said: "According to the theory of our legislation, when a bill has become a law, there must be record evidence of every material requirement from its introduction until it becomes a law, and this evidence is found upon the journals of the two Houses,"—the court further saying: "We are not, however, prepared to say that a different rule might not have subverted the public interest equally well; leaving the Legislature and the executive to guard the public interest in this regard, or to become responsible for its neglect." Mr. Justice Harlan, in reviewing the various decisions on this subject, quoted the language of the Illinois court, in which the soundness of the rule established in that state is questioned, and approved the doctrine of the state courts making the enrolled bill conclusive evidence of the law. The case from the Mississippi Supreme Court of Ex parte Wren, 68 Miss. 512, 56 Am. Rep. 825, is also referred to in the case of Field v. Clark, in which Mr. Justice Campbell said, after reviewing the adjudged cases: "Every other view subordinates the Legislature, and disregards that coequal position in our system of the three departments of government. If the validity of every Act published as law is to be tested by examining its history, as shown by the journals of the two Houses of the Legislature, there will be an amount of litigation, difficulty, and painful uncertainty appalling in its contemplation, and multiplying a hundred-fold the uncertainty of the law." "If the court may go beyond the enrolled bill, and try its validity by the record contained in the journals, it must perform this task as often as called on, and every court must do it. A justice of the peace must do it; and we will have the spectacle of examination of journals by justices of the peace, and statutes declared not to be law, as the result of their journalistic history. Let the courts accept, as statutes duly enacted, such bills as are delivered by the Legislature as their Acts, authenticated as such in the prescribed mode." In Weeks v. Smith, 81 Me. 547, it was said: "No man should be required to hunt through the journals of a Legislature to determine whether a statute properly certified by the speaker of the House and the president of the Senate, and approved by the governor, is a statute or not."

It is insisted that section 46 of the Constitution, containing the provision that "no bill shall become a law unless, on its final passage, it receives the votes of at least two fifths of the members elected to each House, the vote to be taken by the yeas and nays on the journals, and a majority of all the members where an appropriation of money is made," opens the door to an investigation of the journals by the courts. I see no distinction between a provision of a Constitution requiring a call of the yeas and nays by the legislative body upon the final passage of a bill, and the provision to the effect that the first reading shall not be dispensed with. They are all mandatory provisions, regulating the mode in which the Legislature shall enact laws the construction of which belongs to the two Houses and the executive, and not to the courts, and especially when the Constitution contains a provision directing the mode of authentication by which the courts and the people are to be governed. By the statute of our state, for a deed of a married woman to be effectual, the clerk is required to examine her separately and apart from her husband, and, although he may have examined her in the presence of her husband, the courts, by reason of an express statute, will not allow the clerk or the married woman to show that he did not comply with the law when he has certified that he did, in the absence of fraud on the part of the grantee, and for the reason that such a rule of evidence would make the title to land too uncertain; and while the statute, as to the clerk, is mandatory, just as the provision of the Constitution in regard to the enactment of laws is mandatory to the Legislature, when the bill is certified or authenticated in the mode required, you cannot go behind it. The enrolled bill should be held conclusive. The building may be defective in its construction, but, when received from the hands of the architect, will be allowed to stand. Section 56 of the Constitution is plain and unmistakable as to the manner in which a bill is to be authenticated and promulgated as the law, and affords the means for every one ascertaining what the law is. When we find an Act filed with the secretary of state, authenticated by the signatures of the speakers and the approval of the governor, every citizen can rely on its efficacy, if within the power of the Legislature to enact it; and no evidence of any character, assailing its validity, should be listened to. It will be found that courts entertaining opposite views on this question are constantly perplexed in their efforts to sustain the validity of laws with a view of preserving rights acquired under statutes, where the mode of passing them was not as prescribed by the Constitution. In the cases of Hall v. Steele, 83 Ala. 562; Giddens v. Martin, 51 Ark. 559; State v. Algood, 87 Tenn. 163; State v. Hastings, 24 Minn. 78; and in the courts of Kansas and Colorado,—it has been held that the journals may be looked into with a view of assailing the enrolled bill, but, when they are silent on the question as to the manner of passing the bill, the court will presume that they were passed in accordance with the Constitution; and in some of the state courts, in order to avoid the disastrous consequences resulting from contradicting the enrolled bill, a legislative estoppel in some cases has been applied, to the effect that subsequent legislation in the nature of amendments cured a void legislative enactment. The highest authority adverse to the rule here recognized is Mr. Justice Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, following the decisions of the courts of his own state. The supreme court of that state has gone so far as to hold that when there is no entry on the journals, and no resolution authorizing such entry, an entry found in the bound volume of the house journal will be presumed to have been properly made; two of the judges (Long and Grant) dissenting. Detroit v. Board of Assessors of Detroit (Mich.) 51 N.

W. Rep. 787. I cannot assent to such a doctrine.

Nor should the bill before us be held unconstitutional upon the idea that no one is injured by a reversal of this case; that it is only one agent of the state government trying to keep the money in the treasury, and another trying to get it out. It is either a law or not a law. If a law, the appellees have the legal right to the money, and to compel the auditor to pay it. There can be no exception to the rule. It is true they are the agents to disburse this fund, but the ears of the court are not closed to the fact that the managers have been engaged in preparing the exhibits for the World's Fair. They have doubtless expended their own means in making such preparations as were necessary for that purpose.

They had the right to act under the law, and the approval of the governor of their vouchers for $25,000 raises a strong presumption that they have made expenditures. The executive was right in approving the vouchers, because he knew the board of managers had acted in good faith. Still, from the majority opinion, if expenditures have been made, as the act was void, it affords them no protection. Can this be? Are the courts of this state to search the journals to find out whether or not statutory rights can be enforced? Such a rule not only makes the forms of legislation, but all legislative expediency, the subject of judicial approval. It invites the judge from the bench, that he may become a partisan to the passage or rejection of bills, where partisan influence and excitement prevail. It is an encroachment upon the exercise of legislative power. Its effect will be to sweep from the statute books bills of the highest importance, passed during this legislative session, and open the door to an assault on all past legislation. It is a legal dynamite, hidden from the public view, ready, when the occasion requires, to be used in the destruction of any statute. In the language of a great judge (Judge Black) in an opinion given on a similar question, "I fear to turn loose a principle which might devour the whole statute book."

1 Ops. Atty-Gen. U. S. p.—.

While I do not differ from my associates as to what is the final passage of a bill, it is a question that was not debated by counsel; and, from my view of this case, the opinion, at best, would only be advisory in its character, and given to a representative body that has not sought it. I again repeat that this court is only determining what evidence we will look to in order to ascertain whether the Act in question is or not a law. It is one entirely distinct from the legislative power in passing bills, or that of the governor in pointing out defects and constitutional omissions in the attempt to pass them.

I feel the importance of a court of last resort concurring on all constitutional questions, but the magnitude of the question involved, and the danger, as I conceive, flowing from the construction given the Constitution by my associates, compel me to dissent from their views of the main question involved.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Benjamin S. PARKER et al., Appts.,

v.

STATE of Indiana, ex rel. Simon T. POWELL.

(.....Ind.....)

1. The constitutionality of a legislative Apportionment Act is a judicial question and not one which the court cannot consider on the ground that it is a political question.
2. Judicial notice will be taken of the geography of a state and also of the enumeration of inhabitants taken pursuant to law.
3. No scheme for senatorial districts can be lawfully devised in which a county having less than the unit of population for a senatorial district can legally be entitled to vote for two senators where the constitutional provisions require equality in representation.

4. A county having more than the representative unit of population cannot be denied the right to a separate representative.

5. Counties fully represented cannot be used in the apportionment of districts for the purpose of joining counties which are not otherwise contiguous.

6. The rule of practical construction is of no value in construing a Constitution when it is plain that the practice has been in open violation of that instrument.

7. One elected or appointed to an office under an unconstitutional statute before it is adjudged to be so is an officer de facto.

8. The constitutionality of a statute will not be considered in a case which can be decided upon its merits without such consideration.

On rehearing.

9. The attorney-general is only an

NOTE.—The validity of legislative Apportionment Acts has been more discussed, and the law upon the subject more fully developed, during the current judicial year than in all time preceding. The assumption by legislatures of practically unlimited and arbitrary power in the furtherance of partisan interests has received some wholesome checks by the courts without regard to political affiliations of the judges.

The above case very clearly presents the constitutional questions involved and shows that the rights of citizens to practical equality in the choice of representatives are fully protected by the fundamental law. APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Henry County in favor of petitioner in a proceeding by mandamus to compel defendants as election officers to take the necessary steps to hold the election of 1892 for state senators and representatives under the Apportionment Act of 1879, rather than that of 1891. Reversed.

The law with us must conform in the first place to the Constitution of the United States, and then to the subordinate Constitution of the particular state, and if it infringes upon the provisions of either, it is so far void. By the course of judicial decisions reaching from the earliest history of the American government to the present day it has been adjudged that courts of justice have the right and are in duty bound to test every law by the Constitution, as the fundamental and paramount law of the land, governing all derivative power and the 13 L. R. A.

exercise thereof. The judicial department with us has the proper power under the Constitution to declare the constitutionality of a law, and every Act of the Legislature contrary to the true intent and meaning of the Constitution will be declared by the courts null and void and of no effect whatever.

Houston v. Moore, 18 U. S. 5 Wheat. 1, 5 L. ed. 19; Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. pp. 93, 94; Wolcott v. Wigton, 7 Ind. 44.

What is called the discretion of the Legislature is the same thing, whether the laws it enacts deal with what are called political questions or questions not so denominated. The distinction between mandatory and directory statutes is well stated by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in State v. Lean, 9 Wis. 279.

The court says "that where there is no substantial reason why the thing to be done might not as well be done after the time prescribed as before—no presumption that by allowing it to be so done it may work an injury or wrong—nothing in the act itself, or in other acts relating to the same subject-matter, indicating that the Legislature did not intend that it should rather be done after the time prescribed, than not to be done at all; there the courts assume that the intent was that if not done within the time prescribed it might be done afterwards. But, when any of these reasons intervene, there the limit is established."

The Supreme Court of Maine, dealing with a question similar to the one now in hand, and answering questions propounded by the Senate clearly define the limits of legislative discretion in apportioning members of the General Assembly according to population. In the able opinion of Shepley, J., is found the following language: "Again, the Constitution requires that the senators 'shall be apportioned according to the number of inhabitants,' and it may not in all cases be possible exactly to conform to this rule . . . and here, also, it may be said there must exist a discretion to be exercised by the Legislature making an apportionment. That power which a legislative body is compelled to exercise by such a moral necessity, cannot properly be considered as discretionary. If, however, it be so designated, it is a discretion like that last named, limited in the same manner and not subject to be abused. There can be no warrant for the exercise of this kind of discretion, if it may be so called, beyond what is required by the case to be provided for. If the Legislature has any other discretion, it is necessarily an unlimited one in practice, however it may be attempted to limit it in theory, and the provisions of the Constitution relating to this matter must become in practice merely directory. And an apportionment must then be considered as constitutional, although the county lines should be wholly disregarded, and the number of inhabitants required to elect a senator should be very unequal. It is not intended to intimate that any one contends for a construction that would knowingly authorize such results; but it is believed that such is the legitimate and practical tendency of admitting any other discretion than that which arises out of an absolute moral necessity. Any other discretion would in effect repeal or annihilate that clause in the Constitution which prescribes the rule for an apportionment, and would therefore violate one of the fundamental rules of interpretation, that effect is to be given to all the language if it be possible. And without permitting that clause to have effect upon the legislation, the Constitution would no longer secure the same rights that are now believed to be secured; nor would it practically be the same instrument of government." Opinions of Justices, 18 Me. 472, 473.

The doctrine of these cases finds no stronger support anywhere than in the decisions of the Supreme Court of Indiana.

Quinn v. State, 35 Ind. 485; Williams v. Stein, 33 Ind. 89, 10 Am. Rep. 97; Feideman v. State, 98 Ind. 516; State v. Denny, 4 L. R. A. 79, 118 Ind. 893; Branville v. State, 4 L. R. A. 98, 118 Ind. 426; State v. Blend, 121 Ind. 514; Morris v. Powell, 9 L. R. A. 326, 125 Ind. 281.

The courts are the only tribunals that can finally determine the constitutionality of such laws as those we are now considering, and their power to do so is precisely the same as in the case of other laws. Such laws affect the fundamental principles and organization of our government, and it was clearly intended that the power to enact them should be limited and restrained by the organic law of the state. The authority and convincing reasoning of the cases to which we have referred is not shaken by the case of Wiss v. Bigger, 79 Va. 26.

Nor is the doctrine for which we contend at all assailed by the case of State v. Campbell, 48 Ohio St. 435.

This latter case is really an authority for the proposition for which we contend.

State v. Francis, 26 Kan. 724.

The principles settled by the adjudications to which we have referred have recently been directly applied to cases of the precise character of the one in hand.

State v. Cunningham, 15 L. R. A. 561, 81 Wis. 440; Giddings v. Blacker (Mich.) 16 L. R. A. 402; Houghton County v. Blacker (Mich.) 16 L. R. A. 432.

The Acts of 1885 and 1891, which we have been considering, being unconstitutional and void, the Apportionment Law of 1879 is in force. An unconstitutional law containing a repealing clause does not repeal former laws mentioned in such repealing clause, or laws that would be repealed by implication if the unconstitutional legislation was valid.

State v. Blend, 121 Ind. 514.

Mr. Alonzo G. Smith, Atty-Gen., filed a brief on behalf of the State.

Coffey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action by the state of Indiana, on the relation of Simon T. Powell, a legal voter of Henry county, against the appellants, Benjamin S. Parker, as clerk of the circuit court of that county, William Reinwalt, as sheriff, and Richmond Wischart, as auditor, to compel them by writ of mandamus, as such officers, to take the necessary steps to hold the election of 1892 for senators and representatives under the Act of the General Assembly for the apportionment of senators and representatives approved March 8, 1879, and to enjoin them from proceeding under the Act of the General Assembly for the apportionment of senators and representatives passed, notwithstanding the governor's veto, March 5, 1891. It is alleged that the appellants, as such officers, are threatening and are about to issue and give the necessary notices and take the necessary steps to hold the election of November, 1892, for senators and representatives under the apportionment made by the latter Act, claiming and asserting that the first-named Act was repealed by the Act of the General Assembly of the state for the apportionment of senators and representatives approved March 6, 1885. It is alleged that the Act of March 6, 1885, as well as the Act of March 5, 1891, is void, being in conflict with the Constitution of the state. The matters wherein each of these acts are supposed to be in conflict with the Constitution are fully and minutely set forth in the complaint. As to the Act of March 5, 1891, it is alleged that in the year 1889—the year prescribed by the Constitution therefor—an enumeration of all the male inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years in the state was taken under the authority and by the direction of the General Assembly, as required by the Constitution, which enumeration showed the number of male inhabitants in each township and county, as well as the total number in the state, over twenty-one years of age. The complaint then sets out the enumeration by counties, showing the total number to be 551,048. It is alleged that it was provided by the Act of March 5, 1891, that the General Assembly of the state should consist of fifty senators and 100 representatives, and that it became the duty of the then sitting General Assembly, under the Constitution of the state, to apportion the number of senators and representatives to the ensuing General Assembly, based upon the enumeration of the year 1889, so that each senatorial district should contain 11,025 male inhabitants above the age of twenty-one years, as nearly as reasonably possible, and that each representative district should contain 5,510 male inhabitants above the age of twenty-one years, as nearly as reasonably possible. The complaint sets out the apportionment for senatorial and representative purposes as fixed by the Act of March 5, 1891, together with the number of male inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years in each district, as shown by the enumeration of 1889. It is then alleged that by this Act forty-three counties are formed into twenty-two districts, to each of which one senator is apportioned. Eleven of these districts, composed of twenty-three counties, contain, by the enumeration of 1889, 148,496 male inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years, while the other eleven of said districts, composed of twenty counties, contain only 99,609 such inhabitants. That no other senatorial representation is given by the Act to any of the counties contained in the first-mentioned eleven districts, and by such apportionment the senatorial representation of 27,276 male inhabitants over twenty-one years of age of said districts, being two senators, with a fraction over of 5,236, is wrongfully denied to the counties contained in said districts and given to the counties contained in the other eleven, whereby their representation, which of right should be but nine senators, is increased to eleven, and the representation of the counties contained in the first-mentioned eleven districts is reduced to eleven, when of right it should be thirteen. That the county of Brown, which, by the enumeration of 1889, contained only 2,832 male inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years, is placed in two senatorial districts, namely, one composed of the counties of Brown, Monroe, and Bartholomew, and one composed of the counties of Brown, Morgan, and Johnson; while the county of Clark, which, by the enumeration, contains only 7,804 male inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years, is also placed in two senatorial districts, namely, one composed of the counties of Clark, Scott, and Jennings, and one composed of the counties of Clark and Jefferson, whereby each of said counties of Brown and Clark is given senatorial representation greatly in excess of that to which they are entitled. It is further alleged that under the enumeration of 1889 Jay county was shown to have 5,823 male inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years, being 315 more than the representative unit, and that by the Act of March 5, 1891, it was denied a representative, and was united with the counties of Adams and Blackford for the election of one joint representative, such district having an excess over the unit of representation of 2,007, and with said county of Adams for the election of one other joint representative, such district having an excess over the unit of representation of 5,077. That by the Act of March 5, 1891, sixty-one counties are formed into forty representative districts, to each of which one representative is apportioned. These districts, so far as composed of counties entitled to any representation thereiz, are made up of counties otherwise wholly unrepresented in the apportionment for representation, and counties having an excess over the unit of representation, which excess is otherwise unrepresented, and is alone represented in said districts. Twenty of said districts, composed of thirty-one counties, contain, as shown by the enumeration of 1889, 199,955 male inhabitants over the age for twenty-one years who have no representation for representatives in the General Assembly under this Act except the twenty representatives apportioned to said districts; while the other twenty of said districts composed of thirty counties, contain, as shown by the enumeration, only 85,764 such inhabitants, otherwise unrepresented, by reason of which apportionment 29,755 male inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years in said first-mentioned districts, who are entitled to five representatives, with a fraction over of 2,205 of the representative unit, are entirely deprived of such representation, and four of such representatives are given, without right, to the second-mentioned districts, whereby their representation is increased to twenty, when of right it should be only fifteen, and that of the first-mentioned districts is reduced to twenty, when of right it should be twenty-five. These several districts and the counties of which they are composed together with the number of male inhabitants in each, as shown by the enumeration of 1889, are set out in detail. It is then alleged that included in the second-mentioned districts are nine counties, each of which is given a separate representative, although each of said counties lacks more than 1,000 of possessing the unit of representation under the enumeration of 1889, while Jay county, with 315 in excess of such unit, is denied separate representation. That five counties are each given a separate representative independent of the districts above mentioned, while each of said counties lacks the unit of representation as follows: Tipton, lacking 1,125; Harrison, 613; Putnam, 17; Ripley, 637; and Franklin, 819,—are each again represented in four of said mentioned twenty districts. Said Tipton county is in the district composed of the counties of Clinton, Tipton, and Madison; Harrison county in the district composed of the counties of Floyd, Harrison, and Crawford; Putnam county in the district composed of the counties of Putnam, Clay, and Montgomery; in which districts said counties respectively serve the purpose of making the other counties in said districts contiguous, which otherwise they would not be; and that said Ripley and Franklin counties are represented in the district composed of the counties of Ripley, Franklin, and Union. The complaint also contains allegations in relation to the Act approved March 6, 1885, similar in character to those set out above; but, in view of the conclusion we have reached in this case, we deem it unnecessary to set them out in this opinion. Prayer for an alternative writ of mandamus requiring the appellants to show cause why they should not proceed to hold the election for senators and representatives at the election to be held on the 8th day of November, 1892, under the apportionment as fixed by the Act of 1879, and that they be enjoined from proceeding under the Act of 1891, or the Act of 1885. Upon this complaint the court issued the alternative writ as prayed, to which writ the court overruled a demurrer interposed by the appellants, to which they excepted, and, failing and refusing to answer or plead further, a peremptory writ was ordered, and a decree entered enjoining the appellants from proceeding under either the Act of 1885 or the Act of 1891, above referred to.

The only causes of demurrer which need be considered in this opinion are two, namely: First, that the court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action; second, that the facts stated in the alternative writ of mandamus, and the complaint filed in the cause, are not sufficient to constitute a cause of action. It is not claimed that the circuit court has no jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus and to grant injunctions in all proper cases, nor is it claimed that this suit was not properly brought by the state on the relation of Powell against the appellants, but the contention is that the suit involves a political question, over which the courts have no jurisdiction. If this contention can be sustained, that is the end of the controversy, for this court will not attempt an adjudication in a matter over which it has no jurisdiction. A political question is one over which the courts decline to take cognizance, in view of the line of demarkation between the judicial branch of the government on the one hand and the executive and legislative branches on the other. Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, title, Political Questions. Such questions most generally arise when there is an attempt made to prevent the incumbents of either the legislative or executive department of the government from the performance of some act which such incumbent claims the right to perform by virtue of his office, or to compel him to perform some act which he declines or refuses to perform. Many illustrations of the rules by which such questions are governed are to be found in the adjudicated cases, among which are the cases of Mississippi v. Johnson, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 475, 18 L. ed. 437; Georgia v. Stanton, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 50, 18 L. ed. 721; and Marbury v. Madison, 5 U. S. 1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. ed. 60, cited by the appellants. In the latter case, John Adams, as president of the United States, in the last days of his administration, appointed Marbury to an office, and caused his commission to be made out, signed, sealed, and authenticated by the secretary of state, but the same had not been delivered when the administration expired. The new secretary, upon taking his office, refused to deliver the commission. Marbury thereupon applied to the Supreme Court of the United States for a mandamus to compel such delivery, and in argument it was contended on behalf of the defendant that the question presented was a political matter, for the sole determination of the president and his secretary, and in no sense a judicial question. It was declared by Chief Justice Marshall, in an elaborate opinion covering the whole ground, that the case presented a judicial, and not a political, question. The case of Mississippi v. Johnson, supra, was an effort on behalf of the state of Mississippi to enjoin Andrew Johnson, as president of the United States, and his officers and agents, appointed for the purpose, and especially E. O. C. Ord, assigned as military commander of the district of which that state constituted a part, from executing or in any manner carrying out two Acts of Congress, known as the "Reconstruction Acts," upon the ground that such Acts were unconstitutional. It was held that the bill tendered for that purpose presented a political question only, of which the court declined to assume jurisdiction; but the chief justice, in the course of the opinion delivered by him in the case, took occasion to remark that "the Congress is the legislative department of the government; the president the executive department. Neither can be restrained in its action by the judicial department, though the acts of both, when performed, are, in proper cases, the subject of its cognizance." The case of Georgia v. Stanton, supra, was an action on behalf of that state to enjoin Stanton, as secretary of war, Grant, as general of the army, and Pope, major general, assigned to the third military district, consisting of the state of Georgia and other states, from carrying into effect the same Acts of Congress involved in the case of Mississippi v. Johnson. It was again held that the bill presented a political question only of which the courts could not assume jurisdiction. But in cases like the one now under consideration, where there is no effort to control in any manner the action of either of the other departments of the government, and where it is sought simply to determine the validity of an Act of the legislative department the decided weight of authority is, we think, to the effect that the question presented is not political, but judicial, and that the courts have jurisdiction. This question has been so fully discussed and decided by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in the recent case of State v. Cunningham (Wis.) 17 L. R. A. 145; in the case of State v. Cunningham, 81 Wis. 440, 15 L. R. A. 561; and in the case of Giddings v. Blacker (Mich.) 16 L. R. A. 402,—that it would seem unnecessary to review it. It was determined in these several cases, which were all actions calling in question the validity of Apportionment Acts, that the question presented was a judicial question, of which the courts had jurisdiction, and such Acts were adjudged by the court to be invalid by reason of being in conflict with the Constitutions under which the Legislature attempted to apportion the state for legislative purposes. In holding that the court had jurisdiction, the courts did nothing more than follow a long line of precedents to their logical results, as shown by the authorities cited in support of their opinions. It has always been held by this court that it is its bounden duty, in all proper cases, to pass upon the validity of the Acts of the General Assembly, and to declare them void when in conflict with the Constitution of the state. Thus, as early as the case of Rice v. State, 7 Ind. 834, Justice Perkins said: "There are some propositions that may be regarded, we think, at this date, as being settled. Among them are these: That the Constitution of the state, relative to the Acts of the Legislature, is the paramount or supreme law. That, when the two conflict, the Acts of the Legislature must yield as utterly void. That it is the duty of the courts in every case arising before them for decision, to decide and declare the law governing the case. The duty of the courts to give construction to laws and to declare void or disregard, because not laws, those legislative Acts in conflict with the Constitution, grows, of necessity, out of the other duty of declaring what the law is." To the same effect are Campbell v. Driggins, 88 Ind. 473, and Cooley Const. Lim. 45.

It is conceded, however, by the appellants as we understand them that there might arise a case in which the courts would have jurisdiction to declare a law apportioning the state for legislative purposes void, ss, where the General Assembly should form districts of counties not contiguous. If the courts have jurisdiction to declare an Apportionment Act void because it violates one provision of the Constitution, we are unable to perceive why they have not such jurisdiction where it violates some other provision. The Constitution forbids the formation of senatorial or representative districts of counties not contiguous. It is conceded that an Act which violates this provision would be declared void for that reason, and that the courts would have jurisdiction, in a proper case, to adjudicate the matter. If the General Assembly should district the state in such a manner as to apportion to the south half ninety representatives and to the north half ten only, no one would doubt that this would be as plain a violation of the Constitution as where it forms districts of counties not contiguous. What good reason can be given for holding that the courts may take jurisdiction in the one case and denying such jurisdiction in the other? It will not do to say that the courts have no jurisdiction in the latter case because the General Assembly has a discretion in the matter of districting the state, for it cannot be successfully maintained that the incumbents of any department of the government have a discretion to disregard the Constitution of the state. We think if the courts have jurisdiction in the one case they also have it in the other. We do not mean by this to be understood as holding that the courts have the power to interfere in any matter confided to the discretion of either the legislative or executive departments of the government. No court in the Union has maintained more vigorously than this the independence of the three several departments of the state government. State v. Noble, 118 Ind. 850, 4 L. R. A. 101; Hovey v. State, 127 Ind. 588, 11 L. R. A. 763. But it is safe to say that, where the act of either of the three departments is in violation of the Constitution of the state, such act is not within the discretion confided to that department. That the General Assembly has some discretion in the matter of districting the state for legislative purposes there can be no doubt, and there can be as little doubt that, where it acts within this discretion, the courts have no power to interfere. If it should be found, upon examination, that the several Acts of the General Assembly of which complaint is made in this action are within the discretion confided to the legislative department of the state, that will be the end of this investigation; for we have no power, much less the inclination, to interfere with such discretion. Nor are we able to perceive how such cases as that of Smith v. Myers, 109 Ind. 1, and Hovey v. State, 127 Ind. 588, 11 L. R. A. 763, can affect the question now under consideration. If this were a case in which the appellee sought to compel the General Assembly to district the state in a particular manner, or even to act at all in any manner whatever, then this line of authorities would be applicable, and by reason of the independence of the several departments of the state government we would hold without hesitation that we had no jurisdiction over the matter. The courts have no power to district the state for legislative purposes. That duty belongs to another department. The most the courts can do is, in a proper case, to pass upon the validity of a law enacted for that purpose, and, if such law is found to be in conflict with the Constitution of the state, declare it invalid, leaving the Legislature free to enact one that does conform to the Constitution. This is quite a different thing, we think, from undertaking to control legislative action or discretion. Our opinion is that the question presented by the record in this case is judicial, and not political. The case of People v. Rice (N. Y.) 16 L. R. A. 886, recently decided by the Court of Appeals of the state of New York, was an action brought to test the constitutionality of an Act of the General Assembly of that state dividing it into districts for senatorial and representative purposes. The court assumed that the questions presented were judicial, and not political, and proceeded to adjudicate upon the validity of the law. The conclusion at which we have arrived in this case is in accord with all the authority to which our attention has been called, except the case of Wise v. Biggs, 79 Va. 269, in which the validity of an Act of the General Assembly of that state, creating districts for representatives in Congress was called in question. All that was said by the learned judge who wrote the opinion in that case at all pertinent to the question involved in this case was that "the laying off and defining of the congressional districts is the exercise of a political and discretionary power of the Legislature, for which they are amenable to the people, whose representatives they are." This would be literally true in the absence of some constitutional provision requiring the districts to be formed in some particular manner. The opinion cites no authority to the rule thus announced, nor does the judge who delivered it give any argument in its support; but, if it is to be construed as holding that all Apportionment Acts are but the exercise of a political or discretionary power, it is in conflict with the great weight of authority, and cannot be followed.

We approach the other questions in the case with much reluctance, and with a full sense of their gravity. Courts always approach questions involving the validity of statutes reluctantly, and out of this reluctance have grown two well-known rules: First, that the court will never decide a question involving the constitutionality of a statute if the merits of the case in which it is involved can be determined without such decision; and, second, the court will never declare a statute unconstitutional where there is any doubt upon the subject. To doubt the validity of a statute is to resolve in favor of its constitutionality. Warren v. Britton, 84 Ind. 14; Campbell v. Dwiggin, 88 Ind. 473; Mays v. Tippy, 91 Ind. 102. The chief object of this suit is to secure a decision upon the question of the constitutionality of the several Acts of the General Assembly referred to in the complaint. The question is presented in the same manner as the question was presented in the case of Giddings v. Blacker, supra, and in the case of People v. Rice, supra. The case of Giddings v. Blacker, was an action to enjoin the secretary of state of the state of Michigan from taking the necessary steps to hold an election for state senators under an Apportionment Act approved in the year 1891, upon the ground that such Act was unconstitutional, and to compel him by mandamus to proceed under an Apportionment Act approved in the year 1885. The case of People v. Rice, was an action to enjoin the proper officers of the state of New York from proceeding to the election of senators and representatives under an Apportionment Act approved in the year 1892, upon the ground that such Apportionment Act was unconstitutional, and to compel them by mandamus to proceed to such election under an Apportionment Act approved in the year 1879. In each of these cases it seems not to have been doubted that the question of the validity of these several Acts was presented in such a form as to require a decision upon that point. So in this case we are unable to perceive how the merits of the controversy are to be determined without a decision upon the question of the validity of the Apportionment Law of this state passed in the year 1891. Should we reach the conclusion that this Act is not unconstitutional, it will not be necessary to pass upon the validity of the other Acts; but should we decide it invalid, then, in determining whether the appellee was entitled to the relief demanded, it would become necessary to pass upon the validity of the Act of 1879; and, if that is found valid, the question of the constitutionality of the Act of 1885 arises. If the Act of 1891 and the Act of 1879 are both unconstitutional, the appellee was not entitled to the relief sought, and the question of the validity of Act of 1885 is not involved in such a way as to require a decision upon the question of its constitutionality. Assuming, therefore, that the question is presented in such a manner as to require a decision, we proceed to an examination into the several provisions of what is known as the "Apportionment Act of 1891," and to a comparison of such provisions with the sections of our state Constitution with which it is claimed they conflict. Before such comparison can be had it is necessary to set out and analyze the provisions of the Constitution upon the subject of apportioning the state for legislative purposes.

Section 2, art. 4, provides that the Senate shall not exceed fifty, nor the House of Representatives 100, members, and that they shall be chosen by the electors of the respective counties or district into which the state may from time to time be divided. Section 4 of the same article provides that the General Assembly shall, at its second session after the adoption of the Constitution, and every six years thereafter, cause an enumeration to be made of all the male inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years. Section 5 provides that the number of senators and representatives shall, at the session next following each period of making such enumeration be fixed by law, and apportioned among the several counties according to the number of male inhabitants above twenty-one years of age in each, provided that the first and second elections of members of the General Assembly under the Constitution shall be according to the apportionment last made by the General Assembly before the adoption of this Constitution. Section 6 provides that "a senatorial or representative district, where more than one county shall constitute a district, shall be composed of contiguous counties; and no county, for senatorial apportionment, shall ever be divided." We think it was the intention of the constitutional convention to secure to the electors of the state, by the provision above referred to, an equal voice, as nearly as possible, in the selection of those who should make the laws by which they were to be governed. The General Assembly has no discretion, in our opinion, to make an apportionment in disregard of the enumeration provided for by the Constitution. The enumeration required is not of the citizens generally, but of the inhabitants authorized to vote; and, unless the General Assembly is to be governed by the enumeration, when made, in the matter of districting the state for legislative purposes, the enumeration is a useless ceremony, and an unnecessary expense. The purpose in requiring the enumeration is to fix the number of voters in each county at the time the apportionment is made, in order that the Legislature may form districts so as to secure to each voter, as nearly as may be, an equal voice with every other voter in the state in the selection of senators and representatives. The cardinal principle of free representative government, that the electors shall have equal weight in exercising the right of suffrage, is recognized and secured. Representation according to the population is the rule fixed by these several provisions of our Constitution, and the General Assembly has no more discretion, in our opinion, to disregard this rule, than it has to disregard any other plain provision found in that instrument. The enumeration at the short period of six years was intended to secure a readjustment and correction of the inequalities that might arise from the growth and shifting of the population within that period. In argument it seems to be agreed that it was the intention to provide that in making an apportionment among the several counties for legislative purposes the integrity of the counties, when possible, should be preserved. This we think, is true, and when that is done it is plain that exact equality cannot be secured. But because exact equality is not possible the General Assembly is not excused from making such an apportionment as will approximate that equality required by the organic law of the state. A question somewhat similar to the one now under discussion arose in the Congress of the United States in the year 1832, relative to the construction to be placed upon section 2, art. 1, of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several states which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers," etc. The committee to whom was referred the question as to what the constitutional method of apportioning unassigned representatives as between the states having fractions of population less than a full ratio was of the unanimous opinion that the loss of members arising from the residuary numbers should be made by assigning as many additional members as are necessary for that purpose to the states having the largest fractional remainders. Upon that occasion Mr. Webster said: "The Constitution, therefore, must be understood not as enjoining an absolute relative equality, because that would be demanding an impossibility, but as requiring Congress to make an apportionment of representatives among the several states according to their respective numbers, as nearly as may be. That which cannot be done perfectly must be done in a manner as near perfection as can be. If exactness cannot, from the nature of things, be attained then the nearest practicable approach to exactness ought to be made. Congress is not absolved from all rule merely because the rule of perfect justice cannot be applied. In such a case, approximation becomes a rule. It takes the place of the other rule, which would be preferable, but which is found inapplicable, and becomes itself an obligation of binding force. The nearest approximation to exact truth or exact right, when that exact truth or exact right cannot be reached, prevails in other cases, not as matter of discretion, but as an intelligible and definite rule, dictated by justice, and conforming to the common sense of mankind; a rule of no less binding force in cases to which it is applicable, and no more to be departed from, than any other rule." The rule recommended by this committee was subsequently adopted by Congress, so that representatives are now apportioned among the several states of the Union under it as a fixed and binding obligation. The rule here announced is, we think, the true one. When it is found that exact equality cannot be attained, where the integrity of the counties is preserved, approximation becomes a rule as binding upon the General Assembly as any other rule fixed by the Constitution. It is said, however, that as to the fractions of the representative unit the Constitution is silent, and that, therefore, the General Assembly has a discretion to provide for the representation of such fractions, or to leave them unrepresented. That is true in a limited sense only. The Constitution requires that the state shall be reapportioned every six years according to the male inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years in each county. It contemplates the formation of districts, each embracing, as nearly as possible, an equal number of the electors of the state. But the rule requiring an approximation to equality forbids the formation of districts containing large fractions unrepresented, where it is possible to avoid it, while other districts are largely overrepresented. That the General Assembly has much discretion in the disposition of the fractions of the unit of representation cannot be doubted, but it is not a discretion beyond control. In so far as the Constitution secures equality in representation, it is not silent as to the disposition of fractions, and the Legislature must dispose of them with a view of securing that end; otherwise an apportionment could be made which would give to one portion of the state nearly double the representation given to other portions. Constitutional provisions are seldom, if ever, to be construed as merely directory. It may be that a General Assembly could make a valid apportionment when none existed at a time different from that fixed in the Constitution, for the reason, as held in the case of People v. Rice, supra, that there is a continuing obligation resting upon it to do so; but, however this may be, we have no doubt that our constitutional provisions relating to the manner of making an apportionment of the state for legislative purposes are mandatory. Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 98.

With these constitutional rules constantly in mind we proceed to test the Act of the Legislature under immediate consideration by them, with a view of determining its constitutionality. It is alleged in the complaint, and admitted to be true by the demurrer, that under the apportionment for legislative purposes as fixed by this Act forty-three counties of the state are formed into twenty-two districts, to each of which one senator is apportioned. Eleven of these districts, composed of twenty-three counties, contain, by the enumeration of 1889, 148,496 male inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years, while the other eleven composed of twenty counties, contain only 99,609 such inhabitants. It is thus shown that in a voting population of 248,105 there is a difference in favor of eleven districts as against the other eleven named of 48,887. We must take notice of the geography of the state, as well as of the enumeration of 1889, taken pursuant to law; and with such notice we doubt whether any one can be found so bold as to maintain that this apportionment approximates equality, or that equality cannot be much more nearly attained. It further appears that the counties of Brown and Clark are each contained in two separate senatorial districts. Brown county is in the senatorial district composed of the counties of Brown, Monroe, and Bartholomew. It is also in the senatorial district composed of the counties of Brown, Morgan and Johnson. Clark county is in the senatorial district composed of the counties of Clark, Scott, and Jennings. It is also in the senatorial district composed of the counties of Clark and Jefferson. The number of male inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years in Brown county, as shown by the enumeration of 1889, is only 2,832, while the number of such inhabitants in Clark county, as shown by the same enumeration, is only 7,304. The senatorial unit or number required to entitle a district to one senator, under this law, is 11,020.

Brown county, under the apportionment as fixed by this law, with a voting population of 8,688 less than the senatorial unit, votes for two senators; while Clark county, with a voting population of 8,716 less than the unit, does the same thing. Many other counties in the state, with four times the voting population contained in Brown county, vote for one only. In our opinion, under the constitutional provisions above referred to, requiring equality in representation, no scheme for senatorial districts could be devised in which a county with a population no larger than contained in Brown county could legally be entitled to vote for two senators. When a county of that size has been assigned to a senatorial district, and given a voice in the election of one senator, it ceases, in our opinion, to be a factor in any legitimate scheme of apportionment for senatorial purposes. At the time our Constitution was formed the convention had before it the history of the famous Apportioning Law of Massachusetts, passed on the 11th day of February, 1812, from which the word "gerrymander" originated. It is fair to presume that they had learned of the evils resulting from such a law, and that "the death and burial of this monster in the year of 1814 was celebrated throughout the country in prose and verse."

By the provisions of our Constitution prohibiting the division of counties in the formation of senatorial districts, and requiring equality in representation, it is plain, we think, that the convention intended to put it beyond the power of the General Assembly to form districts upon the principle contained in the Massachusetts law. The two senatorial districts of which Brown county forms a part are constructed upon the same principle as the Apportionment Law above mentioned, with the single exception that the integrity of counties is preserved. If Brown county, with its small population, may be included in two senatorial districts, it may be included in four, and thus given a voice in the selection of four senators. The same is true of Clark county. With a large number of other counties in the state, containing much larger population restricted to a vote for one senator only, this cannot be said to be equality. The counties of Brown and Clark are entitled to an equal voice in the selection of senators, considering their population, with other counties in the state, and no more. So much of the Act as gives to each of these two counties a voice in two separate senatorial districts is, in our opinion, in plain violation of the provisions of our Constitution. Under this law, the unit for a representative is 5,510. Jay county, as shown by the enumeration of 1889, has 5,823 male inhabitants over the age of twenty-one years. It is denied a separate representative. As we have seen, it is agreed in argument that the constitutional provisions above set out were intended to secure the integrity of the counties. Jay county, having more than the representative unit was, we think, entitled to a separate representative, and it was not within the power of the General Assembly to deprive it of such representative. This would seem too plain for argument. The three representative districts composed respectively of the counties of Clinton, Tipton, and Madison, the counties of Floyd, Harrison, and Crawford, and of the counties of Putnam, Clay, and Montgomery, cannot be sustained. Each of the counties of Tipton, Harrison, and Putnam has less than the unit of representation, and each is given a separate representative. They were not entitled to further consideration or representation. The formation of these districts was an attempt to do indirectly that which could not be done directly, namely, form districts of counties not contiguous. By the same process, if it were permissible, the county of Marion could be made contiguous to the county of Vanderburgh, and that, too, notwithstanding every county intervening between the two is fully represented. Counties fully represented cannot, in our opinion, be used for the purpose of joining counties which are not otherwise contiguous. There are found in this Act many other violations of the rule of equality in representation as fixed by the Constitution, especially in the formation of representative districts, but we deem it unnecessary to extend this opinion by setting them out. We have been asked to examine and compare the Act now under consideration with other Acts of the General Assembly dividing the state into districts for legislative purposes, which we have cheerfully done. Such examination only serves to confirm a well-known historical fact; that is, that as each party succeeded to power in the state it endeavored to so district it for legislative purposes as to retain that power, and that, too, very often in total disregard of the Constitution of the state, demanding equality in representation. The rule of practical construction is of no value when it is plain that the practice has been in open violation of the instrument which the court is called upon to construe.

Our conclusion is that the Act of the General Assembly passed on the 5th day of March, 1891, notwithstanding the governor's veto, purporting to redistrict the state for legislative purposes, is in conflict with the Constitution of the state, and for that reason is void. Nor do we apprehend that from this conclusion the disastrous consequences predicated in argument will follow. The office of senator, as well as the office of representative, is not a statutory office, but an office created by the Constitution of the state. It is true that the number is fixed by Act of General Assembly, but this is also true of the circuit judges in the state. This fact does not change the nature of the office, and it is, for this reason, none the less a constitutional office. It seems to be well settled that, where one is elected or appointed to an office under an unconstitutional statute, before it is adjudged to be so, he is an officer de facto. Throop, Pub. Off. §§ 628-637; Mechem, Pub. Off. § 818; State v. Carroll, 38 Conn. 449, 9 Am. Rep. 409; Brown v. O'Connell, 36 Conn. 432, 4 Am. Rep. 89; Meagher v. Storey Co. 5 Nev. 244; Ex parte Strang, 21 Ohio St. 610; Com. v. McCombe, 56 Pa. 436; State v. Bloom, 17 Wis. 521; Kirker v. Cincinnati, 48 Ohio St. 507.

The rule that the acts of an officer de facto, performed before ouster, are, as to the public, as valid as the acts of an officer de jure, is too familiar to the profession to need the citation of authority. The public is not to suffer because those discharging the functions of an officer may have a defective title, or no title at all. Case v. State, 69 Ind. 46; Blackman v. State, 12 Ind. 556; Bansmer v. Mace, 18 Ind. 27, 81 Am. Dec. 344; Mowbray v. State, 88 Ind. 824. If at the next ensuing election the state is without a valid law creating senatorial and representative districts under the enumeration of 1889, the responsibility must rest with the legislative, and not with the judicial, department of state government. The Apportionment Act of 1879 requires separate consideration, for the reason that its provisions are, in many respects, quite different from the Act of 1891. While it differs materially from the latter in many respects, an examination will disclose the fact that it disregards, unnecessarily, the principle of equality in representation required by our Constitution. It is subject to many of the constitutional objections urged against the Act of 1891, but, as it is not at all likely there will ever be another effort to enforce it, no useful purpose would be subserved by setting them out in detail. It is sufficient to say that, in our opinion, the Act of 1879 is void for the same reason given as to the invalidity of the Act of 1891. The complaint in this case proceeds upon the theory that the appellee is entitled to have senators and representatives elected under the Act of 1879. He must succeed upon this theory, if he succeeds at all. Indianapolis First Bank v. Root, 107 Ind. 224; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Young, 93 Ind. 118; Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Bills, 104 Ind. 18. The demurrer filed by the appellants necessarily calls in question his right to the relief sought. As the Act of 1879 is unconstitutional, the appellee was not entitled to the relief he sought in this action, and for that reason the court erred, we think, in overruling the demurrer filed by the appellants. This being true, the Apportionment Law of 1885 is not in question in such a manner as to require a decision as to whether it is valid or invalid. The court being able to decide the case upon its merits without a consideration of the Act of 1885, the rule that the courts will not consider a question of the constitutionality of the statute except when it is necessary to a decision of the cause under consideration applies in this case with all its force. The Apportionment Law of 1885, under which the intervenor, Chandler, was elected as a member of the state Senate, not being involved in this suit, he has no personal interest in this controversy. The adjudication in this case can in no wise affect his right to hold the office to which he was elected.

For the error of the court in overruling the demurrer of the appellants to the alternative writ of mandate, the judgment of the Henry circuit court must be reversed.

Judgment reversed, with directions to the circuit court to sustain the demurrer of the appellants to the alternative writ of mandate.

Elliott, J.:

In much of the reasoning of the principal opinion I unreservedly concur, and to many of the propositions unqualifiedly assent, but from so much of the opinion as proceeds upon the theory that questions, as to the construction of the constitutional provisions relative to the apportionment of the state for legislative purposes, and as to the validity of the Act of 1891, are properly before us, I am compelled to dissent. It is proper to say at the outset that I neither affirm nor deny the correctness of the construction placed upon the Constitution, nor do I either affirm or deny the validity of the conclusion that the Act of 1891 violates the provisions of that instrument. I simply affirm that long-settled principles forbid us from giving judgment upon such questions. It is my purpose to state and develop, as briefly as the nature of the questions which I conceive are properly before us will permit, the reasons which control my judgment, using only such authorities as are near at hand, and not attempting to elaborate the propositions I state by extended argument or illustration.

1. The relator's complaint rests entirely upon the theory that the Act of 1879 is valid; but, if he is right in the grounds upon which he assails the subsequent Acts, that Act is as bad as any of the others; hence he has no standing in court, as he himself makes evident; and when we have adjudged that he has no standing in court, we have decided all questions properly in the case, except jurisdictional ones, so that we cannot properly or authoritatively give judgment upon the validity of subsequent legislative enactments. The relator is involved in a fatal dilemma. If the Acts of 1885 and 1891 are valid, he can have no relief; if they are void, so, also, is that of 1879; so that, whether the Acts of 1885 and 1891 are valid or void, he can have no relief, and in either event he must utterly fail. The Act of 1879 being void, according to the relator's own theory, he has, as he himself demonstrates, no fulcrum capable of supporting a lever for the overthrow of subsequent legislative enactments, and hence all that we can decide beyond jurisdictional questions, without transgressing settled principles, is that, by his own averments, his case is foundationless. Such a decision ends the case, and we cannot with propriety consider other questions, except jurisdictional ones, and certainly not high and grave constitutional questions. If the system which the relator avers is in conflict with the Constitution is to be smitten to its death by the courts, it must be at the suit of one who assails all the legislative Acts founded on that system, for it cannot be done at the suit of a party who demands that one of the Acts resting on that system be upheld and the others destroyed. The relator is the actor, and is bound to make a case rendering it imperatively necessary to decide the constitutional questions he assumes to present, and he must succeed upon the strength of his own case or fail, for he cannot succeed upon the weakness of his adversary's. The Act of 1879, is, according to his own theory, as full of evil as those he assaults, so that, if one goes down, so must all; and with the fall of the Act of 1879 ends the relator's case. It would be strange, indeed, if one of several Acts resting upon the same system should be upheld and the others cast down; and stranger still if that should be done where the one rescued from condemnation contains more of evil than those condemned. One who secures or demands a benefit under an unconstitutional Act is estopped to assert its invalidity. Daniels v. Tearney, 102 U. S. 415, 26 L. ed. 187. See also authorities collected in Elliott, Roads & Streets, note 2, p. 422. "Like reason doth make like law," and the reason of the cases referred to warrants the conclusion that the relator cannot be heard to deny the validity of the Acts of 1885 and 1891, while demanding relief upon an earlier Act, subject to the same objections as the Acts he seeks to have overthrown. It cannot be necessary to decide upon the validity of any of the Acts, since all that is proper to do is to accept the relator's own theory, and to do this is to end the pending case.

2. Courts will not send against public officers the extraordinary writ of injunction or of mandamus unless the complainant makes it appear that the writ will be effective in the particular case in which it is demanded. A writ issued in a case where it cannot be effective goes forth without power, and comes back unobeyed. Courts do not require parties to do fruitless acts, and they will not themselves do what they will not require of parties. A writ that will be unavailing will not be issued, since to issue it would be an idle ceremony. Smith v. Myers, 109 Ind. 1, 6. I fully concur in the conclusion contained in the very able opinion of my Brother Coffey, that the relator is not entitled to the writ of mandamus, because he himself adopts a theory which affirms that the legislative enactment on which he rests his complaint is void; but I think that when the conclusion that he is not entitled to the writ is reached it follows, as an inevitable sequence, that questions involved in the contention that the Acts of 1885 and 1891 are void cannot be considered or decided, inasmuch as the decision of such questions is not necessary to a final disposition of the case.

3. If the relator has a right to a decision upon the constitutionality of the Act of 1891, and if that Act be adjudged void, then it is necessary to determine what one of the Apportionment Acts enacted since the adoption of the present Constitution is valid; but, the relator having placed his asserted right of action solely upon the Act of 1879, and having by his own theory shown that Act to be void, he has no right to demand that the court point out what Act is valid, or declare under what Act legislative elections shall be held. The relator cannot successfully give a protean character to his complaint, and assert that, if it is not good because founded on the Act of 1879, it may nevertheless be good upon the ground that somewhere (where he does not say) in the long series of Apportionment Acts there is to be found an Act authorizing an effective legislative election. A complainant must construct his pleading on a definite theory, and on that theory it must state a cause of action, or it will be incurably bad. The complaint in this case is, as we all agree, bad upon the theory that the relator has a right to a writ coercing the election officers to proceed under the Act of 1879, so that it is self-destructive; and when this is adjudged there is no necessity for considering questions affecting the validity of the Acts of 1885 or 1891. If, however, it be conceded that it is necessary to decide such questions, and to adjudge either of those Acts void, then it is indispensably necessary to designate a valid law, either in the statute or the Constitution, under which legislators can be chosen; for it is inconceivable that no law exists providing for legislative elections. If the hypothesis involved in the provisional concession be granted to be correct, and the court assumes to enter the field covering the Acts of 1885 and 1891, it must, as a matter of judicial knowledge, take notice of all the statutes upon the subject, and fix upon a valid one, if any such can be found, or else declare that no such Act exists, and travel back to the apportionment made by our present Constitution, for it can hardly be possible that the court can enter the field containing the Acts of 1885 and 1891, strike down the latter Act, and yet not determine under which law the legislators can be elected. As well send men out upon an unknown sea without a compass as to adjudge the Act of 1891 void, and yet not adjudge what law is valid; for without the designation of a valid Act the electors and their officers would be entirely without guidance, and utterly at a loss to know under what law to proceed. It cannot be reasonably expected that the electors or their officers can find such a law where the search of the highest court of the state proves unavailing. But the concessions which require the hypothesis indicated, and lead to the consequences suggested, cannot, as I am convinced, be made, for the relator, having singled out as the sole support of his case one Act of the Legislature, has not the semblance of right to require the court to hunt for some other Act, and pronounce it valid. There is neither principle nor precedent that will authorize, much less justify, us in entering the field in which lie the Acts of 1885 and 1891. It is evident that when it is adjudged, as it certainly must be, that the relator's own theory gives the death blow to his asserted right of action, a final disposition of the case is made, and hence we cannot, without a direct violation of the well-known rule outlined in my fourth proposition, consider any of the questions made upon the Acts of 1885 or 1891.

4. The inexorable rule is that constitutional questions will never be decided unless their decision is indispensably necessary to a final disposition of the case actually before the court. The general doctrine outlined in the proposition stated is asserted in the principal opinion, but the course of my discussion requires its restatement, although, as to the existence of the general principle, there is substantial harmony of opinion. I am, however, forced to the conclusion that the principle has not been given its necessary effect or just application. The principle is deeply rooted in the law, and has stood unchallenged by denial and unshadowed by doubt since the first authoritative declaration by the Supreme Court of the United States of the power and duty of the judiciary to give judgment upon the constitutionality of legislative enactments. Cooley, Const. Lim. 8th ed. 196. This principle as firmly fetters the action of the courts as does the Constitution the action of the Legislature. The principle is one which, for obvious reasons, that have been often given, is to be implicitly obeyed; and to obey it in this case it is absolutely necessary to decline to consider questions involving the validity of the Acts of 1885 and 1891, as well as questions respecting the construction of the provisions of the Constitution governing the subject of the apportionment of the state for legislative purposes. An incidental rule necessarily involved in this principle, and clearly resulting from it, is this: Constitutional questions will not be decided unless the party demanding their decision makes it evident that he has a right to require the court to decide them. To me it seems very clear that the relator has shown no such right. He falls far short, indeed, of showing such a right, for he has shown that there is no necessity for deciding the constitutional questions he professes to present, and shown, too, that his own standing is such that those questions cannot be considered without violating fundamental principles.

5. The decision of the question involved in the contention that the court has no power to give judgment upon an Act making an apportionment for legislative purposes is essential, inasmuch as the decision of that general question determines the right of the court to assume jurisdiction. The court must meet and decide the general question stated, for if it has no right to assume jurisdiction it can do nothing more than direct a dismissal of the suit, for it is established and elementary law that where there is no jurisdiction of the general subject there can be no effective judgment beyond a mere direction to the trial court to dismiss the proceeding. Robertson v. State, 109 Ind. 79.

6. The court has power to give judgment upon the constitutionality of an Apportionment Act when the question of its constitutionality is necessary to a decision of the case at its bar, and the question is presented by a party in a position to present it, and who does so present it as to make it the duty of the court to decide it. The power to adjudge invalid such legislative Acts as violate the provisions of the Constitution is an element of sovereignty, and is vested in the judiciary. It would be the surrender of a high constitutional power, that neither principle nor precedent will justify or excuse, to decline to give judgment upon the validity of an Apportionment Act, when properly presented, and necessary to a decision of a case brought to the bar of the court. Such a surrender would involve a breach of duty so flagrant that the most stinging rebuke would fall far short of an adequate condemnation of a court that would so grossly violate the trust imposed upon it by the Constitution. In a government of distributed powers, such as ours is, the power to adjudge Acts void that conflict with the Constitution must necessarily reside elsewhere than in the lawmaking department; otherwise all governmental power would be unified and solidified in that department, and it would be the uncontrolled and absolute master and arbiter in all governmental affairs. If there be no such power in the judiciary, the constitutions of the nation and state are in their widest scope and minutest details mere mockeries. But the power does reside in the judiciary, and it was placed there in the strongest terms by men who knew the science of government in all its parts; and there it will remain as long as free government endures. One of the first things a student of our system of government learns is that it is a system of checks and balances. One of the principal checks upon legislative power is the authority of the court to enforce obedience to the mandates of the Constitution by adjudging void enactments which conflict with its provisions. History proves and experience demonstrates the necessity of such a check, for without it the legislative department arrogates to itself every substantial governmental function and power that it can grasp. Reckoned as the lives of nations are reckoned, it is but a short time since Edmund Burke, in his splendid eulogy on the English governmental system, declared that there were three constitutional departments, forming, as he said, "the triple cord which no man can break; the solemn, sworn, constitutional, frankpledge of this nation; the firm guaranties of each others' being and each others' rights; the joint and several securities, each in its place and order." When Edmund Burke spoke of the system existing at the time he wrote he was right, but his forecast of the future was wrong, for man has broken the "triple cord," and the England of our day has only one department of government. Parliament is supreme, and elsewhere there is not a spark of real power. The officers of the kingdom, from the wearer of the crown down to the tipstaff, are mere servants and departments of parliament. The change wrought by legislative usurpation and encroachment justifies the statement of Mr. Bagehot that "a legislative chamber is greedy and covetous. It acquires as much, it concedes as little, as possible. The passions of its members are its rulers; the law-making faculty, the most comprehensive of the imperial faculties, is its instrument. It will take the administration if it can take it." Eng. Const. Am. ed. 95. The great men who framed our constitutional system knew and provided against the dangers of legislative usurpation of power, and the wisest among them united in devising checks upon it. The declarations of Madison and Washington are strong and clear, and no reader of history can misunderstand their meaning, or doubt their purpose. Jefferson thus expressed his conviction: "An elective despotism was not the government we fought for, but one which should not only be founded on free principles, but one in which the powers of government should be so divided and balanced among several bodies of magistracy as that no one should transcend their legal limits without being effectually checked and restrained by others." "To preserve these checks," said a greater thinker than Jefferson, "must be as necessary as to institute them." Washington's Farewell Address.

The assertion of the power of the judiciary in the principal opinion is not, as I believe, too strong, for I do not doubt the power or the duty of the court to preserve these checks by standing immovably against legislative encroachment, nor do I doubt that the duty is as clear where Apportionment Acts are involved as in cases concerning other Acts. To me it seems that the duty is, if possible, higher and sterner in such cases than in any others, for, if unconstitutional Apportionment Acts are conceded to be beyond the domain of the judiciary, then the legislative power is absolutely unlimited and unfettered, and a legislative body would be at full and unrestrained liberty to enact measures perpetuating its own existence and augmenting its own power. Constitutional limitations are imposed to prevent unrestrained legislative action, and are intended to guard against legislative usurpation. They operate upon all subjects of legislation except subjects of which the legislative department is expressly or by clear implication given exclusive control. Questions of a judicial nature are in a very few instances made exclusively legislative by the Constitution, and as such instances the judiciary cannot interfere with the legislative decision: but there is not the remotest suggestion in that instrument that the validity of an Apportionment Act is a question for the decision of the Legislature; on the contrary, the whole force of that instrument is directed against the assumption by the Legislature of authority over such question. An Apportionment Act, which violates the provisions of the Constitution, can no more become a law than can an unconstitutional Act upon any other subject; nor has it any peculiar virtue or sanctity that lifts it above the power of the judiciary. The Constitution is the touchstone for all legislative enactments, no matter what subject they may embrace or what object they may be intended to attain. An Act that fails when brought to this universal touchstone must be condemned, whether it be an Act providing for the election of legislators or an Act providing for the election of petty township officers. The Constitution makes no discrimination between classes of general legislative enactments, and until the people, in the mode they have themselves prescribed, change their Constitution, no earthly power can make such a discrimination, and place some general enactments within the domain of the judiciary and take others out of it. In affirming, as I do, quite as fully and strongly as is done in the principal opinion, the power and duty of the court to entertain jurisdiction of questions affecting the validity of Apportionment Acts, when duly presented and absolutely necessary to a decision of the particular case, I do not by any means concede that such questions can be considered where they are not properly presented by a party having a right to present them; nor do I by even the remotest implication concede that such questions can be considered in a case that can be disposed of upon other grounds; for it is one theory to affirm that general jurisdiction exists and quite another and radically different thing to affirm that, because jurisdiction of the general subject exists, specific constitutional questions can be decided. I concur in the conclusion that the judgment below must be reversed, but, as I have endeavored to show, the grounds upon which my opinion rests are in some respects different from those of the court.

Olds, J.:

I concur in the principal opinion in this case. In my opinion, it properly and legitimately expresses an opinion on the question of the constitutionality of the two Acts of the Legislature, viz., the Acts of 1879 and 1891. To decide the case it is absolutely necessary to determine the constitutionality of these Acts, or at least one of them. While it is true the appellee must fail whether the Acts are valid and constitutional or unconstitutional and void, yet to dispose of the case the court must determine whether these Acts are valid or void; and, being compelled to determine the question as to their validity, the court should in all fairness express an opinion disclosing upon what theory the opinion rests,—whether upon the grounds that the Acts, or either one or both of them, are valid or void.

A petition for rehearing was subsequently filed in response to which on January 27, 1893, Howard, J., delivered the following opinion:

The attorney-general has filed a petition, which is supported by briefs, for the rehearing of this cause. His petition, as the chief law-officer of the state, and because of the importance of the questions involved, is entitled to the gravest consideration.

A petition for rehearing is a request to the court to revise its own action, by correcting errors and modifying or setting aside its judgment. The Statute, section 662, Rev. Stat. 1881, provides that at any time within sixty days after the determination of a cause, either party may file a petition for a rehearing. The question at the outset therefore is, whether the attorney-general is himself a party to this action, or whether he represents such party.

Besides the special duties of the attorney-general provided for in various statutes, his general duties are named in sections 5659 and 5666 of the Revised Statutes of 1881. Section 5659 provides that "such attorney-general shall prosecute and defend all suits that may be instituted by or against the state of Indiana, the prosecuting or defending of which is not already provided for by law, whenever notified ten days of the pendency thereof by the clerk of the court in which such suits are pending, and whenever required by the governor or a majority of the officers of state, in writing, to be furnished him within a reasonable time, for the purpose therein contemplated. And he shall prosecute and defend all criminal or state prosecutions that are now or hereafter may be pending in the supreme court of the state of Indiana."

This is not a suit by or against the state, although it is prosecuted by a relator in the name of the state. It is a suit for mandate, which is already provided for by law. Neither has the governor, nor a majority of the state officers, nor any clerk of a court, required or notified him to prosecute or defend in the case. Neither is it a case in which any criminal or state prosecution is pending in the supreme court. Section 5666 provides that "the attorney-general shall be required to attend to the interests of the state in all suits, actions, or claims in which the state is or may become interested in the supreme court of this state." By this section he is made the law officer of the state in all matters before the supreme court in which the state has interests involved. This raises the question as to the interests of the state in this action, and particularly as to whether she is a party to it. The interests of the state here concern the constitutionality of a law affecting the membership of the legislative department of the state government. We can hardly conceive of any suit before the court which could be of greater interest to the state, and it is eminently proper that the attorney-general should attend to those interests. This the court recognized in granting leave to the attorney-general to appear in the case in the order heretofore made as follows: "It further appearing to the court that the matters involved in said cause are such as affect the entire people of the state, and are of great importance, it is ordered that leave be granted to the attorney-general of the state to appear in behalf of the people and to take such steps as he may deem necessary to aid the court in reaching a just determination thereof."

This order of the court and the active participation of the attorney-general in the proceedings in appeal are in full harmony with the spirit of the statute. But did this appearance, or the order of the court, or the grave interests of the people in the case constitute the state a party? The order of the court could not make one a party who was not already a party in reality. It could only admit one to be a party who was already in fact and in law a necessary or a proper party to the suit. Could the important interests of the people make the state such a party. The people of the state are vitally interested in the decision of the constitutionality of every general law that comes before the court, but we should not for this reason say that the state should be a party to every suit that involved the constitutionality of a law of the state. It is the duty of the attorney-general to attend to the interests of the state when involved in a matter before the court. He comes there as an officer of the state to advise one of the three departments of the state government in such manner "as he may deem necessary to aid the court in reaching a just determination" of the matters that concern the interests of the state. The parties are already before the court, but as we think neither the state itself, nor the attorney-general as representing the state, is any more a party than if the matter were one to be decided by the executive or the legislative department of the government. Each department, in its own sphere, is the state, and as such guards the rights of the state, not as those of a stranger or mere suitor before it, but as those of the body politic of which it is itself a part.

It can hardly be said that by reason of the decision rendered in the matters in controversy between the parties the interests of the state and the people have not received due consideration. The attorney-general as a sworn officer of the state has done his duty as he saw it, and advised the court with great learning and ability. And it must be remembered, besides, that those constituting the court were themselves also sworn officers of the state, and as a court, even constituted an integral part of the state government. Whether they decided the matter before them as the attorney-general thought right, or whether they decided them as the court as now constituted would have done, does not affect the question as to whether the decision so rendered can now be reviewed by the court, in this case, and as to the issues between the parties.

We are of opinion that in such appearance the attorney-general is, in the strictest legal sense, a friend of the court, and not a party, nor the representative of any party to the suit before it. He has aided the court in its labors to reach a just decision of the case. That decision, whether right or wrong, has been reached, and his friendly office is ended. The parties have litigated the matters at issue between them, and have withdrawn in so far as they can from the jurisdiction of the court. We think he cannot petition for a rehearing of the matters that have been tried and decided between them. Counsel for appellee in one of their briefs call the attorney-general an intervenor in this case, but from what has been said of his office before the court he cannot be an intervenor. As the law officer of the state he has aided and advised the court, even as he might have given his legal opinion to the governor when requested. But no judgment could be rendered for or against him, or for or against the state, as might be done in case of an intervenor.

But although we do not think that the attorney-general can petition in this case, as a party, for a rehearing, yet we have no doubt that the case, like all others, is still before the court in case error or mistake has been made. The court may correct its own record, either on its own motion, or on being advised of the mistake by any party in interest. In the case of Huntington County Comrs. v. Brown, 14 Ind. 191, a petition for rehearing was filed more than sixty days after the decision. The court could not grant a rehearing, but it appearing that a decision had been rendered against one who had not been before the court, the court on its own motion granted a rule upon the other party to show cause why the decision should not be revoked.

In Taylor v. Elliott, 52 Ind. 588, this court fully considered and decided its power to modify, correct, or set aside its own decision in a proper case.

In Crowell v. Jaqua, 114 Ind. 246, this court set aside one opinion on account of inadvertent error, and substituted another in its place.

In Elliott's Appellate Procedure, § 550, the power of the court to correct its own errors is expressly maintained. Of this power there can be no doubt, but that is not the question before us. There is no mistake of fact, no inadvertence, "no errors into which the court may have fallen," but a deliberate decision of issues upon facts admitted by the parties. These parties have departed from the jurisdiction of the court, under the rules of the court as established in pursuance of the provisions of the statute, and we do not think that the issues litigated between them can have a rehearing in this court.

The intervenor, Morgan Chandler, has also filed his petition for rehearing of the cause, but he has filed no brief in its support, and under the rules of the court it cannot therefore be considered.

We are besides of opinion that as there was no decision adverse to him, he cannot have anything upon which to base his petition for rehearing.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged by the court that the petitions for a rehearing now on file in this cause be, and the same are hereby rejected.

Coffey, Ch. J., concurring:

On the 8d day of January, 1893, a petition for a rehearing in this cause was filed on behalf of the attorney-general of the state. Before any consideration of such petition we are met by the grave question as to whether we have any jurisdiction in the case. If we have jurisdiction, no great public inconvenience is likely to arise by reason of any action taken by the court in the cause, but on the other hand, if we have no jurisdiction, any action we may take will be a mere nullity. The granting of a rehearing under such circumstances would not annul the former adjudication holding the Apportionment Acts of 1879 and 1891 invalid. The evil consequences likely to follow upon the attempted enforcement of laws which stand authoritatively adjudged invalid can readily be foreseen. As to the manner in which, or in what tribunal the question of the validity of such an attempt may arise no one at this time can foretell; but that it would arise in some form, in the event we should assume to act without jurisdiction, is reasonably certain. The question of jurisdiction over the case necessarily arises upon the record.

Section 662, Rev. Stat. 1881, provides that, "when any cause is determined in the supreme court, the clerk shall forthwith notify the clerk of the court below that it is determined, and whether reversed or affirmed, in whole or in part, or dismissed. At any time within sixty days after such determination, either party may file a petition for a rehearing, and if not so filed, the decision and instructions of the supreme court shall be certified to the court below, unless otherwise ordered by the court."

Rule 38 of this court provides that, "opinions and judgments shall not be certified to the court below by the clerk of this court, except in criminal cases, until the expiration of sixty days, unless by order of this court, or on the filing of waiver of petition for rehearing, which order of court, or filing of waiver shall be certified by the clerk with the opinion."

The opinion of the court in this cause was filed on the 17th day of December, 1892, and on the 22d day of the same month the parties to this litigation, acting under the above statute and rule, filed in the clerk's office of this court the following waiver of the right to file a petition for rehearing, viz.: "Come now the parties, both appellants and appellee, and each severally and separately waive and relinquish the right to file a petition for a rehearing in this cause and accept as final and conclusive the opinion of the court heretofore rendered in this cause, and now ask that the court will order and direct the clerk of this court to immediately certify said cause and opinion to the clerk of the Henry circuit court, from which court the appeal in this cause was taken."

This waiver was signed by the attorneys of record for each of the parties, and was not only filed in the clerk's office, but the parties, in addition to such filing, procured an order of the court thereon requiring the clerk of this court to certify the cause according to this request and agreement of the parties.

The cause, pursuant to this agreement and waiver, and the order of the court, was accordingly certified by the clerk of this court to the clerk of the Henry county circuit court. That this was a legitimate mode of taking the case from this court seems not to be doubted, and that the cause, as well as the parties to the suit, are now beyond the power and control of this court I think is equally certain, unless some party remains here not having joined in the waiver, who is entitled to file a petition for a rehearing.

No petition is filed by the state, and if such petition was on file it would be a sufficient answer to it to say that it was not entitled to a rehearing without the consent of the relator to whom it has extended the use of its name for the enforcement of a private right, even if it had not joined in the waiver, which it has done.

A petition has been filed by Mr. Chandler, an intervenor, but it is not claimed that he is entitled to a rehearing. If such claim were made it would be sufficient answer to it to say that he has not filed a brief in support of his petition, and for this reason, under the well-known rules of this court, it is waived.

The only petition in the cause under which it is claimed we have the power to grant a rehearing is filed by the attorney-general of the state. During the progress of the cause in this court the following order was made, namely: "It further appearing to the court that the matters involved in said cause are such as affect the entire people of the state, and are of great importance, it is ordered that leave be granted to the attorney-general of the state to appear in behalf of the people and to take such steps as he may deem necessary to aid the court in reaching a just determination thereof."

It is now claimed by the attorney-general that by virtue of this order he became a party to this suit. Unless this claim can be maintained, of course his petition is not entitled to consideration, for, as will be seen by reading the statute, no provision is made for filing a petition for a rehearing by any person other than a party.

The contention that the attorney-general is a party to this suit would seem to be so destitute of plausibility as not to require a moment's consideration, were it not for the apparent earnestness with which he seeks to maintain it.

In the vis prius courts parties are known as plaintiffs and defendants. In this court they are known as appellants and appellees. If the attorney-general is a party to this suit, which is he, an appellant or an appellee? With whom is he litigating? What judgment shall be rendered either for or against him. He is not an intervenor, for no person can be such unless he has a personal interest in the controversy and it will certainly not be contended that the above order embraces a right to set up a personal interest.

It was perfectly proper, I think, for the court, in view of the public interest involved in this case, to invite the attorney-general, the chief law officer of the state, to aid it, with his extensive knowledge of the law, in arriving at a correct conclusion, not in private consultation, but in open argument and by briefs. As he was the representative of the whole people of the state, the court had the right to assume that he would stand impartial as between the parties and that he would honestly and faithfully, as a public officer, give to the court his views upon the new and intricate questions involved. That he did by the able brief filed by him give the court much aid is not to be denied. But it was not as a party to the suit that he was permitted to file briefs and argue the case. His relation to the court was simply that of an amicus curiæ. It is not the function of an amicus curiæ to take upon himself the management of a cause. Anderson's Law Dict. title, Amicus Curia. The powers and duties of an amicus curiæ are well understood by the profession. In the case of Irwin v. Armuth, 129 Ind. 340, it was said: "An amicus curiæ may appear, and, with the permission of the court, introduce evidence for his own benefit, but he cannot except to any ruling made by the court, as he has no right to complain if the court refuses to accept his suggestions."

This cause was certified to the Henry circuit court on the 22d day of December last. It may be that the judgment has been rendered by that court in accordance with the opinion and directions of this court. If so, can we now, by any action we may take, affect that judgment? I think not. In my opinion, the moment this cause was certified to the Henry circuit court by order of this court, we lost jurisdiction over it as fully as we would have lost it had the sixty days allowed to file petitions for a rehearing fully expired. For these reasons, I am of the opinion that we have no jurisdiction, and that we have no power to consider the petition for a rehearing filed by the attorney-general.

NOTE.—Regulation by by-laws of elections by private corporations.

In Reg. v. Saddlers' Co., 32 L. J. Q. B. 837, the house of lords in affirming a decision by the queen's bench reported in 3 El. & El. 42, decided that a by-law of a saddler's company declaring that "a person who has been a bankrupt or become otherwise insolvent" shall not be eligible as a member of the "court of assistants" of the company unless he has paid his debts in full or established a fair and honest character by seven years' subsequent conduct, is valid. orable character by seven years' subsequent conduct, is valid. This decision is the nearest that has been found to that of the main case.

In Newling v. Francis, 3 T. R. 189, it was held that a corporation may make by-laws to regulate elections. This was a case of a municipal corporation as in fact are nearly all early English cases about the powers of corporations.

In Juker v. Com., 20 Pa. 434, it was held that the mode of conducting the annual elections of a religious corporation was a proper subject for a by-defendant in a proceeding for a writ of mandamus to compel the recognition of plaintiff as a director of defendant company. Affirmed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Flournoy & Price for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. W. C. Clayton and C. W. Dailey for defendant in error.

Brannon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In March, 1892, W. Irvine Cross presented to the judge of the circuit court of Mineral county his petition alleging that he had been elected a director of the West Virginia Central & Pittsburgh Railway Company by a larger vote in stockholders' meeting than W. W. Taylor, but that Taylor had been declared elected, and was then holding said office; and upon the prayer of said petition for a writ of mandamus to be directed to said Taylor, commanding him to vacate said office of director, and surrender it to said Cross, and to said company, commanding it to receive and recognize said Cross as such director, and also to Henry G. Davis, Steven B. Elkins, John A. Hambleton, James G. Blaine, and Thomas B. Davis, the other directors, commanding them to receive and recognize said Cross as such director, a mandamus nisi was awarded. The company filed a return, and Thomas B. Davis filed a return to said alternative writ of mandamus, and the relator, Cross, demurred thereto, and, said demurrers being overruled, and no reply of fact being made, the court refused to award a peremptory mandamus, and dismissed the alternative writ, and Cross brought this writ of error to reverse such decision. The returns place the refusal to admit Cross as a director upon a by-law of the company providing that no person shall be a director unless he own 200 shares of stock in the company, and that no one shall be a director who is engaged as counsel or attorney in any suit or proceeding against the company; and the returns allege that he is ineligible on both grounds. This by-law is assailed as invalid. It is claimed that there is no law authorizing the stockholders to pass it. This company exists under a special Act chartering it, passed in 1866, and under an Act passed in 1881, amending it, both reserving power to alter or amend the charter; and under an Act passed in 1871 it was given further time to organize, and it was organized in that year. An important question here is, Is this company subject to chapter 53 of the Code? Sections 9 and 10 of the Code, as it went into force April 1, 1869, read thus: "(9) Every joint-stock company heretofore organized, and which has commenced its proper corporate business, under special charter or general law, shall remain subject to the laws now in force applicable thereto, unless it accepts the provisions of this chapter, or shall be declared subjected thereto by Act of the Legislature. (10) Every joint-stock company which shall be hereafter organized, or commerce its proper corporate business, whether under special charter or general law, or which shall accept the provisions of this law and in the absence of such by-law could be controlled by usage.

Stockholders have a right to determine what shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business at their meetings, and they may adopt a by-law requiring that a majority of the stock must be represented in order to do any other business than merely to organize and adjourn. Ellsworth Woolen Mfg. Co. v. Faunce, 79 Me. 440.

A by-law authorizing an election to fill a vacancy by a less number than a majority is void where a majority is required by statute for the transaction of business, although it is also provided by statute that vacancies may be filled "in such manner as may be provided by the by-laws." State v. Curtis, 9 Nev. 329.

In Com. v. Gill, 8 Whart. 223, it was held that by-laws passed by the directors of a savings institution providing that a person holding one share of stock shall be a member but should cease to be such on transfer of the stock, and that proof of the membership should be furnished by appearing as a stockholder on the books, were illegal on the ground that the institution was in the nature of a charity and that the charter did not give the directors power to admit members but made a distinction between members and stockholders and did not entitle stockholders as such to participate in the management but confided that trust to the original incorporators and such as might afterwards be chosen. The by-laws being contrary to the charter were of course void.

The general power of religious corporations to make by-laws includes power to make a by-law giving the president authority to appoint inspectors of election and also a by-law prohibiting tickets from being counted if they have anything on them besides the names. Com. v. Woelper, 3 Serg. & R. 29.

A by-law made by stockholders may regulate the mode of calling meetings for the purpose of electing officers if it is not repugnant to the charter or to any law of the state. Taylor v. Griswold, 14 N. J. L. 222.

But a by-law restricting the authority of directors to call a special meeting at any other time than when requested by ten members would be so unreasonable that it can be created if at all only by the most clear and explicit language. Citizens Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Sortwell, 8 Allen, 217.

The by-law of a board of directors may authorize the ordinary business to be transacted by a quorum of directors which is much less than a majority of the whole number. Hoyt v. Thompson, 19 N. Y. 207; Hoyt v. Sheldon, 3 Bosw. 267; Smith v. Law, 21 N. Y. 296.

In Hoyt v. Thompson and Hoyt v. Sheldon the by-law made five directors including the president or seven directors without him a quorum although the whole number of directors was twenty-three.

In Smith v. Law three was made a quorum although the whole number was nine.

The fact that a meeting of a newly elected board of directors was not held at the place fixed by a by-law was one of the important facts on which the court held that the board thus organizing did not become a board of directors de facto although there was a quorum of the de jure directors present. Other important facts were that the meeting was held without notice to other directors who had possession of the seal, books, papers, and property of the corporation and who disputed the authority of those thus assuming to organize. Waterman v. Chicago & I. R. Co. 15 L. R. A. 418, 139 Ill. 658.

As to right to vote.

The statutory qualifications of the members of a religious society to entitle them to vote can neither be abridged nor extended by any by-law. People v. Phillips, 1 Denio, 388.

chapter, or be declared subject thereto by Act of the Legislature, shall, so far as it is not otherwise expressly provided, have the rights, powers, and privileges, and be subject to the regulations, restrictions, and liabilities, specified in this and the preceding chapter." Under said section 10 this company became subject to chapter 53, and section 49 of that chapter expressly gives the stockholders power to prescribe the qualifications of directors. Why should not the owners of the property and business of a corporation—the stockholders—be allowed to define the qualifications of directors, the governing power of the corporation, except so far as the Legislature prescribes? It may be plausibly argued that so enlarged are the powers and so minute the details of chapter 50, Acts 1881, changing the name of the company, that that Act is to be regarded, at least for such a question as this, the charter and law of being of the company; and, if so, it would fall under said chapter 53, making regulations for joint-stock companies, whether incorporated under special charter or general law. I do not, however, deem it necessary to decide this. It is argued that not section 49, chap. 53, applies to this company as to election of directors, but its special charter Acts. Grant this for argument. It is said, then, that this by-law, in prescribing said qualification for directors, violates the charter Acts. Let us see. Section 1 of both the Acts of 1866 and 1881 gives to the stockholders "power and authority to make and pass such by-laws, rules, and regulations for the management and government of the affairs of said corporation and its officers, directors, and agents as may be deemed necessary or proper, which may be also amended, changed, or repealed at any and all regular meetings of the stockholders." Here is a very comprehensive grant of power. Argument to define its breadth would but cloud, when the letter, spirit, and purpose of the grant are plain. Why would a by-law prescribing reasonable qualification of directors be repugnant to this provision? In addition to the foregoing view, it is not going far to say, though not necessary to say so, except as an additional argument, that section 67, chap. 54, Code, brings this company under that chapter, just as much as if it had been formed under that chapter; and then the first section of that chapter provides that companies incorporated under it shall also be subject to the provisions of chapter 53, so far as applicable, showing a purpose on the part of the Legislature to apply the provisions of chapter 53, as well as those of chapter 54, to all joint stock companies, where applicable. Now, certainly, section 49, which provides as to the board of directors, and how elected, and as to qualifications, is applicable, in its nature, to companies formed under or brought under chapter 54. Section 38 of chapter 54 relates to the same subject, but there is no inconsistency. Section 49, chap. 53, gives power to stockholders by by-law to fix the number of directors, the manner of their election and removal, and

A by-law authorizing any stockholder to challenge votes and providing that if his challenge be supported by affidavits or other probable cause to the satisfaction of the inspectors they may reject a vote offered unless oath is made in answer to the challenge and the answer deemed sufficient by them will not justify rejecting the vote of any person who has held a share in his own name for the time required to entitle him to vote. People v. Kip, 4 Cow. 832, note.

A resolution of directors authorizing a person to vote on stock transferred by the corporation to him as trustee by way of security for a debt is void where a statute gives the power to vote to stockholders, as the corporation is itself the real owner of such stock. Brewster v. Hartley, 37 Cal. 15, 99 Am. Dec. 237.

A resolution of the directors that stockholders shall vote for but one person at a time in voting for directors is void where it is provided by the state Constitution that "every stockholder shall have the right to vote in person or by proxy the number of shares of stock owned by him for as many persons as there are directors or managers to be elected, or to cumulate said shares and give one candidate as many votes as the number of directors multiplied by the number of his shares shall equal, or distribute them on the same principle among as many candidates as he shall think fit." This constitutional provision means that he may cast his ballot, singly, cumulatively, or distributively at one time and the by-law therefore is in conflict with it. Wright v. Central California C. Water Co. 67 Cal. 532.

Cumulative voting was held illegal, however, in State v. Stookley, 45 Ohio St. 304, where there was no provision for it by statute but the statute merely provided that a stockholder shall have a vote for each share of stock and that a plurality of votes shall elect. No by-law appears to have been involved in this case but a by-law authorizing 18 L. R. A. cumulative voting would seem to be void as in conflict with the statute.

As to proxies.

In Phillips v. Wickham, 1 Paige, 591, 2 L. ed. 764, the chancellor says of the right to vote by proxy: "It is possible that it might be delegated in some cases by the by-laws of a corporation where express authority was given to make such by-laws."

In State v. Tudor, 5 Day, 229, 5 Am. Dec. 162, a by-law adopted by a corporation allowing votes by proxy was held lawful under the general power to establish by-laws not contrary to the charter or the laws of the state.

But in Taylor v. Griswold, 14 N. J. L. 222, it was held that the right of making a by-law authorizing proxies is not incident to a corporation and that it is not given by general authority to "make such by-laws for their government as they shall deem proper, not repugnant to the charter or the laws of the state." The court added that even if such power was allowable in a purely private corporation it was not so in the case of a bridge company the business of which is really publici juris. But there is no chance to distinguish this case from the Connecticut case preceding on any such ground, as that also was the case of a bridge company.

In People v. Croesley, 69 Ill. 194, a by-law authorizing proxies is again upheld. It was in this case adopted by the annual meeting of a benevolent society under a state Constitution which directed the Legislature to provide for voting by the stockholders of a private corporation "in person or by proxy." The court held that even if the constitutional provisions did not apply to the class of corporations involved in that case it showed that proxies were not contrary to the spirit of the laws.

As to who are directors de facto, see note to Waterman v. Chicago & I. R. Co. (Ill.) 15 L. R. A. 413.

B. A. R.

the mode of filling vacancies. So does section 49, and not in an inconsistent manner. Section 38, chap. 54, does not make any provision as to qualification of directors, further than they must be stockholders; but section 49, chap. 53, gives the stockholders power to give qualifications, requiring, however, that they be stockholders. These two sections can both coexist, to be read as in pari materia. Section 49, chap. 53, is simply supplementary to section 38 of chapter 54, and supplies a want wherein it is lacking in a very important respect; that is, it makes provision as to qualification of directors. There is confessedly some confusion in our lengthy and elaborate law touching corporations, perhaps necessarily incident to dealing with such a subject, and traceable to amendments from time to time; but it seems to have been the legislative intent to make chapters 53 and 54 apply to all joint-stock companies, so far as applicable; and, this being so, they are to be read and harmonized upon the principles of construction applicable to statutes in pari materia. They contain elaborate details in a comprehensive system of statute law on one single subject,—corporations. State v. Cain, 8 W. Va. 788; Curran v. Owens, 15 W. Va. 227.

Now, as to that clause of the by-law excluding any one from the directory employed in suits against the company. We think it is within the power of the stockholders to pass it. Cannot the stockholders see that the important functions of directors, which may bring the company to either prosperity or ruin, shall be performed not by enemies,—those hostile in their interest to the company's best interest? Must the attorney against the company be allowed, without any power in the company to prevent it, to sit in the directors' meeting when considering its defense, and have access to all records and papers, get the secrets, and go straight from the meeting and use them to the destruction of the company? Perhaps the vote of one director, who is at the same time interested in a suit involving the property, the business, even the existence, of the company, may effectually accomplish the object of that suit. A person cannot serve two hostile and adverse masters without detriment to one of them. A judge cannot be impartial if personally interested in the cause. No more can a director. Human nature is too weak for this. Take whatever statute provision you please giving power to stockholders to choose directors, and in none will you find any express prohibition against a discretion to select directors having the company's interest at heart; and it would simply be going far to deny by mere implication the existence of such a salutary power. The owners of the franchise and property of the corporation—the stockholders—ought to be accorded this power to defend their own interest. It is self-defense only.

Next, assuming the validity of the clause of the by-law in question excluding such attorney from the directory, we are asked to say that the suit in which the relator, Cross, is engaged as attorney is not such a suit as is contemplated by said by-law, inasmuch as it is really not adverse to the company's interest. In the first place, I remark that this court ought not to look with a very critical scrutiny to say, in advance of the decision of the suit that it is not adverse to the interest of the company, taking away from the directory all right of judgment on that point. But look at the bill in the suit referred to, pending in Baltimore,—Shaw v. Henry G. Davis and others. The West Virginia Central & Pittsburgh Railway Company is a defendant. The contents of the bill need not be further stated than to say that it alleges that Henry G. Davis, Thomas B. Davis, and Stephen B. Elkins own a majority of the stock of that company, and are directors; that they own stock in and control a corporation called the Piedmont & Cumberland Railway Company, operating a railroad from a terminus of the West Virginia Central & Pittsburgh Railroad to Cumberland; that assets of the West Virginia Central & Pittsburgh Railway Company were used in its construction; that said Henry G. Davis and Thomas B. Davis and Stephen B. Elkins, by means of their influence as president and directors of the West Virginia Central & Pittsburgh Railway Company, were about to induce and cause that company to enter into a lease of the Piedmont & Cumberland Railroad, which would be against the interest and to the loss of the West Virginia Central & Pittsburgh Railroad Company; and the bill prayed that said Henry G. and Thomas B. Davis and Stephen B. Elkins disclose their interests in the Piedmont & Cumberland Railway Company, that the latter company discover what money of the former company had been used in its construction; and that the West Virginia Central & Pittsburgh Railway Company be enjoined from consummating said lease. It is said this suit is for the benefit of the West Virginia Central & Pittsburgh Railway Company. That may be in the end. It may be that an accounting to it by the other company will prove beneficial. But it may be also that the prevention of the lease, by which the company would get an outlet from its eastern terminus for its coal and other business, would be highly injurious to it. It may, on the other hand, be that the lease would be a burden upon it. Without all the light, how can we say that the prevention of a lease which may be beneficial or hurtful will certainly be hurtful to the company? That depends on facts to be shown by evidence. The Maryland court in charge of the case might determine to the reverse. We can safely say that this court would be going far to hold that this suit in none of its prayers will prejudice the West Virginia Central & Pittsburgh Railway Company.

It is assigned, but not insisted upon in argument, as error that the court quashed the return of service as to Henry G. Davis. It showed service by delivery of copy at his place of business to a person found there, who is manager of his business. Plainly the return is not good.

Judgment affirmed.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

Washington ELLIOT, Appt.,
v.

J. N. HALL et al., Respts.

(.....Idaho.....)

- * When the statute makes the wages or earnings of a debtor exempt from levy of execution or attachment, such exemption continues while such wages or earnings are under control of the debtor, although temporarily in the hands of another.

(December 1, 1892.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Elmore County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover certain money alleged to have been exempt from execution which had been seized by defendants on an execution against plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wyman & Wyman, for appellant:

Statutes granting exemptions, being in furtherance of humanity and the protection of the family, should be liberally construed.

Freeman, Executions, § 208; Re McManus, 10 L. R. A. 567, 87 Cal. 293; Montague v. Richardson, 24 Conn. 847, 63 Am. Dec. 178; Kuntz v. Kinney, 83 Wis. 514; Kenyon v. Baker, 16 Mich. 378, 97 Am. Dec. 158; Beran v. Hayden, 13 Iowa, 122.

Trevitic was the bailee of the plaintiff in this matter and drew the wages as his agent, to be delivered on demand, and the title to the money was not changed in any manner by reason of the order, but remained in the plaintiff.

It cannot be claimed that this was a fraudulent conveyance of property, for there was no conveyance or attempt to convey, and for the further reason that there can be no fraudulent conveyance of exempt property.

Freeman, Executions, § 185; Derby v. Weyrich, 8 Neb. 174; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Smersh, 22 Neb. 751.

There was no commingling or attempt at commingling. Trevitic's office was to collect the money from plaintiff's employer and deliver it to plaintiff. It was seized upon in transitu and the record fails utterly to show anything like commingling.

But even if there had been a commingling, it cannot be held to lose for plaintiff his exemption, for the judgment creditor is in no event injured.

Rutter v. Shumway, 16 Colo. 95; Howard v. Tandy, 79 Tex. 450.

Mr. J. W. Badger, for respondents:

The proceeds of exempt property are not exempt. Transposition of exempt property destroys or loses the exemption.

Brckett v. Watkins, 21 Wend. 68, modifying Hall v. Penney, 11 Wend. 44, 25 Am. Dec. 601; Mandlow v. Burton, 1 Ind. 39; 1 Freeman, Execution, 2d ed. § 247; Wooster v. Page, 54 N. H. 125, 20 Am. Rep. 128.

If personal property exempt be fraudulently assigned to defraud creditors of the debtor, and be thereafter levied upon by such creditor, the debtor is not entitled to claim the same as exempt.

State v. Koch, 40 Mo. App. 685.

If exempt property or goods be so mixed with others that they can no longer be identified, the right of exemption is lost. The claimant must always be able to point out the identical property claimed.

Smith v. Turnley, 44 Ga. 245; Roth v. Wells, 29 N. Y. 471.

The right to exemption is a personal privilege and may be waived.

Hombs v. Corbin, 20 Mo. App. 497.

Huston, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was a miner in the employ of the Comfort Consolidated Mining Company. A judgment had been recovered against him in justice's court. Execution was issued thereon, and levied upon a certain sum of money in the hands of one Trevitic. There is no question but that the money so levied upon was the wages of the plaintiff, earned within the thirty days next preceding the date of the levy. Trevitic had drawn the same from the NOTE.—Exemption of debtor's wages after payment by employer.

Very little direct authority can be found as to the effect upon an exemption of wages of payment by the employer to the debtor or to some one for him.

In Rutter v. Shumway, 16 Colo. 95, which is cited and followed in the above case, the exemption was upheld as to wages which had been received by the debtor and deposited in a bank so long as they were capable of being identified.

So in Cox v. Bearden, 84 Ga. 804, 20 Am. St. Rep. 856, it was held that payment voluntarily made by an employer to the sheriff upon a judgment and in fa. in favor of an employé did not subject the money to garnishment in the hands of the sheriff, while on its way to the employé.

But on the other hand in Cook v. Holbrook, 6 Allen, 572, it was held that the exempt character of a claim for wages was lost when it had been put into judgment and collected by the employé's attorney, because the claim was merged in the judgment.

In harmony with the last case, it was held in Ayer 18 L. R. A.

v. Brown, 77 Me. 185, that the wages of a seaman are not exempt from attachment after they have been paid to his attorney, even if they would have been before payment, as to which authorities are in conflict.

The effect of payment to defeat a claim to exemption is also illustrated in Kennedy v. Aldridge, 5 B. Mon. 142, in which an exemption from attachment of the salary of an officer based on grounds of public policy is held not to exist after it has been paid to his agent.

This last case has little bearing on the question of exemption of wages in favor of the wage earner, as the only exemption there involved was one based on the public interests and therefore the ground of exemption was lost when payment had been made and the only rights affected were those of private individuals. The same is true of the preceding case as to seaman's wages in which it was objected that the seaman's attorney being a proctor in admiralty held the funds as an officer of the court, but the court decided that he held them not in that capacity but as the seaman's agent. I. T.

company at the request of plaintiff, and held it for him. Trevitic stated to the officer making the levy (J. N. Hall, the principal defendant) that plaintiff owed him nothing; that he simply drew the money for him as an accommodation, and held it subject to his call. On demand of the officer (Hall) holding the execution, Trevitic delivered the money so held by him to such officer. Plaintiff brings his action against the officer and his sureties for the recovery of the money, claiming the same as exempt from levy, under the provisions of subdivision 7 of section 4480 of the Revised Statutes of Idaho, which is as follows: "The earnings of the judgment debtor for his personal services rendered at any time within thirty days next preceding the levy of execution, or levy of attachment, when it appears by the debtor's affidavit or otherwise that such earnings are necessary for the use of his family residing in this territory (state), supported wholly or in part by his labor." The necessary affidavits were duly served by plaintiff, establishing the facts required by the section of the statute referred to. Plaintiff recovered judgment in justice's court. Defendants appealed to district court, when the judgment of the justice's court was reversed, and judgment for costs was rendered for defendants, and from the judgment of the district court the plaintiff appeals to this court. There is nothing in the record showing the grounds upon which the district court based its decision and judgment. The case was heard by the district court upon a stipulation as to the evidence. It appears from the plaintiff's motion for a new trial that, while the district court held that the money levied upon by the officer by virtue of the execution was exempt as wages, under the provisions of the statute, the plaintiff had deprived himself of the benefit of the statute by "commingling, or causing to be commingled, said wages, so as to lose their identity as wages." This view seems to be acquiesced in by defendants. The only evidence of a "commingling" is the fact that Trevitic drew this money from the company, for the accommodation of the plaintiff, and held the same for the plaintiff; that plaintiff was not indebted to Trevitic, nor had Trevitic any claim or lien upon the money so drawn.

It is insisted by respondents (1) that the drawing of the money by Trevitic, upon the order or request of plaintiff, was a fraud upon the creditors of plaintiff; (2) that it was such a commingling of the money as deprived it of the exemption provided by the statute. The money being confessedly exempt as wages, its disposition by the plaintiff could not operate as a fraud upon defendants. Freeman, Executions, § 136; Derby v. Weyrich, 8 Neb. 174; Union Pac. R. Co. v. Smerah, 22 Neb. 751.

The drawing of the money by Trevitic, and his holding it for the accommodation of the plaintiff, if not appearing that there were any dealings between plaintiff and Trevitic, or that Trevitic had or claimed to have any interest in or lien upon the money, could hardly be called a "commingling." Trevitic did not hold any other money or property of the plaintiff. Suppose plaintiff had given his wife or one of his children an order to draw his wages; would that have been a commingling? The object of the statute was to preserve, for the support of the debtor and his family, a portion of his earnings, and to the accomplishment of this end the statute should receive a liberal construction. The beneficent intention of the Legislature must not be defeated by a strained or technical construction. This rule of construction seems to have been quite generally recognized in this class of cases. Freeman, Executions, § 208; Re McManus, 87 Cal. 292, 10 L. R. A. 567; Montague v. Richardson, 24 Conn. 847, 68 Am. Dec. 173; Kuntz v. Kinney, 33 Wis. 514; Kenyon v. Baker, 16 Mich. 373, 97 Am. Dec. 158; Bevan v. Hayden, 13 Iowa, 122.

The case of Wooster v. Page, 54 N. H. 125, 20 Am. Rep. 128, is cited by respondents in support of their contention that the wages of the plaintiff lost the privilege of exemption by reason of the payment of the same to Trevitic, at the request of the plaintiff. The case of Wooster v. Page does not seem to go so far as claimed by the respondents, but would seem to favor that view. The court in that case rests its decision largely upon the decision of the same court in the case of Morse v. Towns, 45 N. H. 185. In the latter case (as cited by the court in Wooster v. Page) it seems that "Towns having enlisted, and received from the town of Pembroke a bounty of two hundred dollars, went away to the wars, leaving the money with his wife, for the support of herself and their two children. The wife used a part of it, and, of the rest, put into the hands of the trustee one hundred and fifty dollars, to be returned from time to time as needed for the support of the family; and for this sum the trustee gave his note, payable to her or her order. The trustee stated that he took the money expressly as the bounty money of the husband, and that the wife had no other means of support. The trustee was held chargeable, on the ground that the bounty, having being paid over to the volunteer, was no longer 'bounty,' and as such exempt, but was simply 'money,' not exempt." Does this construction of a statute, intended by the Legislature to encourage and uphold patriotism, to secure from the humiliation of poverty and want the wife and children of the soldier, who has voluntarily offered up his life for his country, carry out the intention of the lawmakers? We think not. In the case of Rutter v. Shumway, 16 Colo. 95, the Supreme Court of Colorado says: "It is claimed by counsel for plaintiff in error that the proper construction of the Act of 1885 is that the wages of the debtor are exempt from garnishment while they remain in the hands of the employer, before payment, but not afterwards." The Act declares: "There shall be exempt from levy under execution, attachment, or garnishment the wages and earnings of any debtor, to an amount not exceeding one hundred dollars, earned during the thirty days next preceding such levy," etc., (literally the same as the Idaho statute). The language is unconditional and absolute, that the wages "shall be exempt from levy under execution, attachment, or garnishment," and the courts cannot justly add words which would tend to defeat or restrict the manifest purpose of the statute. So long as the wages or earnings of the debtor are capable of identification, he is entitled to have them exempt, according to the terms and provisions of the statute. We prefer the broad humanity of the "Cowboy Law" to the cold and technical construction which would make the intended beneficence of the law a mockery and delusion, and take the bread of the soldier and the wage earner from the mouths of his wife and children to glut the maw of an insatiate creditor.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed, and judgment ordered to be entered for plaintiff for the sum of $66.25, and costs, which the clerk of the court below will enter in his judgment docket immediately on receipt of the remittitur from this court, and issue execution thereon.

WYOMING SUPREME COURT.

Anna Elizabeth NEER et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.

Oscar F. COWHICK et al.

(.....Wyo.....)

The recognition of holographic wills by the Wyoming Act of 1891, providing that they may be proved in the same manner as other private writings are proved, does not dispense with the necessity of two witnesses in order to make them valid as in the case of other wills, under Wyo. Rev. Stat., § 2237.

(December 15, 1892.)

ERROR to the District Court of Laramie County to review a judgment refusing to admit to probate the alleged will of John Cowhick, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Potter & Burke, Davidson & Clark, and Charles N. Potter, Atty-Gen., for plaintiffs in error:

The object of the law governing the execution of wills is not to obstruct or make difficult the exercise of that right, but merely to protect the right, to make certain that what is claimed to be the will is the wish of the decedent, and to thus guard against fraud.

Protection under an holographic will as against such dangers is far greater than that under a will that is written entirely by others, and is merely subscribed and acknowledged by the testator in the presence of witnesses. The possibility of fraud through forgery is far less, for while it is possible to forge a signature and to procure two persons who will perjure themselves as witnesses, it is almost impossible to forge an entire instrument.

"The object of the law ceasing, the law itself ceases."

An enactment of the Legislature will be upheld unless it is totally repugnant to the organic law, is so entirely ambiguous as to be incapable of interpretation, or is repealed by subsequent legislation.

1 Bl. Com. p. 87.

There is nothing in chapter 2, § 13, that, is repugnant to any provision of our Constitution. If it is repugnant in any sense, or in any degree, to section 2237 of the Revised Statutes of Wyoming, then the latter section is repealed to the extent that any such repugnancy exists.

NOTE.—On the subject of holographic wills, see also Warwick v. Warwick, 6 L. R. A. 775, and note, 86 Va. 598.

1 Bl. Com. p. 87, note 34; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. par. 288.

There can be no question that the intention of the Legislature was that holographic wills should be proved, and such proof to be made in a certain way. Nor is there any question as to what the words "holographic wills" refer; there is, and never was but one kind of an instrument so denominated.

Sutherland, Stat. Constr. par. 289.

It may be said that section 2237, by requiring all wills to be attested in a certain way, took away from our law the distinctive character of holographic wills.

This cannot be successfully maintained. An attesting witness does not change the character of the instrument.

Re Soher's Estate, 78 Cal. 477.

Suppose this instrument was, prior to January 10, 1891, invalid because of lack of compliance with the Statute of 1882. Yet if, after the writing of the will, and subsequent to the new legislation the testator die, and if, under the statute as it stood at the death of the author of the decedent, the instrument is provable, it shall be proved under the law existing at the time of the author's death, and the property passes under and by virtue of its provisions.

Messrs. A. C. Campbell, Lacey & Van Devanter, for defendants in error:

We have two classes of legislation relating generally to the subject of wills:

First. That legislation which provides the necessary elements without which an instrument shall not be held to be a will.

Second. The method by which a will shall be proved in the probate court.

Of the first class is § 2237 of the Revised Statutes. By this section the Legislature has seen fit to declare that a will to be valid must not only be in writing and signed by the testator but must likewise be witnessed by two competent witnesses.

Holographic wills, or those written out by the testator's own hand, stand on no privileged footing, but require to be attested like any other testaments.

Schouler, Wills, § 255; 4 Kent, Com. *619.

Under our modern statutes, which require a will to be duly executed and attested by a certain number of subscribing witnesses in order to give its effect, there can be no judicial evasion in favor of informal writings.

Schouler, Wills, § 257.

Wyoming Laws 1890-91, p. 247, § 18, relates solely to the manner of proof of holographic wills, and does not, so far as its terms go, attempt to give the essentials of a valid holographic will.

When an affirmative statute contains no expression of a purpose to repeal a prior law it does not repeal it unless the two acts are in irreconcilable conflict, or unless the later statute covers the entire ground occupied by the earlier and is clearly intended as a substitute for it.

Red Rock v. Henry, 106 U. S. 596, 27 L. ed. 251; Chew Heong v. United States, 112 U. S. 586, 28 L. ed. 770.

If by any fair course of reasoning both can be reconciled, they must stand.

Cass v. Dillon, 2 Ohio St. 607; Raudebaugh v. Shelley, 6 Ohio St. 307.

Certainly a fair course of reasoning can find such construction of these two acts as will permit them both to stand.

Ludlow v. Johnston, 8 Ohio, 558, 17 Am. Dec. 609; Dodge v. Gridley, 10 Ohio, 178; Ex parte Smith, 40 Cal. 419; People v. Gustin, 57 Mich. 407; McCool v. Smith, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 459, 17 L. ed. 218; Atty-Gen. v. Brown, 1 Wis. 518.

The holographic, like any other, testament, is a solemn act, depending for its validity upon compliance with the forms prescribed by law; and, however clearly it appears that the decedent intended the instrument to be her will, if it is not clothed with the forms prescribed it cannot stand.

Re Arman's Will, 48 La. Ann. 810; Re Rand's Estate, 61 Cal. 468, 44 Am. Rep. 555.

Groesbeck, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case was submitted to the district court for Laramie county, in the exercise of its probate jurisdiction, on an agreed statement of facts. It appears that one John Young Cowhick, a resident of the city of Cheyenne, in this state, for more than ten years prior to his death, died on the 18th day of June, 1891, in said city, being the owner of and in possession of a large amount of real and personal property situate in the county of Laramie. On the day following his death, one George L. Beard, cashier of the Cheyenne National Bank, found a certain written instrument purporting to be the will of said John Y. Cowhick, in a safety vault box in said banking house, theretofore used by said deceased as a depository for his valuable and private papers, which he, the said Beard, filed on the day of its discovery in the office of the clerk of the district court for Laramie county. The said instrument is wholly in the handwriting of the deceased. It is signed by him, and bears the following indorsement, wholly in the handwriting of the deceased: "Will of John Young Cowhick, 18 L. R. A.

made September 13, 1889." It was enclosed in a sealed envelope, which was indorsed also in the handwriting of decedent as follows: "John W. Collins. To be opened after my death. Will." It was further admitted that the said Cowhick was of sound and disposing mind and memory at the time of signing this instrument, and from that time up to his death, and that he was then over fifty years of age. The said instrument was not witnessed by any person, and was not signed or attested by any witness or witnesses. The will is what is termed an "olographic," or, more properly speaking, a "holographic" will, and the sole question to be determined is whether or not the said instrument is a valid will without being signed or attested by witnesses. At the time of the execution of the instrument it was not a valid will, as it was not witnessed. Section 2287 of the Revised Statutes then provided that "all wills, to be valid, must be in writing, witnessed by two competent witnesses, and signed by the testator, or by some person in his presence, and by his express direction; and, if the witnesses are competent at the time of attesting the execution of the will, their subsequent incompetency, from whatever cause it may arise, shall not prevent the probate and allowance of the will," etc. The first state Legislature enacted a law entitled "An Act Providing for Probate Jurisdiction and Procedure, and Prescribing the Duties of the Courts and Officers in Connection therewith," approved January 10, 1891,—five months before the death of the said John Young Cowhick. Chapter 70, Sess. Laws 1890-91. It provides, among other things, for petitions for probate of wills and hearings thereon, whether contested or not, and the requisite proof to be adduced in support of the will, for administration of estates, and the like. If no person appears to contest a will, it may be admitted to probate on the testimony of one subscribing witness, if he testifies that the will was executed in all particulars as required by law, and that the testator was of sound mind at the time of its execution. Section 12, chap. 2, of the Act. And then follows section 13 of the same chapter: "An olographic will may be proved in the same manner as other private writings are proved." If the will be contested, all the subscribing witnesses who are present in the county, and who are of sound mind, must be produced and examined, and the death, absence, or insanity of any of them must be shown to the court. If none of the subscribing witnesses reside in the county, the court may admit the testimony of other witnesses to prove the sanity of the testator, and the execution of the will; and as evidence of the execution and attestation of the will it may admit proof of the handwriting of the witnesses, or any of them." Section 8, chap. 8, of the Act. Provision for the proof of lost and nuncupative wills is also made. This Act repeals in express terms many provisions of the former law, made obsolete under the constitutional provision conferring the powers and jurisdiction of probate courts under the territorial régime upon district courts. The former statute relating to the competency of testators, the devises of lands, the passing of after-acquired property by the will, and the provisions relating to the execution and attestation of such instruments, were not repealed, although a number of sections relating to the proof of wills succeeding these sections of the Wills Act were repealed expressly. There is no general repeal of inconsistent laws, and the intent of the Legislature is plain to preserve unimpaired section 2287 of the Revised Statutes, requiring all wills to be in writing, signed by the testator, or by some person in his presence, by his express direction, and by two competent witnesses. Holographic wills were of no greater sanctity under the common law than other written wills. Such a will did not have any greater legal force than a will written by a third party, and signed by the testators. The Statute of 32 Hen. VIII. chap. 1, explained by 84 Hen. VIII. chap. 5, did not require witnesses to wills, and it was not until the enactment of the Statute of Frauds and Perjuries (29 Car. II. chap. 3) that witnesses were required to wills. Although, under the Scotch law, holographic writings were considered of higher value than other instruments, because of the difficulty of a successful forgery of them, this regard for such instruments does not seem to have been entertained by the English courts. Such wills grew in favor in this country during the colonial period, where they were generally held good as valid wills of personal property where recognized by statute, and they were favored in the Code Napoleon and in the civil law. The definition of a holographic will is exact; it is a testament written wholly by the testator. Our law of probate procedure is framed after the California Code, but the statute of that state defining such a will, and providing that it need not be witnessed, was not made a part of the Act, and cannot be found in our statutes. We have no provision of statute that dispenses with the necessity of witnesses to holographic wills. In all of the jurisdictions of the Union where such wills are recognized the laws expressly provide that such wills need not be witnessed. Our statute recognizes them, but merely declares that they may be proved in the same manner that other private writings are proved. The California Code of Evidence also provides that any writing may be proved (1) by any one who saw the writing executed, or (2) by evidence of the genuineness of the handwriting of the maker, or (3) by a subscribing witness. We have no such statutory rule of evidence, and we must rely upon the ordinary rules of evidence independently of statute. A private writing may be proved by one subscribing witness. In case there is none, and where the law does not require any, proof may be received of the signature of the maker. But if the law requires subscribing witnesses to such private writings, they must be proved by subscribing witnesses, or, if dead, incompetent, insane, or beyond the jurisdiction, by proof of their signatures. The statute governing the execution of wills yet in force, and not expressly or impliedly repealed, requires all wills, including holographic wills, to be witnessed by two competent witnesses otherwise they cannot be valid. There are no witnesses to the will in the case at bar, and, the law not having excepted holographic wills from the provisions of the statute requiring such written wills, with all other written wills, to be witnessed, the instrument offered for probate is invalid. It was invalid under the law in force at the time of its execution, and, that law not having been repealed or modified, expressly or by implication, the will was invalid at the time of the testator's death. We cannot extend the terms of the statute providing that holographic wills may be proved in the same manner that other private writings are proved, and insert by construction a provision that they need not be witnessed, as that would be judicial legislation. We are forced to the position that the statute relating to proof of holographic wills does not dispense with the necessity of witnesses to them, and that as to such wills the former statute, providing that wills must be witnessed by two competent witnesses, is still in force. The Probate Procedure Act appears to recognize noncupative or oral wills, which is obnoxious to the wills statute, but we are not now considering the validity of such wills, nor passing upon the construction of that part of the Probate Procedure Act. We are unanimously of the opinion that holographic wills must be witnessed to be valid wills.

The judgment of the District Court rejecting the so-called will, and refusing to admit it to probate, is therefore affirmed.

1. An ordinance prohibiting wooden buildings within fire limits, which is enacted under a charter which allows such regulations to be made only by ordinance, cannot be suspended by a simple resolution of

2. No judicial proceeding is necessary to give a city the right to tear down a wooden building erected in violation of an ordinance fixing fire limits.

3. The unlawful issuance of a permit by city officials authorizing the erection of a wooden building within the fire limits although

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Buchanan County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful destruction of a partly erected frame building which was located within the fire limits of the defendant city. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. A. Mosman and B. R. Vineyard for appellant.

Messrs. Huston & Parrish, J. W. Boyd, M. A. Reed and James Limbird for respondents.

Black, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit to recover damages for tearing down a partly constructed frame house belonging to the plaintiff, which was situated within the fire limits of the defendant city, as those limits had been defined by ordinance before any part of the building had been constructed. The defendants other than the city are Hartwig, Westheimer, and McNutt, who were respectively the mayor, acting mayor, and chief of the fire department. The defendants justify under the charter and ordinances. The second section of the Act of February 8, 1865, amending the charter of the city of St. Joseph, (Acts 1865, p. 434,) provides: "The mayor and city council shall have power by ordinance to levy and collect the following taxes, viz.: First. To license, tax, and regulate" numerous occupations and objects, all of which are named. "Tenth.

To regulate, restrain, or prohibit the erection of wooden buildings within such limits as may be prescribed by ordinance, and to provide for the removal of the same at the expense of the owners thereof, when erected and suffered to remain contrary to the ordinances of the city." The defendants set up and put in evidence two ordinances defining the fire limits, and a third, which provides: "Sec. 2. No building shall be erected within the fire limits, . . . unless the same shall be constructed in conformity with the following provision: All outside and party walls shall be made of stone, brick, or other fireproof materials; said walls shall not be less than eight inches in thickness." "Sec. 6. Whenever any wooden building shall be erected, enlarged, or removed, or in process of erection, enlargement, or removal, contrary to the provisions of this chapter, upon information it shall be the duty of the mayor to issue an order to the owner, occupant, person in charge, or builder thereof to have such building taken down or removed to some place outside the fire limits forthwith; and, upon refusal or neglect of such person to comply with the requirements of such order within forty-eight hours after having received the same, the mayor shall cause said building to be removed, and the expense thereof may be recovered of the owner of such building by suit." The other evidence discloses the following facts: A sewer ran across the plaintiff's lot, upon which he first put up the walls of a brick house. These walls fell during a heavy rainfall, and at a meeting of the city council held on the 17th of September, 1884, the defendants Hartwig and Westheimer being present, he presented a petition asking permission to erect a frame building; and "on motion the petition was received and referred to the board of fire engineers and the two members of the council from the third ward, with power to give the permission asked for." This board or committee and the two aldermen signed and gave to the plaintiff written permission to build a frame house, the roof to be covered with tin, and the sides and ends with sheet iron. Defendant Westheimer was one of the persons who signed this permit. Armed with this permit the plaintiff made a contract for the construction of the house, and proceeded with the work. Mayor Hartwig signed and caused to be served on the plaintiff and his contractor a written notice, dated the 2d of October, 1884, stating that the building was within the fire limits, that it did not conform to the ordinance, and directing them to stop work on the building, and "to tear down all parts of said building already erected" within forty-eight hours. Plaintiff testified that the notice was served on him, that he could not give the date of the service, but he thought it was at least two days before the house was taken down. On the 21st of October, 1884, the defendant Westheimer, as acting mayor, signed and addressed to defendant McNutt, as chief of the fire department, this letter or order: "It is the wish of the mayor, his honor, H. R. W. Hartwig, that you notify Mr. Frank Eichenlaub to remove the wooden structure partly erected on lot 8, Logan's addition, within the time allowed by ordinance;" which being shown to the city counselor, he indorsed therein and signed the following instruction: "You must obey the mayor's instructions, and enforce the ordinance." McNutt testified that he employed carpenters, and tore the house down. He says, "I acted in accordance with the papers you have in your hand," (referring to the notice and order, as we understand.) There is evidence tending to show that the carpenters were careless, and destroyed much lumber in removing the building; and, on the other hand, there is evidence that the work was done with due care. At this time the studding was up for two stories, and the north side was boarded, and covered with sheet iron. The floors had not been laid, and the house was not yet under roof. The court directed a verdict for the defendants Hartwig and Westheimer, and as to the other defendants submitted to the jury the question whether McNutt used such care as to cause no more injury to the materials than was necessary; and this issue the jury found for defendants.

1. The first contention on the part of the plaintiff is that the charter power to regulate, restrain, or prohibit the erection of wooden buildings carries with it the power to license the erection of such structures; that, the charter being silent as to the form of the license, the resolution of the council, and the permit issued pursuant thereto by the committee, amount to a license to construct the frame house. Where a charter commits the decision of a matter to the council, and is silent as to the mode of expressing the decision, it may be evidenced by resolution, and need not be in the form of an ordinance. This proposition is well settled by the authorities cited by the plaintiff; but it is just as well settled that, when the mayor is part of the lawmaking power, his concurrence in legislative action is essential to its validity. If the charter provides that the power given must be exercised by ordinance, and it requires the concurrence of the mayor to pass an ordinance, action by a simple resolution of the council is invalid. Saxton v. Deich, 50 Mo. 488; Saxton v. St. Joseph, 60 Mo. 153; Thomson v. Boonville, 61 Mo. 283; Irvin v. Devore, 65 Mo. 627; Trenton v. Coyle, 107 Mo. 194.

By the charter provision before quoted, the limit in which wooden buildings may be regulated, restrained, or prohibited must be defined by ordinance. As to this there can be no question. We think it equally clear that the restraint, regulation, or prohibition must also be by virtue of an ordinance. The words "by ordinance" in the first clause apply to and qualify the tenth clause, as well as the preceding nine clauses. Indeed, the tenth clause makes this clear, for it says the mayor and council shall have power to provide for the removal of wooden buildings when "erected and suffered to remain contrary to the ordinances of the city." The regulation, restraint, or prohibition, whatever it may be, must be evidenced by an ordinance, and a simple resolution of the council is not sufficient. The charter is clear to the effect that every ordinance, before it can become a law, must be presented to the mayor for his approval. This resolution was not presented to the mayor, and is not an ordinance. The mayor and council had in due form enacted the ordinance prohibiting the erection of wooden buildings within the defined district, and the council had no power to repeal, modify, or suspend its operation otherwise than by ordinance. The resolution and permit given thereunder did not have the effect to suspend the operation of the ordinance. That ordinance remained in full force, and the permit amounted to nothing. It could not and did not give the plaintiff any right to erect the frame house. It is doubtless true that under this charter the city of St. Joseph could regulate, instead of prohibiting, the erection of wooden buildings, even in the fire limits. It could fix and determine the regulations by general ordinance, and make it the duty of every person to obtain a permit or license before erecting a building.

With such general ordinance prescribing the regulations a special ordinance in case of each permit would not be necessary. The power to examine the plans of a proposed structure, and to issue the permit, could be delegated to some officer, or the permit could be issued by resolution of the council. But all this does not aid the plaintiff in this case, for the mayor and council had enacted no such general ordinance. The ordinance, and the only ordinance, in force was the one which required all outside and party walls to be of stone, brick, or other fireproof materials. The resolution and permit issued by the committee, to which the plaintiff's petition was referred, undertake to suspend the operation of the ordinance in this particular case, and this the council could not do. It could only be done by the power that enacted the ordinance,—that is to say, by the concurrent act of the mayor and council by an ordinance. The court committed no error in excluding the petition which the plaintiff presented to the council, the resolution referring the same to the committee, and the so-called permit issued by that committee.

2. It is next insisted that the ordinance directing the removal of the building is void because it attempts to justify the destruction of private property without judicial inquiry, and therefore violates that provision of the Constitution which declares "that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law;" and in support of this we are cited to Lourey v. Rainwater, 70 Mo. 152, 85 Am. Rep. 420, and River Rendering Co. v. Behr, 77 Mo. 91. In the first of these cases the defendants, acting pursuant to statutory law, seized and publicly destroyed a table used as a gambling table, without judicial investigation or condemnation. The law was held unconstitutional. It was not the gambling table which constituted the offense, but it was the use to which it was put. Here it is the house itself which violates the law. In the other case a city ordinance was held unconstitutional, which undertook to confer upon one person the right to remove and convert to his own use the carcasses of dead animals not slain for food. It was held that the ordinance could not be upheld as a police regulation; and this, for the reason that it was not necessary to take the property from one and give it to another until the property was in such a condition that it, or the use of it, was likely to become a nuisance. Here the ordinance does not undertake to deprive the plaintiff of his property. The bare statement of these cases is enough to show that they are entirely unlike the one in hand. Many of the powers exercised by municipal corporations are police powers, delegated to the corporations for the public good; and it is well-settled law that every citizen holds his property subject to the exercise of such powers. Such laws and regulations may, and often do, disturb the enjoyment of the property of the citizen; but such laws having that effect do not amount to the taking of private property for public use. They simply regulate the use. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 8d ed. § 141. "All the property and vested rights of individuals are subject to such regulations of police as the Legislature may establish with a view to protect the community and its several members against such use or employment thereof as would be injurious to society or unjust towards other individuals." 2 Story, Const. § 1954. See also Bluedorn v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. (Mo.) 18 S. W. Rep. 1108.

The power of a city to take all reasonable measures to prevent fires and their spread is of the greatest importance, for on its proper exercise depend the lives and property of the citizens; and it is accordingly held by a majority of the courts in this country that municipal corporations have the inherent power to prescribe fire limits, and to regulate or prevent the erection of wooden buildings within such limits, though in a few states it is held such power exists only where it is conferred by express grant. The cases on this subject are collected in 15 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 1170. It is unnecessary here to express any opinion on this question; for in this case the city has the express power to create such limits, and to regulate or prohibit the erection of wooden buildings therein, and to provide for the removal of such buildings when erected or allowed to remain contrary to ordinance.

The real question here is whether the city had the right to tear down the building without any judicial proceeding against the plaintiff, the owner thereof. We find no real conflict in the authorities upon this question; for it is held in many cases that where a municipal corporation has the power to prohibit the construction of wooden buildings in a district defined by ordinance, and has enacted an ordinance to that effect, it may remove any building erected in violation of the ordinance, and this, too, without any judicial proceeding whatever. McKibbin v. Fort Smith, 85 Ark. 852; Klingler v. Bickel, 117 Pa. 326; King v. Davenport, 98 Ill. 805; Baumgartner v. Hasty, 100 Ind. 575, 50 Am. Rep. 880; Hine v. New Haven, 40 Conn. 478. As said in the case last cited: "Police powers of this character are of a high order, and, when a case arises, should be speedily exercised. Delays incident to the ordinary process of the law would seriously impair their efficiency, and could not be tolerated." The right to tear down or remove the prohibited building is analogous to the right which every individual has to abate a nuisance, the limits to which right of the individual we need not stop to consider. The cases cited also show that tearing down such prohibited buildings without judicial proceedings, erected in defiance of law, is not a forfeiture of private property; for as has been said, it is but the exercise of a police power, and not the declaration of a forfeiture. Persons, however, executing the provisions of such ordinances without judicial investigation must be prepared to establish these facts: (1) that the house was erected or permitted to remain in violation of law; and (2) that in tearing down the building reasonable care was taken to preserve the materials. We may add that such ordinance must be reasonable, but there is nothing in this case to show, or tending to show, that this ordinance was or is unreasonable. There is no doubt but the plaintiff began the construction of this frame house, and expended some $500, at least, relying upon the permit, and the case is a hard one; but it must be remembered this ordinance was enacted in the interest of the public good, and neither the council nor the committee had any right or power to license any one to violate the law. The fact that these officials did issue the permit in violation of the law did not estop the city or its officers from enforcing the ordinance. No case cited has any tendency to support the proposition that the officials were by the unauthorized act estopped from executing the ordinance prohibiting the erection of wooden buildings in this fire district.

8. To the ordinance fixing the fire limits, put in evidence by the defendants, the plaintiff objected on the ground that there was no evidence tending to show that it had been passed by the council, which objection was overruled. The records of the council were not offered in evidence, but the document professes on its face to be the original ordinance. It was approved by the mayor and attested by the register, and is under the seal of the city. Rev. Stat. 1879, § 4648, provides: "All ordinances of the city may be known by the seal of the corporation." We cite this section of the general law because we understand the city of St. Joseph had come under the general law before the date of the trial of this case in the circuit court. The ordinance having the seal of the city attached, was properly admitted in evidence. Further proof of its passage by the council was not necessary.

4. It is next insisted that the defendant McNutt stands before the court without a shadow of justification, because the letter or order addressed to him as chief of fire department, dated the 21st of October, 1884, and signed by acting Mayor Westheimer, did not command or even request him to tear down the house. The ordinance, it will be seen, makes it the duty of the mayor to issue an order to the owner of the building to have the same taken down, and upon the neglect of the owner to comply therewith within forty-eight hours after service of the same, it is duty of the mayor to cause the building to be removed. This order or notice was duly issued and served upon the plaintiff, and he neglected to remove the building within the specified time. The ordinance calls for no other or further written order from the mayor. His verbal direction to any one to tear down the house was all that was necessary. Though the letter or order from acting Mayor Westheimer to McNutt is not in words or form an order or even a request to tear down the house, still it is evident that it was understood by both parties as a direction to go on and enforce the ordinance. As a writ or written order was not necessary, the objection is not well taken.

5. The jury found that McNutt and the carpenters employed by him used due care in taking the house down, and no objections are made to the instructions relating to this branch of the case.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

All concur.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

ADVISORY OPINION to the Governor AS TO COMMISSIONING A duly Elected TAX COLLECTOR, Who during the immediately Preceding Term had been Suspended from Office for Neglect of Duty.

(.....Fla.....)

1. A suspension from office and appointment to fill the office under section 15 of article 4 of the Constitution, do not affect the suspended officer's right to qualify for or exercise the duties of a succeeding term of the same office; nor do they prevent a governor succeeding the one who made the suspension from commissioning the suspended officer for the new term.

2. An appointment to fill an office, the incumbent of which has been suspended under section 15 of article 4 of the Constitution, cannot be for a longer period than the remainder of the pending term of the suspended officer, and until the qualification of his successor.

Sir: We have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication dated the 17th inst., in which you state that at the general election in 1890 James E. Johnson was elected tax collector for Duval county, and that he was re-elected to the office at the general election in 1892; that on the 29th day of October, 1892, he was suspended from office by your predecessor Gov. Fleming, for neglect of duty, and on the 26th of November, 1892, E. W. Gillen was commissioned as tax collector of Duval county to act until the adjournment of the next session of the Senate; and you ask an interpretation of the Constitution upon the question of your power and duties as to commissioning Johnson for the term to which he was elected in the year 1892.

The Constitution (sec. 13, art. 4) authorizes the governor to require our opinion "as to the interpretation of any portion of this Constitution upon any question affecting his executive powers and duties," and it makes it our duty to render an opinion in writing. The duty thus devolved upon us by the Organic Law goes no further than the interpretation of the Constitution upon some particular question affecting your executive power and duties.

Any question of executive duty involves necessarily that of executive power. The question of your power under the facts stated by you involves that of the effect of the suspension made by your predecessor. At the time of this suspension Johnson was holding the office of tax collector of Duval county for the term commencing on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in January, 1891, and to end on the corresponding Tuesday of January, 1893. From this term of office he was suspended on the 29th day of October, 1892, for neglect of duty in office, and the effect of the suspension was to arrest and take away from him the right and power to perform the duties of the office. This deprivation or arrest of the power and right to exercise the functions of the office until the Senate shall act, or fail to act, at its next ensuing session, is the effect which the Constitution has attached to the executive ascertainment of the official delinquency which the order of suspension affirms; and there is but one other limitation to this effect, and that is the power of the governor to reinstate at any time, at least until the Senate may meet, which power adheres to the executive office, to be exercised whenever the governor finds that the circumstances of any case justify it. If the Senate meets and refuses to concur with the governor in a removal of the officer for the cause stated in the order of suspension, or if it meets and adjourns without taking action upon the matter, the law restores the officer; while, if the Senate concurs in a removal of the officer, his right to the office is, in effect, adjudged to have been taken away and forfeited as from the date of the order of suspension, or at least the notice thereof, as the penal consequence of the delinquency stated in the order of suspension and recognized by the Constitution. Section 15, art. 4. When the Senate meets pending the term of the office from which the suspension has been made, and fails to act, or refuses to remove the restoration is to the exercise of the functions of the place for the balance of such pending term, and also to the salary or compensation for the time he was suspended; whereas, if it does not meet until after the term, then there can be no restoration, except to the right to the salary or other compensation for the time of suspension. Had the Senate met in special session between the day the order of suspension was made in this case and the first Tuesday after the first Monday of January of the present year, and adjourned without taking action on the question of Johnson's removal, or had it refused to remove him, the restoration would have been to the term from which he was suspended; or, meeting thus, had it removed him, the removal would have been from that term of office, and the combined executive and senatorial action would have had no effect upon his right to any future term. The delay of senatorial action, sometimes necessitated, in the absence of a special session, by the system of biennial sessions of the Legislature, to a period subsequent to the termination of the term from which there is suspension, cannot enlarge or change the effect of that action, or of the antecedent executive action. The final consummation intended by a suspension must, as shown in State v. Johnson (Fla.) 18 L. R. A. 410, (lately decided) always be a removal of the officer; and this removal is for the remainder of the term from which he is suspended, and nothing more. The remainder of the existing term is, including its incidents and rights, in our judgment, all the removal can act on or affect. There is certainly no express provision in the organic law that it shall affect any other term; nor is the officer in the exercise of other official functions than those covered by his title to the pending term.

Again, the Constitution has not given to the suspension or removal the effect of disqualifying the suspended or removed person from holding the same or any other office in the future; on the contrary, not only is there an utter absence of any such provision, but an intention that it shall not have this effect is also shown in a separate and distinct declaration of what the framers of the Constitution and the people intended should have that effect, which declaration is to be found in the fifth section of the sixth article. That section directs the Legislature to enact the necessary laws to exclude from every office of honor, power, trust, or profit, civil or military, within the state, all persons convicted of bribery, perjury, larceny, or of infamous crime, and for other causes therein stated, yet provides that this legal disability shall not accrue until after trial and conviction in due form of law. The legislation enforcing this section is to be found in the Revised Statutes, § 211; and the 214th section enacts that every office shall be deemed vacant upon the conviction of the incumbent of any felony or of an offense involving a violation of his official oath.

The limited effect which it was intended that the suspensions and removals under discussion should have is also shown by the provision of the section which authorizes them, (sec. 15, art. 4.) that "the suspension or removal herein authorized shall not relieve the officer from indictment for any misdemeanor in office."

A suspension or removal not having of itself the effect to taint the person or officer, either while suspended or after removal, with any disqualification to hold any office, we are unable to see how it can affect his right to exercise the functions of a future term of the same office. He is as qualified for or as eligible to election to a future term pending the suspension, or after the removal, as he was before the suspension. If the suspension under consideration had been made before the general election in October, it would not have impaired the right of the people to elect Johnson to the new term commencing on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in the present month; and a removal by the Senate subsequent to such election, and pending the old term, would not have rendered him ineligible to enter upon the office and perform its duties. Such removal, made at the time just indicated, would have taken from him 18 L. R. A.

forever the office and all its emoluments for the remainder of the term, or from the day of the suspension until the Tuesday last named; but it would have taken nothing more, nor had any other effect whatever upon his rights or capacities as to official station or his power to qualify under section 7 of article 8 of the Constitution, hereafter mentioned, for any such station to which he might have been elected.

How the mere suspension can in any way have a larger or more extended operation or disabling effect, or how it can derive additional potency from the mere postponement of the action of the body whose concurrence is essential to make the suspension a removal, we cannot see or find reason. Perhaps it may be said that it is contrary to good public policy that a person who has been suspended during one term of an office should be permitted to enter upon the duties of a subsequent term of the same office, pending such suspension. To this the answer is that a public policy which would impose upon the citizen disabilities as to official station must at least be consistent with the organic law which defines the requisites for such station, and not antagonistic thereto. If the Constitution attached to the removal, whenever it might be consummated by the concurrence of the Senate, a disability to hold the succeeding or future term or terms of the same office, it might naturally and logically follow that, pending the suspension, the functions of the succeeding term could not be performed, but where it fails entirely, as it does, to give even the removal, whenever consummated, any such effect, no room is left as a standing place for any such theory of public policy. We cannot extend by implication, or by inferences founded upon what might seem to be a wholesome public policy, the effect of a constitutional provision of a penal character, or give to the suspension or removal any result which is not clearly inferable from the terms of the Constitution, but must confine its consequence within the limits which are plainly ascribed to it by the organic law. It is penal in its nature, and is to be strictly construed as to its effect, yet it does not seem to us to be necessary to invoke this rule to reach the conclusion we have intimated.

Our opinion is that the suspension by your predecessor, Gov. Fleming, is confined in its legal effect, as it is in fact, to the term of office existing at the time the suspension was made, and had of itself no effect upon Johnson's title, capacity, or right to hold and exercise the office for the term which began on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in the present month, to which term, you say, he was chosen at the last general election.

As intimated above, the Constitution contemplates that county officers, including tax collectors, chosen at the general election of October last, should have entered upon the duties of their offices on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of the present month, (sec. 14, art. 18,) and it also requires that all county officers, except assistant assessors of taxes, shall, before entering upon their duties, be commissioned by the governor, but that no such commission shall issue to any such officer until he shall have filed with the secretary of state a good and sufficient bond in such sum and on such conditions as the Legislature shall by law prescribe, approved by the county commissioners of the county in which the officer resides and by the comptroller, (sec. 7, art. 8.) The Legislature has prescribed the amount and condition of the bonds of tax collectors. Rev. Stat. §§ 616, 617. The section of the Constitution last cited also provides that, if any person elected or appointed to any county office shall fail to give bond and qualify within sixty days after his election, the office shall become vacant; and it and section 13, of article 16, and the Revised Statutes, §§ 616, 620, 621, make provision as to sureties.

The fact that the terms of Gillen's commission are that he shall hold office until the adjournment of the next session of the Senate, to which fact we have given the careful consideration due it, does not, as was decided in State v. Johnson, referred to above, confer upon Gillen any other or greater tenure of office than the Constitution gives him. In our judgment, the term of such an appointee can never be longer than the remainder of the term of the officer suspended and until the qualification of his successor. The appointment is to fill "any office" the incumbent of which has been suspended. Section 21, art. 4. Had another person than Johnson been chosen in October last for the term commencing this month, certainly Gillen's tenure would have terminated with Johnson's, and could not have lasted longer than the qualification of the successor. Section 14, art. 16.

The result of these views is that the Constitution contemplates the commissioning of Johnson under his re-election, notwithstanding the mere fact of his suspension and the appointment of Gillen by your predecessor, if Johnson has not been delinquent in giving bond and qualifying.

This is the extent of your inquiry, as we understand it, and we consequently omit any discussion of the power of an executive under the Constitution to further suspend for an act committed prior to the term in which such order may be made. Very respectfully,

Geo. P. Raney, Ch. J.

A planter or farmer keeping a store on his plantation, and selling goods and liquors to his employes exclusively, falls under the terms of the law exacting a license from every one "doing a business of selling at retail."

(Fenner and Breaux, JJ., dissent.)

(January 2, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for the Parish of Plaquemines in favor of plaintiff in an action to enforce payment of the license fee for carrying on business as a retail merchant and liquor dealer. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Gibson & Hall and R. L. Tullis for appellant.

Mr. Robert Hingle for appellee.

Nicholls, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On a rule taken by plaintiff against the defendant, the latter was "condemned to pay one hundred and five dollars, with 5 per cent on said amount for lawyers' fees, and all costs," for a license for carrying on business as retail merchant and liquor dealer. The defendant, in answer, pleaded the general issue, and denied specially that he was a retail merchant owing a license. He avers that he keeps a store on his plantation, in which are sold only such goods and merchandise as are needed on his plantation, and that he makes no sales to the general public, or to persons other than his laborers on the plantation; that defendant, being engaged in agriculture, is otherwise exempt from license taxation by the Constitution of this state and that of the United States. On trial of the case plaintiff testified that defendant is the owner of Belle Chasse plantation; that he knows that he carries on the business of retail merchant and liquor dealer; that he made demand on him for a license for carrying on the business of liquor dealer and retail merchant; and that he answered that he did not owe any license, because he sold only to hands employed by him on his plantation. This witness was not cross-examined. Defendant's manager testified that there was no store on the plantation wherein merchandise was sold to any persons other than the plantation laborers; that supplies are sold only to the hands employed thereon; that he himself, and not the defendant, attended to the store; that several applications by persons who did not reside on the plantation were made for the sale of supplies, and that he positively refused to sell to any one but those employed on the place; that the sales were restricted to the incidental supplies required by the laborers on the plantation; that no sales were made to any person working on the levees who were not connected with the plantation; that there were about fifty-eight men employed on the plantation, with the exception of two other men, who are ditching on the place, who live at Little Rock; that all the rest reside on the plantation; that groceries in general were sold in the store, also liquors; that the profits are merely enough to pay the man for keeping the store, and the freight and general expenses of the store; that it was kept merely for the accommodation of the hands, and not with a view of making any profit; that the liquor was sold to no persons other than those employed on the plantation, that the ditchers when to work every morning, and remained until night; that the nearest public store to the plantation was two miles off. The defendant, on appeal, claims that, under these pleadings and evidence, the judgment of the district court should be reversed. He relies greatly on the case of Luling v. Labranche, 30 La. Ann. 973, and asserts that there is a difference between his position and that of Dymond, (the defendant in the case of Thibaut v. Dymond, 37 La. Ann. 902,) in this: that it was shown that in the Dymond store sales were made to outsiders, whereas the evidence in this case establishes the fact that he dealt exclusively with his employés. For the purposes of this case we will assume this last statement to be correct, and examine the defendant's right on that theory.

We have referred to Act No. 123 of 1866 (p. 236) and Act No. 89 of 1868 (p. 119,) alluded to in 30 La. Ann. 973, and find that the former Act was an Act entitled "An Act to Authorize Planters and Farmers to Furnish Their Freedmen and other Employés with Articles of Merchandise without Incurring the Penalties of Retail Merchants," and that it was evidently passed to "exempt planters and farmers" so dealing with their employés from the operation (under which they would otherwise fall) of the existing general law by which retail merchants were required to pay a license; and we also find that Act No. 89 of 1868 was entitled "An Act to Repeal an Act Entitled 'An Act to Authorize Planters to Furnish Their Freedmen and Other Employés with Articles of Merchandise without Incurring the Penalty of Retail Merchants,' approved March 21, 1866," and that it reads as follows: "Whereas the Act of the Legislature the title of which is set forth in the title of the present Act is against the interests of the laborer, and an Act of injustice to the paying storekeeper, be it enacted," etc., "that the same be repealed." It is conceded in the case of Luling v. Labranche, that the passage of Act No. 123 of 1866 is a clear legislative interpretation of the words "retail merchant" in the antecedent license law, and that, but for the Act of 1866, merchants and farmers furnishing their employés with supplies would fall under the terms of the Revenue Act, and that the second Act was intended to deprive the planters who thus sold of the benefit of the latter statute; but the court goes on to declare that the effect of this repeal is to leave "the question as a judicial one," since the "designation of a class would then appear in the Revenue Act, without any explanatory or qualifying interpretation elsewhere. We think the court was mistaken in saying that the farmers and planters mentioned were exempted from license as retail merchants simply by a declaration in the Act of 1866 that they did not fall under the definition of the words "retail merchant." They were exempted by force of a direct affirmative exemption, one which the court rightly declared inconsistent with their being not held by a license before. We think the court was also mistaken in saying that, when the Exemption Law was repealed, it left the meaning of the words "retail merchants" a judicial question, without any explanatory or qualifying interpretation elsewhere. We do not see how the repealing of an "exemption" law, when the repealing statute assigns as a reason for the repeal that the further continuance of the exemption was against "the interests of laborers, and an injustice to tax-paying storekeepers," could be held to bring about the very reverse of what the Repealing Act declared to be its purpose. We do not think the matter was "set at large" by this repeal, but that the original legislative interpretation of the words gained, on the contrary, additional strength thereby. It was the exemption, and not the interpretation, which was repealed. We are of the opinion that the words of the present law that a license is exacted "for any business of selling at retail" reach the case of the defendant, both under legislative and judicial construction, and that he is liable, as claimed by the plaintiff. To construe the law otherwise would be to place it outside of the rule of equality and uniformity. Defendant's manager testifies that the store on defendant's plantation was not kept with a view of profit; that the profits are merely enough to pay the man for keeping the store, and the freight and general expenses of the store. The motive which the defendant might have in keeping the store on his place is not the controlling factor in the case. We think the preamble of the Repealing Act of 1868 is as applicable now as it was then, and that it would be "against the interests of the laborers, and an injustice to the tax-paying storekeepers" to sustain defendant's position, and we have no reason to believe that the Legislature has changed its view on that subject.

The conclusions we have reached do away with the necessity of an examination of the question raised in defendant's brief as to whether a liquor license was demandable of him unless and until it had been determined that he was a retail merchant; his claim being that he would be only liable as a liquor dealer when it should have been established that he sold liquors in connection with business as a retail merchant. We understand the defendant to contend in his brief that, granting his liability to pay a license, there is not sufficient evidence in the record to justify a payment of the amount which he has been condemned to pay. There are several reasons why we cannot accede to his views. It was defendant's duty, if liable, to have gone forward and demanded a license at the beginning of the year, presenting an exact statement of his situation. Not only did he fail to do this, but, when applied to for payment, he, without contesting the amount claimed, denied, as he still denies, all liability. Not only has he not pleaded that he was "overcharged," but when plaintiff, in connection with the demand set up by him, testified that he knew defendant to be a retail merchant and liquor dealer, defendant failed to take the stand as a witness. If he was overcharged, he was better informed and better able to show that fact than any one else, and he should have done so after his default.

For the reasons herein assigned, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the judgment of the District Court be, and the same is hereby affirmed.

Fenner, J., dissenting:

The claim is for a license under the License Act of 1890, and under that clause of the Act which levies a license on the "business of selling at retail," or, as elsewhere designated in the Act, the business of "retail merchant." Under a like statute, imposing a license on "retail merchants," or, as otherwise described, "for keeping a retail store," this court held: "A person whose business or avocation is that of planter or manufacturer, and who keeps in store only such goods and wares as his employes require, and who sells to them alone, and not to the general public, and who sells not as a retail dealer does, exclusively for the profit, but only as an advance to his laborers and an incident to his main business, and to promote its better administration, is not a 'retail dealer,' within the meaning of the Revenue Act; and the tax or license imposed upon that class of persons by that Act is not legally demandable from him." (Italics ours.) Luling v. Labranche, 80 La. Ann. 972. This case was substantially affirmed in a later decision, where the court referred to it, and said: "Granting that the law, as it now stands, would not justify the exaction of a license where sales from a plantation store were confined strictly to the laborers on the place, still, where this restriction is not observed," etc. Thibaut v. Dymond, 37 La. Ann. 902. The first decision was rendered in 1878,—fourteen years ago. The Legislature has passed numerous license laws since that date in any of which it was perfectly competent to subject to license plantation stores selling exclusively to their own laborers, by express description; but, instead of doing so, it continued to employ the same general words, which had been held by this court not to include such stores.

It is conceded that defendant in this case keeps a plantation store, and sells exclusively to his laborers and employes. He, and the thousands of planters in like case, had the right to suppose that they could conduct such business without subjecting themselves to license, under the interpretation placed on the statutes by this court, which he was authorized and bound to accept. If we now reverse the decisions, all planters who have conducted such business will find themselves liable for licenses for all years within the prescriptive term. If there was error in those decisions, it has been condoned by subsequent legislative acquiescence; and, independently of this, it furnishes the strongest possible case for application of the rule of stare decisis. As said by Mr. Sutherland, in his very recent work on the subject: "A judicial construction of a statute becomes a part of it, and, as to rights which accrue afterwards, it should be adhered to for the protection of those rights. To divest them by a change of the construction is to legislate retroactively." Suth. Stat. Const. par. 319. So far as contract rights acquired on the faith of such adjudications are concerned, the Supreme Court of the United States has held: "After a statute has been settled by judicial construction, the construction becomes, so far as contract rights under it are concerned, as much a part of the statute as the text itself; and a change of decision is to all intents and purposes the same in its effect on contracts as an amendment of the law by legislative enactment." Douglas v. Pike County, 101 U. S. 677, 25 L. ed. 968. No reason can be given for a distinction between contract and other rights acquired, in good faith, by action on the faith of such construction. If instead of a license, it was a criminal penalty resulting to defendant from our change of decision, he would undoubtedly be protected by the constitutional inhibition against ex post facto laws. "Whatever might be our impressions were the matter res integra, we deem it important, in the construction of statutes, to adhere to what has already been adjudged. The judicial interpretation becomes, as it were, a part of the statute, and should not be changed but for most cogent reasons." State v. Thompson, 10 La. Ann. 122. "A cardinal rule in dealing with written instruments is that they are to receive an unvarying interpretation, and that their practical construction is to be uniform. A constitution is not to be made to mean one thing at one time, and another at some subsequent time." Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 67. "As a general rule and particularly in regard to the construction of statutes, courts adhere strictly to the decisions of their predecessors. 'Thirty-four years have nearly passed,' said Lord Kenyon construing a special statute for the observance of the Lord's day 'since the decision in Rez v. Cox, 2 Burr. 787, which informed the public that all bakers have a right to do what is imputed to this defendant as an offense. This circumstance alone should have weight in the determination of this case;' and, the words being doubtful, the original decision was adhered to." Sedgw. Stat. & Const. Law, p. 215. "There are many questions upon which there is no objection to a change of decision other than grows out of those general considerations which favor certainty and stability of the law. There are questions where the decisions did not constitute a business rule, and where a change would invalidate no business transactions conducted upon the faith of the first adjudication; . . . but where a decision relates to certain modes of doing business, which business enters largely into the transactions of the people of a state, and a change of decision must invalidate everything done in the mode prescribed by the first, when a decision has once been made and acted on for any considerable length of time, the maxim becomes imperative, and no court is at liberty to change." Suth. Stat. Const. par. 317. The fact that this is a different statute from the first construed does not affect the case. It is a statute on the same subject-matter, using the same language to express the same meaning; and every one had the right to suppose it continued to have the same meaning and effect which the first decision determined it had. The fact that the Legislature did not change the language signified its acquiescence in the construction given, and thus powerfully reinforces the reasons for applying the maxim. I find nothing in the change of constitutions of the state having any bearing on the case. I am therefore compelled to dissent.

Breaux, J., dissenting:

I have no dissent to express from the interpretation of the statute in said case as stated by the majority of the court. The decisions of this court heretofore unreversed formed the law, and entered into the body of precedents. The ruling in making the change might, for the purpose of settling all questions, embrace the possible issue as to whether any demand can be made for previous years for amount and penalty. The implied guaranty of the state not to disturb past final settlements, under existing precedents, are questions which may now be decided, and thereby add to the certainty and security of judicial interpretation.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT, SECOND DIVISION.

Sarah H. YARNELL, Resp't.,

v.

KANSAS CITY, FT. SCOTT & MEMPHIS R. CO., App't.

(.....Mo.....)

1. A railroad train may be started without waiting for a passenger to reach a seat after he has entered the vehicle unless there is some special reason to the contrary, as in the case of a weak or lame person.
2. Alighting from the train and assisting passengers to enter it is no part of the duty of the employés on a passenger train where access to the cars is easy, a neglect of which resulting in injury can be the basis of an action.
3. Time need not be given for a person who has entered a railroad train merely to assist passengers in getting on to leave the train where no notice is given of his intent to get off.
4. The presumption of negligence on the part of a railroad company cannot be based on the presumption that a person who was killed by the train as it started was in the exercise of due care where it does not appear whether he was killed while getting off the train or while standing too near it.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Howell County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Sherwood, J.:

Action for damages for the death of plaintiff's husband, the petition claiming that such death was caused by the negligence of the defendant, in the manner following, to wit: That plaintiff's husband, at 8 o'clock A. M. on July 7, 1890, took his two daughters to Bransville, a station on defendant's road, to put them on a passenger train due about that hour; that, when arrived, no employé of defendant appeared to assist his daughters upon the train, and that he helped them upon it; "that before he could get them safely on said train the servants and employes of defendant carelessly and negligently started said train in motion, and that the said Yarnell, alighting therefrom, fell, and was run over and killed by defendant's said train of cars; that said train barely stopped at said depot and station, and wholly failed to give said parties time to get aboard thereof; that in consequence of the negligent failure of defendant's servants and employes to alight from said train, and assist passengers thereon, and the negligent failure of defendant's servants and employes to have lights on said platform and at said station, as aforesaid, and in consequence of the negligent starting of said train before passengers had time to get aboard thereof, the said Robert M. Yarnell was run over and killed by defendant's train of cars, as aforesaid." A second count in the petition contained substantially the same averments as the first, with the following in addition: "That the platform at said station was out of repair, and unsafe for use by the public; that it was rotten and broken in many places, and that, in attempting to alight from said moving train, deceased stepped on a decayed plank in the platform, which broke, and caused him to fall back under the train, by which he was killed, and that the negligence of defendant in having an unsafe platform caused his death." The answer contained a general denial, and a plea of contributory negligence, and plaintiff replied. Having introduced her testimony, the plaintiff rested, after having dismissed as to her second count, and the court instructed the jury to disregard any testimony on that count. Defendant declined to offer any testimony, but demurred to that offered by plaintiff, which demurrer was overruled. Under the instructions given the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $5,000, and judgment went accordingly, from which defendant appeals. The record has been printed in full and has been carefully read. The testimony, in substance, shows this state of facts: Robert M. Yarnell, the husband of plaintiff, was a strong, active man, nearly forty-four years old, at the time of the accident which is the basis of this action. He lived, with his family, some seven miles from the station of Brandville. About 2 o'clock on the morning of the 7th day of July, 1890, he went with his two daughters,—one married, and the other single,—to Brandville, to put them aboard the cars of the defendant company. George Wall, a cousin of the young ladies, accompanied the party. The daughters were going to the home of one of them, Mrs. Curry, who lived near McDonald. Arriving at Brandville at about 8:15 A. M., the party proceeded to the depot, where the father bought tickets for his daughters, only, as neither he nor Wall intended to become a passenger. There were no lights on the platform of the station; but the moon was shining, and, when the expected train arrived, it stopped, and the agent brought out a light, and the party proceeded to get on the train. The father and George Wall assisted the young ladies to get on the train, and George Wall, taking the two valises from the hands of the father, left him either standing on the bottom step of the car, or else on its platform, or else on the depot platform, and went with the ladies through the car which they first entered, and to the second or third seat of the next or chair car, where the ladies obtained seats. About that time the train started. Leaving the ladies and the valises, Wall went to the platform of the car, where he saw a negro, whom he took for the porter, standing on the steps, looking backward. This, if the porter, was the only employé, aside from the agent of the defendant company, that Wall saw, up to that time. Nor had any persons been seen by Wall and his party getting off or on the train. He then jumped off the train, and estimated that the point where he got off was 25 or 30 feet above the end of the depot platform. When he reached the end of the depot platform, he found Yarnell there, dead; having been decapitated, it would seem, by the cars. The body lay on its side, at the upper end of the platform, between the platform and the rail. The right foot was fastened under the platform, and the head of the deceased "was just apast the end" of the platform. There was blood on the rail where the corpse lay, but there were no indications that the body had been dragged. How far the "switch" is from the depot, does not appear, nor how long the depot platform is; but when the switch was reached the conductor came from the back of the car on which the ladies were, stopped the train, and said to the ladies, "The old gentleman has been hurt," helped them to alight, and they went back to the scene of the accident. How long the car stopped at the time the daughters of plaintiff took passage cannot be told. Wall, testifying on this point, said "about a minute;" Mary Yarnell, that the train started "just about the time we got seated." In response to the question whether the train stopped, Mrs. Curry said, "Yes, sir, it did;" but, being pressed by counsel to say "about how long," replied: "Hardly a stop. It was almost moving all the time." All the testimony respecting the condition of the depot platform having been properly excluded by the court from the consideration of the jury, when the plaintiff dismissed as to the second count in her petition, such testimony forms no part of this record, and will not be further noticed.

Messrs. Wallace Pratt, L. P. Dana and Olden & Orr, for appellant

The demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained, because:

1. There was no evidence of any negligence towards any one on the part of defendant or its employes, as alleged in the petition or in any respect.

Raben v. Central Iowa R. Co. 74 Iowa, 783; Straus v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. 75 Mo. 185; Hurt v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 94 Mo. 255; Gurley v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 104 Mo. 228; Roddy v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 12 L. R. A. 746, 104 Mo. 244; Patterson, Railway Accident Law, §§ 7, 258; Williams v. Kansas City, S. & M. R. Co. 96 Mo. 284; Shaw v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 104 Mo. 654; Clotworthy v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 80 Mo. 220; Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Lawton, 15 L. R. A. 494, 55 Ark. 428.

2. There was no evidence of any failure on the part of defendant in any duty it owed deceased, nor did the petition aver any such failure.

Coleman v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 84 Ga. 1, 40 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 690; Griswold v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 64 Wis. 652, 23 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 468; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Crunk, 119 Ind. 542, 41 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 158; Imhoff v. Chicago & M. R. Co. 20 Wis. 344; Lucas v. New Bedford & T. R. Co. 6 Gray, 64, 66 Am. Dec. 406.

3. There was no evidence of what caused the death of plaintiff's husband, or of how it happened.

Schlereth v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 96 Mo. 509; Boren v. Chicago, B. & K. O. R. Co. 95 Mo. 268; Murray v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 101 Mo. 236; Stepp v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 85 Mo. 229.

It would be no proof of negligence on the part of defendant even as to the passengers—the two women—if the trainmen had not alighted and offered to assist them upon the train, even if afforded an opportunity to do so, for defendant did not owe them that duty.

Raben v. Central Iowa R. Co., Straus v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co., Hurt v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co., Gurley v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. and Roddy v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. supra; Patterson, Railway Accident Law, p. 7.

The duty of defendant to its passengers was to stop its train at this way station for a reasonable time, in order that passengers might get off or on the cars with safety.

Patterson, Railway Accident Law, p. 258; Straus v. Kansas City, St. J. & O. B. R. Co., Clotworthy v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co., Hurt v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. and Lawton v. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. supra.

The instruction given at plaintiff's request was erroneous and improper:

1. Because it failed to submit to the jury the question of whether or not it was necessary for Mr. Yarnell to go upon the train, but virtually told them that if defendant's servants failed to assist his daughters it was necessary for him to go.

To assume in an instruction a material fact in issue is error.

Stoher v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 91 Mo. 509; Peck v. Ritchey, 66 Mo. 114.

2. Because it singles out and calls attention to an isolated fact, namely, the failure of defendant's servants to appear and assist Mr. Yarnell's daughters upon the train.

This was a comment on the testimony which was improper.

Barr v. Kansas City, 105 Mo. 558; Jones v. Jones, 57 Mo. 138; Forrester v. Moore, 77 Mo. 660; Kendig v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 79 Mo. 207; Chouteau v. Jupiter Iron Works, 83 Mo. 83.

The theory of the petition was evidently quite different from that on which the instruction was framed.

Ely v. St. Louis, K. O. & N. R. Co. 77 Mo. 84; Price v. St. Louis, K. O. & N. R. Co. 72 Mo. 414; Bohn v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 106 Mo. 429; Harty v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 95 Mo. 368.

The instruction did not confine the jury to the negligence alleged in the petition.

Dahlstrom v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 96 Mo. 99; Melvin v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 89 Mo. 106.

Sherwood, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The controlling question in this case, as already seen, is whether the testimony adduced to support the first count in the petition is sufficient to sustain the verdict. It will have been observed that the gravamen of the petition is contained in its concluding words: "That said train barely stopped at said depot and station, and wholly failed to give said parties time to get aboard thereof; that in consequence of the negligent failure of defendant's servants and employes to alight from said train, and assist passengers thereon, and the negligent failure of defendant's servants and employes to have lights on said platform and at said station, as aforesaid, and in consequence of the negligent starting of said train before the passengers had time to get aboard thereof, the said Robert M. Yarnell was run over and killed by defendant's train of cars, as aforesaid."

1. It is quite clear from the testimony that the daughters of the plaintiff "did have time to get aboard," and even to be seated, before the train started. But, under the authorities, the defendant company did not need to wait till the passengers were seated before the cars started. "As soon as the passenger has fairly entered the vehicle, the carrier may start, without waiting for him to reach a seat, unless there is some special reason for doing so, as in the case of weak or lame person, or of a passenger on the outside of a coach, and the ground of the exception must be brought to the carrier's notice, or he will be justified in starting in the usual manner." 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. § 508. So that neither upon the facts nor the law is the plaintiff entitled to recover on this charge in the petition.

In the circumstances heretofore related, it was no part of the duty of the defendant's employes to "alight from said train, and assist the passengers thereon," and negligence cannot, therefore, be based on such alleged failure. When access to the cars of a railway company is easy, as in the case at bar, such assistance cannot be claimed as a matter of right. 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 510. It has been ruled that it is not the duty of the employes of a railway company to assist a passenger in alighting from a train. Raben v. Central Iowa R. Co. 74 Iowa, 732. This was substantially the view taken by this court in Hurt v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 94 Mo. 255. See also Sevier v. Vicksburg & M. R. Co. 61 Miss. 8, 48 Am. Rep. 74. And obviously the reasoning which denies the right of assistance to a passenger from a train would also deny it in getting on a train. The two cases cannot be distinguished in principle.

As before stated, the testimony shows that on the night of the accident the moon was shining; and there is no testimony indicating, in the slightest degree, that the absence of stationary lights from the platform had any connection with the injury, nor does it appear that the defendant company's employes were aware of Yarnell's being on the train in any other capacity than that of a passenger, if, indeed, they were aware that he was on the train at all; and there is no testimony on either of these points. There is not a particle of testimony that Yarnell entered the cars in attendance on his daughters, so that the doctrine of the right to "welcome a coming or speed a departing guest" has no application here; and it is to be noted that the petition does not count upon the failure of duty on the part of the defendant's employes towards him. The charge of failure of duty on the part of the defendant company consisted in "the negligent starting of said train before the passengers had time to get aboard thereof;" and it is not charged that sufficient time was not given Yarnell to get off the train, or that the company had any notice of his desire in that particular, nor, if there had been such a charge, would there have been any evidence to support it. Even if Yarnell had actually been upon the train in attendance upon his daughters, and had intended to leave the train after seeing them to their seats, there is no testimony, as before stated, that the company's servants had any knowledge of this fact. The authorities are virtually unanimous in holding that, unless knowledge of such a purpose is communicated to the company's servants, no duty arises to hold the train for a reasonable time in order that such purpose may be accomplished. Griswold v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 64 Wis. 652; Coleman v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 84 Ga. 1; Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Lawton, 55 Ark. 428, 15 L. R. A. 484, and cases cited; Lucas v. New Bedford & S. R. Co. 6 Gray, 64, 66 Am. Dec. 642; Imhoff v. Chicago & M. R. Co. 20 Wis. 344. In such cases the duty is dependent upon the knowledge of the carrier, and the negligence upon the nonperformance of the ascertained duty. Without the presence of these constituent elements, liability, which is but the legitimate result of a known and nonperformed legal duty, cannot exist.

The foregoing remarks, and the authorities which abundantly support them, show that the court below erred in giving, at plaintiff's instance, the following instruction: "The court instructs the jury that if you believe and find, from all the facts and circumstances in evidence, that the husband of plaintiff, Robert M. Yarnell, took his two daughters to defendant's train, and that when defendant's train arrived at Brandsville station the defendant's servants failed to appear, and assist said Yarnell's daughters on said train, then said Yarnell had the right to assist his daughters on such train; and if the jury further believe that the said Yarnell did go upon the platform of defendant's train to assist his daughters on the train, in the absence of defendant's servants, then the said Yarnell had a right so to do; and that if defendant's servants started said train before said Yarnell had time to alight from said train, and in alighting from such train he did so as speedily and carefully as possible, and was killed in so doing, without negligence and carelessness on his part, then they will find the issues for the plaintiff, and assess her damages in the sum of five thousand dollars." And it may be further observed of this instruction that it is a departure from the cause of action, as set forth in the petition, in that it introduces a new element of liability,—one unknown to the petition,—to wit, that "the defendant's servants started said train before said Yarnell had time to alight from said train."

2. This record is utterly barren of any testimony showing, or tending to show, how or in what way Yarnell came to his unfortunate death. His locality at the time his daughters and Wall left him on entering the cars—whether he was on the bottom step of the car, on the car platform, or on the depot platform—is entirely unknown; and it is equally unascertained and unascertainable, whether his death resulted from an attempt to alight from the cars while in motion, and he was thus thrown beneath them and killed, or whether, having alighted, he ventured too close to the cars, and was struck by them as they started, and hurled to his death. It has been suggested that it will be presumed that Yarnell was in the exercise of "due care." This may be granted; but, while indulging this presumption, it must not be forgotten that every one is presumed to properly acquit himself of his engagements and his duty, (Lenox v. Harrison, 88 Mo. 491, and cases cited,) and that carriers of passengers are by no means outside of the pale of this favorable presumption. So that the result is that one presumption rebuts and neutralizes the other, like the conjunction of an acid and an alkali. Again, we are asked to presume that the deceased was in the exercise of due care. This presumption is evidently invoked in order that, if "due care" be presumed on the part of the deceased, it may then be presumed that the defendant was guilty of negligence, or else the accident would not have happened. But it is not allowable to build one presumption on another, and thus make a cause of action. Negligence cannot be assumed from the mere fact of an accident and an injury. 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. § 59. It is quite legitimate, when facts are admitted or proven, to draw from them such reasonable inferences as will be sufficient to sustain a verdict; but without this basis of fact a presumption has no office to perform. Philadelphia City Pass. R. Co. v. Henrice, 92 Pa. 431, 37 Am. Rep. 699; Northern Cent. R. Co. v. State, 54 Md. 118; Sorenson v. Menasha Paper Co. 56 Wis. 338. See also Wintuska v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Ky.) 20 S. W. Rep. 819. For the foregoing reasons the judgment will be reversed, and, as there is no evidence on which to base a recovery, we will not demand the cause.

All concur.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Freeborn County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

the facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. H. Field and W. E. Tidd for appellant.

Messrs. Lovely & Morgan for respondent.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant accepted the plaintiff as a passenger on its train for transportation from Savannah, Ill., by way of Austin, Minn., to Wells, in this state. He was aged eighty years, feeble, and infirm in mind and body, and hence required special care and assistance during his journey, of which fact the defendant was informed when it accepted him as a passenger by a letter from its station agent at Savannah, which accompanied his ticket, and was exhibited to each successive conductor on the train. The train reached Austin before daylight, about four o'clock in the morning. At that point it was necessary for plaintiff to change cars, and take a train going west to Wells. The two trains, on arrival at Austin, stood head to head on the same track alongside of the depot platform. When plaintiff's train arrived, an employé of defendant called to passengers going west to change cars, but no one assisted plaintiff to get off the train, or to find his way to the other. Owing to his age and to his being incumbered with some luggage, the old man was the last person to get off the train, and by the time he did so all the other passengers had gotten out of sight. Although the depot platform was lighted by some oil lamps, yet it was somewhat dark, and the plaintiff, being in a strange place, under such circumstances was evidently dazed, and unable to decide where to go or what to do. He says he kept "hunting round" without success to find his train and the other passengers, until finally he saw a man with a lantern, and asked him where he should go, and that the man told him "to go up the steps," referring or directing him to what proved to be the steps up onto the platform of a coach on the west-bound train, and that the man hurried off, without giving him any assistance; that he, (plaintiff,) unaided, succeeded in getting up on the platform on the coach. On the other hand, one of defendant's employés testified that he saw the plaintiff on the station platform, tottering along as if he needed assistance, and that, after ascertaining his destination, helped him up onto the platform of the coach, and then left, supposing he would go into the car. The jury were at liberty to accept as true whichever statement they thought most credible. The plaintiff, however, in his dazed condition, apparently mistook the platform of the car for something else, and instead of entering the car walked off in the dark, and fell to the ground on the opposite side of the train, and near to another track, which was from four to six feet distant from the one on which the train stood, and sustained severe injuries. Defendant's yard foreman, who was superintending the switching of a car onto that track, stood within about eight feet, and saw plaintiff fall, but, assuming apparently that he was not seriously hurt, and not in a place of danger, the foreman, without rendering any assistance, started off a distance of some fifty feet, to open a switch to let the car and switch engine in onto that track. A switchman, who was riding on the foot board of the engine, as it approached, seeing plaintiff lying there in a place of danger, jumped off, and picked him up. He testified that he did not know whether the engine "rubbed against" plaintiff or not, but the jury would have been justified in finding from the testimony of plaintiff himself that the engine came in contact with him as he was lying there along the track, and inflicted on him injuries in addition to those received by the fall.

Defendant's assignments of error are all directed to two points: First, that there was no evidence to justify a verdict that defendant was guilty of any negligence; second, that the court erred in giving plaintiff's ninth request, which was to the effect that, if defendant's yard foreman saw plaintiff in a place of peril, and was in a position to protect him from injury, and failed to do so, and thereby the plaintiff received additional injuries, then, for all such injuries resulting from the foreman's failure to perform his duty, the defendant would be liable.

1. Taking up these points in the order named, we are of opinion that, under all the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, it was a question for the jury whether defendant's servants exercised proper care in directing and assisting the plaintiff from the incoming to the outgoing west-bound train. Of course, a railroad company is not bound to turn its cars into nurseries or hospitals, or its employés into nurses. If a passenger, because of extreme youth or old age, or any mental or physical infirmities, is unable to take care of himself, he ought to be provided with an attendant to take care of him. But if the company voluntarily accepts a person as a passenger, without an attendant, whose inability to care for himself is apparent or made known to its servants, and renders special care and assistance necessary, the company is negligent if such assistance is not afforded. In such case it must exercise the degree of care commensurate with the responsibility which it has thus voluntarily assumed, and that care must be such as is reasonably necessary to insure the safety of the passenger, in view of his mental and physical condition. This is a duty required by law as well as the dictates of humanity. Indianapolis, P. & O. R. Co. v. Pitzer, 109 Ind. 179, and Sheridan v. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co., 86 N. Y. 39, 93 Am. Dec. 490.

Whether the defendant fully performed this duty was a question for the jury.

II. There was evidence making the instruction complained of applicable to the case, and it was properly given if the matter referred to was within the allegations of the complaint. The 8d, 4th, and 5th paragraphs of the complaint, respectively, charge three distinct and separate acts of negligence: First, omission to properly light the station platform; second, failure to render plaintiff proper directions and assistance in going to and boarding his train; and, third, (as alleged in the fifth paragraph,) "that said plaintiff was then and there, [while lying on the ground after he fell,] by and through the negligence of said defendant, run upon and against by one of its locomotive engines," whereby he sustained injuries. We are of opinion that the negligence here alleged must be construed as a separate charge, additional to those which preceded, and does not, as defendant claims, merely refer to allegations of negligence contained in preceding paragraphs. We may add that it would seem that the parties, in the introduction of evidence on the trial, construed it that way.

Order affirmed.

Collins, J., absent, took no part.

1. An indemnity chattel mortgage upon a stock of goods is not void as matter of law in favor of creditors of the mort-

8. Effect of mortgagee's taking possession.
9. Analysis of the law in different jurisdictions.

1. The general rules.

In England the doctrine of Twynes' Case, 3 Coke, 80, became the settled law in cases where the mortgagor of chattels was left in possession with power to sell them for his own benefit, and under the authority of that case such transactions were pronounced void. There was subsequently to the decision of that case much discussion of the question whether or not merely leaving the mortgagor in possession would avoid the mortgage, which question is foreign to the subject of this note. Subsequent legislation in that country has materially weakened the force of the early precedents and since such legislation is so foreign to anything found in this country that the interpretation given it by the courts would be of little aid in determining the law applicable here no attempt has been made to set out the English cases.

In this country a mortgage made simply to shield the mortgagor's property from creditors while he remained in possession with power to sell for his own benefit and apply the proceeds to such uses as he might choose would be void, and if all those facts fully appeared on the face of the mortgage few if any courts would hesitate to pronounce it so as matter of law. The chief difference of opinion is with regard to how many of those facts must appear on the face of the instrument to make it void in law.

Quotation from the opinions of judges who were dealing with the question, including those who have decided that the particular cases under consideration must be submitted to the jury, will show that a change of facts would quite probably result in the application of a different rule.

Court to construe the instrument.

Thus the construction of written instruments is for the court and it must tell the jury the effect of the language used in the instrument where there is no dispute as to what provisions it contains. Louthain v. Miller, 85 Ind. 168.

The court must adjudge the existence of legal fraud whenever it appears upon the face of the instrument itself. Hirshkind v. Israel, 18 S. C. 168.

Where the instrument contains illegal provisions not reconcilable on any possible hypothesis with an honest and legal intent the law declares it void on its face, because no evidence could change its character. Oliver v. Eaton, 7 Mich. 118.

Hypothetical cases of invalidity.

If the mortgage deed expressed that there were other outstanding unsecured debts, and that the mortgaged property was all the mortgagor possessed, a reservation of possession with power to sell without accounting for the proceeds would render it void as matter of law. Cheatham v. Hawkins, 76 N. C. 325.

A mortgage providing for sales which would exhaust the stock without any provision for application of the proceeds on the mortgage debt might well be declared fraudulent. Jaffray v. Greenbaum, 64 Iowa, 492.

If it is proved that the object in making and taking the mortgage is to hold the instrument as a shield for the protection of the debtor against other creditors or wrongfully hindering and delaying them for the benefit of the debtor then fraud is an inference of law and the jury is, under the direction of the court, bound to find it. Hughes v. Cory, 20 Iowa, 399.

If an understanding appears either on the face of the mortgage or in a contemporaneous agreement that the mortgagor was not to account for the proceeds but might deal with the property to all intents and purposes as if it was his own, an inference of fraud arises which renders the mortgage void. New v. Sailors, 114 Ind. 408.

Giving the mortgagor possession with power to been dissolved by an assignment for benefit of creditors may intervene under § 1907, Code of 1881, in proceedings for the foreclosure of a mortgage on the debtor's property to contest the right to foreclose such mortgage as against their rights.

(May 6, 1892.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County denying the prayer of his petition as against attaching creditors and others in a suit brought to foreclose a mortgage upon a stock of goods. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thompson, Edsen & Humphries, for appellant:

In the case at bar the court finds as a fact that the money was to be applied to the extinction of the mortgage debt, which fact makes the mortgage valid.

Wineburgh v. Schaer, 2 Wash. Terr. 326; Etheridge v. Sperry, 139 U. S. 266, 85 L. ed. 171; Howard v. Rohlfing, 86 Kan. 357; Morris v. Stern, 80 Ind. 227; *McFadden v. Fed. Rep. 501; Whitson v. Griffiths, 89 Kan. 311.

After the filing of the assignment, the attachments were dissolved and the creditors had no right to intervene.

A simple contract creditor cannot intervene.

Horn v. Volcano Water Co. 18 Cal. 62, 73 Am. Dec. 569; Gasquet v. Johnson, 1 La. 431; Omaha & St. L. R. Co. v. O'Neill, 81 Iowa, 468.

The court erred in refusing to strike out the pleas of intervention of all the creditors.

Welborn v. Eskey, 25 Neb. 198; Horn v. Volcano Water Co. and Omaha & St. L. R. Co. v. O'Neill, supra.

By virtue of the assignment the liens by which the intervenors claim the right to intervene were lost and destroyed.

Ward v. Proctor, 7 Met. 818, 39 Am. Dec. 782; Baum v. Raphael, 57 Cal. 361; Frelinghuysen v. Nugent, 86 Fed. Rep. 229.

The creditors of an insolvent debtor cannot contest the deed of assignment. As soon as the deed is executed the property passes into the custody of the law, and neither the debtor nor his creditors can contest the matter.

First Nat. Bank of Brattleboro v. Estate of Waite, 57 Vt. 608; Berkeley D. School v. Jarvis, 32 Conn. 412; Freeland v. Mechanics Bank, 16 Gray, 137.

sell does not render the mortgage fraudulent per se, if such possession is not inconsistent with the security of the mortgage, and there is not mingled in the contract any intention to delay or defraud other creditors or unreasonably withhold the property from their reach. Brinley v. Spring, 7 Me. 241. See also the argument of the court in Peabody v. Landon, 61 Vt. 313.

Fraud must be apparent.

The court cannot presume fraud unless the terms of the instrument preclude all other inferences. Williams v. Lord, 75 Va. 380.

It is only where the fact or intention which avoids the deeds is apparent on its face or a necessary deduction therefrom that the court can pronounce it void. Scott v. Alford, 58 Tex. 92.

It is only where the conveyance so unmistakably reserves the right to the mortgagor to deal with the property as his own that all evidence to the contrary should be excluded as contradicting the writing that the court can declare the deed fraudulent in law. Britton v. Criswell, 68 Miss. 395.

To find fraud as matter of law it must so expressly and plainly appear in the deed itself as to be incapable of explanation by evidence dehors. Cheatham v. Hawkins, 76 N. C. 335.

The mortgage must on its face plainly or by necessary implication express the right of the grantor to remain in possession and dispose of the property. Voorhis v. Langsdorf, 81 Mo. 451.

The court cannot declare the mortgage void unless an agreement has been made either in the mortgage or between the parties to it, the necessary construction of which permits the mortgagor to make sales for his own benefit. Chatham Nat. Bank v. O'Brien, 6 Hun, 231.

Effect of absence of fraudulent intent.

The fraudulent element cannot be purged by a disavowal of fraudulent intent as present in the mind and inducing the act. Phifer v. Erwin, 100 N. C. 59.

Nor by proof of want of fraudulent intent. Cheatham v. Hawkins, 80 N. C. 164.

2. Mortgage showing possession with power of sale.

The cases are relatively few in which the question at issue has been simply the effect of the presence in the mortgage of a provision giving the 18 L. R. A.

mortgagor possession with power of sale, unattended with other provisions or extraneous circumstances which might have had more or less effect in influencing the decision.

Good as between the parties.

Such a mortgage may be enforced as between the parties to it. Wiley v. Knight, 27 Ala. 336.

And against a volunteer. Gregory v. Whedon, 8 Neb. 377.

And against third persons whose claims are not based on a valuable consideration. McCoy v. Boley, 21 Fla. 304.

It is good between the parties although it contains a stipulation giving the mortgagor power to sell and purchase new goods, "and so on forever," all of which should be subject to the lien. Allen v. Goodnow, 71 Me. 421.

Stipulation that mortgagor may dispose of proceeds.

Where the agreement is that the mortgagor shall make sales for his own benefit, it shows conclusively that it was given for some purpose other than that of securing a debt to the mortgagee, and that its only operation must be to prejudice others, and therefore it cannot be shown that the mortgage was not made in bad faith and without design to hinder or defraud creditors since such can be its only effect. It is so plainly fraudulent that the court should so pronounce it, and it is immaterial whether the agreement appears on the face of the instrument or not. Russell v. Winne, 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 388, 87 N. Y. 595, 97 Am. Dec. 755; Southard v. Pinckney, 5 Abb. N. C. 195; S. C. sub nom. Southard v. Benner, 72 N. Y. 425.

A mortgage of chattels containing an agreement that the mortgagor may retain possession and sell and dispose of the mortgaged property as his own without satisfaction of the mortgage debt is of no effect as a security and can only operate to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors. Horton v. Williams, 21 Minn. 191.

A stipulation that the mortgagor should dispose of the goods in the ordinary course of business as his own avoids the mortgage. Stein v. Munch, 24 Minn. 391.

Or without accounting for the proceeds. Rocheleau v. Boyle, 11 Mont. 451.

Retention of possession with power to sell with-

The creditors' right to intervene passed out, and the law fixed the person who could contest the fraudulent conveyances.

Bennett v. Whitcomb, 25 Minn. 148; Root v. Potter, 59 Mich. 504.

Messrs. Allen & Powell, Preston, Carr & Preston, and Pennfather & Williamson, for respondents:

This case is controlled by Robinson v. Elliott, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 518, 22 L. ed. 758, and Wineburgh v. Schaer, 2 Wash. Terr. 328, because none of the proceeds of the sales was applied on the mortgage debt, but on other debts and for other purposes.

Part of the proceeds was accepted by appellant himself as payment on a debt not secured by the mortgage, bringing the case within the rule laid down in Byrd v. Forbes, 8 Wash. Terr. 318.

See Frankhouser v. Ellett, 22 Kan. 127, 31 Am. Rep. 178, note; Leser v. Glaser, 32 Kan. 546; Standard Imp. Co. v. Schultz, 45 Kan. 52.

The mortgage is fraudulent.

out accounting for the proceeds raises a presumption of fraud which, if not rebutted, becomes conclusive, and there is nothing then for the jury to pass on, but the law pronounces the mortgage fraudulent. Cheatham v. Hawkins, 76 N. C. 336.

Where it appears either by the face of the mortgage or by parol evidence that the mortgagee has given to the mortgagor an unlimited power to dispose of the mortgaged property for the use of the mortgagor the mortgage is void as to purchasers and attaching creditors. Orton v. Orton, 7 Or. 478, 33 Am. Rep. 717; Aiken v. Pascall, 19 Or. 493.

Reservation of power to sell the goods and apply the proceeds as the mortgagor should see fit, renders the mortgage void. Saunders v. Waggoner, 82 Va. 382.

Possession with power of sale simply.

The courts take different views of the effect of a stipulation vesting the possession in the mortgagor with power of sale. On the one side, it is said that if the mortgagor may sell without any accountability for the proceeds the provision is as vicious as though he was expressly given power to sell for his own benefit and that therefore the mortgage is void as matter of law. See McDermott v. Eborn, 90 Ala. 258, in connection with Benedict v. Renfro, 75 Ala. 121, 51 Am. Rep. 429; Martin v. Ogden, 41 Ark. 136; City Nat. Bank v. Goodrich, 3 Colo. 140; Logan v. Logan, 22 Fla. 532; Lewiston Nat. Bank v. Martin (Idaho) March 5, 1890; The Federal Decisions in Iowa, Crooks v. Stuart, 2 McCrary, 17, 7 Fed. Rep. 800; Argall v. Seymour, 4 McCrary, 55; Wells v. Langbein, 20 Fed. Rep. 183; Lyon v. Council Bluffs Sav. Bank, 29 Fed. Rep. 531; Leser v. Glaser, 32 Kan. 546; Price v. Pitzer, 44 Md. 527; Lodge v. Samuels, 50 Mo. 204; Leopold v. Silverman, 7 Mont. 266; Hedman v. Anderson, 6 Neb. 399; Re Bloom, 17 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 426; Wagner v. Jones, 9 Daly, 375; Collins v. Myers, 16 Ohio, 547; Catin v. Currier, 1 Sawy. 7; Tennessee Nat. Bank v. Ebbert, 9 Eelak, 153; Wilber v. Kray, 73 Tex. 534; Addington v. Etheridge, 12 Gratt. 426; Kuhn v. Mack, 4 W. Va. 194.

On the other side, it is argued that the mere fact that the mortgagor is given a power of sale does not conclusively show fraud. It may be capable of explanation and perfectly consistent with an honest purpose and that therefore an opportunity to explain should be given and the question passed on as one of fact by the jury. Lister v. Simpson, 38 N. J. Eq. 428; Fletcher v. Powers, 131 Mass. 333; Blanchard v. Cooke, 144 Mass. 226; Muncie Nat. Bank v. Brown, 112 Ind. 481; Googins v. Gilmore, 47 Md. 15; Cheatham v. Hawkins, 76 N. C. 336.

A mortgage which leaves the mortgagor in possession and by inference permits him to sell in the usual course of business is not fraudulent per se. Gay v. Bidwell, 7 Mich. 521.

The court cannot instruct the jury that the fact that the mortgagor is given power to sell in the usual course of trade will alone warrant them in finding fraud. Sleeper v. Chapman, 121 Mass. 404.

Where a mortgage of liquors and other property provided that the mortgagor should keep possession until the note became due the claim was made that the mortgage was void on its face for not requiring the mortgagor to account to the mortgagee for the proceeds of sales made by him, relying on Mobley v. Letts, 61 Ind. 11; but the court said that under the statute the mortgage could not be declared void on its face, that fraud in such cases was a question of fact. McFadden v. Fritz, 96 Ind. 592.

So in Iowa it has been held that the absence of a provision as to application of the proceeds does not render the mortgage void. Clark v. Hyman, 55 Iowa, 20, 39 Am. Rep. 160; Meyer v. Evans, 66 Iowa, 185.

In New v. Sailors, 114 Ind. 408, the court said where no agreement as to the disposition of the proceeds appears the court cannot infer an intention that the mortgagor is to use them for his own benefit. It will be presumed that he was to account as agent to the mortgagee.

One of the most vigorous protests against holding the mortgage void in law is found in Brett v. Carter, 2 Low. Dec. 458, where Judge Lowell says it is very strange that since the passage of the Registration Acts and statutes providing that fraud shall be a question of fact for the jury the courts should have gone back to the harsh doctrine of holding the mortgage void as matter of law.

In Mitchell v. Winslow, 2 Story, C. C. 647, in speaking of a mortgage which left the mortgagor in possession with power to deal with the mortgaged goods, the court said: "I am not aware of any policy of the law, or of any principle of law, which makes any conveyance of this sort invalid as to creditors, if they have full notice, or may have full notice of it by the exercise of reasonable diligence." And it held the statutory recording of the mortgage was notice which made a mortgage valid.

Attempting to cover future-acquired property.

The mere existence of a provision that the mortgage shall cover after-acquired property does not as a rule render the mortgage void. See note to Deeley v. Dwight, ante, 298.

A clause conveying "all the goods that may be hereafter purchased to be sold in the store" is not such an express provision for the continuance of the business as to render the mortgage void on its face. Baldwin v. Little, 64 Miss. 126.

Attempting to cover the goods "which may be added from time to time to said stock" is not sufficient to render the mortgage void upon its face. Voorhis v. Langsdorf, 31 Mo. 451.

Describing the goods as those "now kept and offered for sale at the store-room at" etc., and extending it to cover and include any goods which Orton, 7 Or. 478; Southard v. Benner, 73 N. Y. 432.

The mortgage is fraudulent in fact. Fraud will be presumed in courts of equity from the circumstances of the case.

Ward v. Lamberth, 31 Ga. 150; Kendall v. Hughes, 7 B. Mon. 868; Burch v. Smith, 15 Tex. 219, 65 Am. Dec. 154; King v. Moon, 42 Mo. 551.

The court did not err in holding the mortgage void as to the fixtures.

If the mortgage is void in part it is void in toto.

Wilson v. Voight, 9 Colo. 614; Horton v. Williams, 21 Minn. 187; Russell v. Winnie, 37 N. Y. 591, 97 Am. Dec. 755; Hyslop v. Clarke, 14 Johns. 464; Burke v. Murphy, 27 Miss. 167; Clafin v. Fuley, 22 W. Va. 484.

the mortgagor might thereafter add to the stock, does not render it void on its face. Hewson v. Tootle, 72 Mo. 632.

But the Tennessee chancellor has vigorously expressed his disapproval of such mortgages, saying that "the mortgage of future additions of stock is void upon the ground that such a transaction irrespective of fraud is against public policy throwing open wide a door for possible fraud, and the contract does not fall within that class of which a court of equity will decree specific performance." Phelps v. Murray, 2 Tenn. Ch. 746.

An attempt to cover future additions to stock is, however, usually held void when combined with a provision giving the mortgagor possession with power of sale.

Thus where by the terms of the mortgage and the schedule attached the mortgagor was to retain possession and sell in the usual course of trade and the mortgage lien was to attach to any purchases as they were from time to time made, the instrument was held to be void as to creditors as matter of law. Edgell v. Hart, 9 N. Y. 216, 59 Am. Dec. 532, affirming 13 Barb. 380.

A provision that the mortgagor may carry on the business and that the mortgage shall attach to all goods and credits that may come into possession of the mortgagor renders the mortgage void. Harmann v. Hoskins, 56 Miss. 143.

A mortgage providing that the mortgagor shall keep possession of the goods, sell them in the usual course of trade, and out of the proceeds pay certain creditors named, the mortgage to become void when this was done, which shall be within fifteen months, all after-acquired property to be subject to its provisions, is void. Davis v. Ransom, 18 Ill. 386.

Provisions as to keeping up stock.

There is a sharp conflict as to the effect of a provision requiring the replenishing of stock. If the mortgagor is in possession as agent for the mortgagee and the replenishing of stock is necessary to realize the money invested in it a provision permitting such replenishing is usually upheld. See infra, 4. But when nothing appears except that the stock is to be kept up, one class of cases hold that the mortgage is not rendered void on its face. McKay v. Shotwell, 6 Dak. 124; Roundy v. Converse, 71 Wis. 524; Hirshkind v. Israel, 18 S. C. 168; Stedman v. Batchelor, 28 N. Y. S. R. 438; Williams v. Winsor, 13 E. I. 12; Peabody v. Landou, 61 Vt. 318; Barnard v. Baton, 2 Cush. 294.

Where a mortgage provides that the security shall be kept good a court cannot declare as a matter of law that it appears upon the face of the mortgage that it was not given as security and that it is therefore void. Jaffray v. Greenbaum, 64 Iowa, 462.

Permission to the mortgagor to remain in possession of the goods upon his promising to keep the stock in as good condition as it then was will not be construed as authorizing sales to be made so as to avoid the mortgage. Kalk v. Fielding, 50 Wis. 339.

The assignment did not affect the status of the intervenors because:

(a) The property was in the hands of the court pending the determination of the rights of the parties already in court, among whom were the intervenors, whose liens were on the property, and the defendant could not by his act change the legal status of the property; he could neither pass possession nor right of possession of the attached property.

High, Receivers, §§ 51 et seq., 188, 141, 153-160; Bostwick v. Menck, 40 N. Y. 383.

The title was in the receiver.

High, Receivers, § 448.

Not even a purchaser for value could take title.

Weed v. Smull, 3 Sandf. Ch. 273, 7 L. ed. 850.

sion of the goods upon his promising to keep the stock in as good condition as it then was will not be construed as authorizing sales to be made so as to avoid the mortgage. Kalk v. Fielding, 50 Wis. 339.

On the other side such a provision is held to give the mortgagor power to sell and apply the proceeds to his own use if he keeps the security good, and to therefore render the mortgage void. Fox v. Davidson, 1 Mackey, 102; Garden v. Bodwing, 9 W. Va. 121; Goddard v. Jones, 78 Mo. 513; Carpenter v. Simons, 1 Robt. 380; Spies v. Boyd, 1 E. D. Smith, 445.

Such a provision has sometimes been held void when considered in connection with the conduct of the parties. Thus in Robinson v. Elliott, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 512, 23 L. ed. 758, where it appeared that the mortgagor remained in possession for more than two years during which time less than $100 was paid on the indebtedness, the mortgage was held void. And in Wray v. Davenport, 79 Va. 20, where the mortgagor carried on a brisk trade for more than a year without molestation, the mortgage was declared void.

If the mortgage is void because of other provisions, a provision requiring the mortgagor to replenish and keep up the stock will not render the instrument valid. Gallagher v. Rosenfield, 47 Minn. 510.

Provisions for paying business and living expenses. On the one side, it is held that the mortgage is not void as a matter of law because it provides for an extension of time of the indebtedness, and that the mortgagor shall have the right to retain possession and carry on the business in the usual retail way for one year paying the cost and expenses of running the business and keeping up the stock to what it was when the mortgage was given. Jaffray v. Greenbaum, 64 Iowa, 462.

A mortgage containing reservations to the mortgagor, first, to sell before default in the usual course of retail trade, keeping the property up to its then value, second, to retain in his hands the avails of the sales, 33 per cent of which shall be applied on the notes secured by the mortgage, is not fraudulent on its face. Hughes v. Cory, 20 Iowa, 309.

A stipulation that the mortgagor may pay store and living expenses out of the proceeds does not avoid the mortgage. Whitson v. Griffin, 39 Kan. 211.

On the other, it is held that authorizing the mortgagor to retain possession and dispose of the goods in the regular course of business paying out of the proceeds all necessary expenses of the business and of the support of the mortgagor and his family as long as he should deposit the excess to the credit of the mortgagee is void. Place v. Langworthy, 13 Wis. 629, 80 Am. Dec. 758.

After the assignment, intervenors' interest was sufficient to support an intervention.

Lambert v. Slade, 4 Cal. 337; Dawson v. Sims, 14 Or. 561; Hahn v. Salmon, 20 Fed. Rep. 801; Coburn v. Smart, 58 Cal. 743; Grossini v. Perazzo, 66 Cal. 545; Wash. retain a certain sum therefrom each month to enable the mortgagor to run the business, pay hands, and support his family, renders the mortgage void. Greenbaum v. Wheeler, 90 Ill. 296.

Implied provisions in the mortgage that the mortgagor may sell on credit, taking good business paper which the mortgagee will accept and apply on the debt, and that part of the avails of sales may be used to replenish stock, which shall be substituted in the mortgage in place of the goods sold, by monthly renewals, do not make the mortgage void on its face, but the further agreement to permit the mortgagor to use part of the avails for personal expenses will do so. Brackett v. Harvey, 21 N. Y. 220, reversing 25 Hun, 602.

Construction of particular mortgages.

The right to sell the property must be expressed to render the mortgage void as matter of law. Hitchler v. Citizens Bank, 63 Miss. 408.

The power to continue the business will render the mortgage void where it arises by clear and irresistible implication. Perry v. Shenandoah Nat. Bank, 27 Gratt. 758.

A mortgage to secure the purchase price of a stock of goods which contemplates that the mortgagor shall carry on the business, make sales, and from the profits pay for the stock, is valid. Kreth v. Rogers, 101 N. C. 263.

A clause that the mortgagor "shall be allowed to continue the sale of goods from the store as though this instrument had not been made," simply authorizes sales in the usual course of business and does not render the mortgage void. Wingler v. Sibley, 35 Mich. 231.

The mere insertion of a provision that the mortgage shall be a continuing lien upon "the stock or goods thereafter brought into the store," is not of itself sufficient to show permission to the mortgagor to deal with the goods which will render the mortgage void per se. Yates v. Olmsted, 56 N. Y. 632, reversing 65 Barb. 63.

Where the mortgagor by an agreement, express or implied, is permitted to continue in possession of and sell the stock of goods, shifting in their nature, at retail, for his own benefit, the mortgage is void. First Nat. Bank of Pierre v. Comfort (Dak.), Feb. Term, 1896.

A mortgage of a stock in trade and the "increase and decrease" thereof, with a provision that the mortgagor shall remain in possession, is void as matter of law. Mittnacht v. Kelly, 8 Keyes, 407, 3 Abb. App. Dec. 301.

A stipulation that the mortgagee may take possession on default is an implied reservation to the mortgagor of possession until that time with power of sale and renders the mortgage void. Owens v. Hobbie, 82 Ala. 463.

Permitting the mortgagor to retain and use the goods consisting of liquors does not necessarily 18 L. R. A.

imply the power to sell them so as to render the mortgage void. Cleaves v. Herbert, 61 Ill. 126.

A mortgage of fixtures and "wines, liquors, and cigars," with the provision that the mortgagor may remain in possession and carefully use the mortgaged property, but which expressly forbids him to make away with, sell, or in any manner dispose of the same, is not void on its face. Schwab v. Owens, 10 Mont. 381.

The mere fact that the mortgaged property is a stock of drugs is not sufficient to show an implied reservation of a power of sale. Weber v. Armstrong, 70 Mo. 217.

Where the mortgage is on a stock of goods the only use that can be made of which is to sell them in the usual course of trade, and contains a provision that the mortgagor shall retain possession "with the privilege of using the same," it is void. Mobley v. Letts, 61 Ind. 11.

A stipulation that the mortgagor shall apply one half of the proceeds upon the mortgage gives him by implication the absolute disposition of the other one half and renders the mortgage void. Blakeslee v. Rossman, 43 Wis. 116.

Inserting in the mortgage a clause excepting "such goods as are sold in the usual course of retail trade" is an implied permission to the mortgagor to make such sales, and if there is no agreement that the proceeds are to be turned over to the mortgagee the mortgage is presumptively fraudulent. Greeley v. Winsor (S. Dak.), May 12, 1890.

3. Effect of extraneous agreement.

If the power of sale does not appear on the face of the mortgage the court cannot declare it void. Summers v. Roos, 42 Miss. 749, 2 Am. Rep. 653; Hilliard v. Cagle, 46 Miss. 341.

The court will not hear extrinsic evidence to enable it to pronounce the mortgage void as matter of law. Weber v. Armstrong, 70 Mo. 217.

Under those circumstances the case must of course be presented to the jury and the question then arises, What course shall be taken when the evidence develops the existence of the iniquitous agreement? Shall the court instruct that if the jury find such an agreement to exist they must find the mortgage void because the law declares it fraudulent? Or must the court leave it to the jury to say whether or not there is fraud? Much the same conflict exists concerning this question which is shown above where the agreement appears on the face of the mortgage.

On the one side, it is held that so soon as an agreement is shown which will leave the mortgagor in possession with power to sell and apply the proceeds to his own use the obvious tendency of which is to secure the mortgagor in the enjoyment of his property beyond the reach of creditors, the mortgage becomes fraudulent in law and is void. Gaus

Where, as in this case, the mortgagor is allowed to use the proceeds in payment of unsecured debts, the mortgage is clearly not being used for security only.

Cook v. Bennett, 38 N. Y. S. R. 632; Place v. Langworthy, 13 Wis. 630.

The permission to dispose of the proceeds as the mortgagor pleased vitiated the mortgage.

Southard v. Benner, 73 N. Y. 432; Potts v. Hart, 99 N. Y. 173; Hangen v. Hachemeister, 114 N. Y. 566.

Nor does there seem to be any distinction between cases where there is an express agreement and where the mortgagor is permitted to dispose of the proceeds with the knowledge and consent of the mortgagee.

Standard Imp. Co. v. Schultz, 45 Kan. 52.

v. Doyle, 46 Ark. 122; Barnet v. Fergus, 51 Ill. 852; Huschle v. Morris, 131 Ill. 590; Johnston v. Tuttle, 45 Miss. 494; State v. D'Oench, 31 Mo. 438; Rocheleau v. Boyle, 11 Mont. 451; Raulett v. Blodgett, 17 N. H. 268; Putnam v. Osgood, 52 N. H. 148; Speigelberg v. Hersch, 3 N. M. 186; Potts v. Hart, 99 N. Y. 168; Freeman v. Rawson, 5 Ohio St. 12; Jacobs v. Ervin, 9 Or. 60; Bank of Rome v. Haselton, 15 Lea, 216.

Under such circumstances the court should instruct that if the jury find that the mortgagor was to be left in possession with power to sell they should find the conveyance void as to creditors.

Bullene v. Barrett, 37 Mo. 186.

If the evidence shows the mortgage to be void the court should so instruct. McCarthy v. Miller, 41 Mo. App. 200; Re Kahley, 2 Biss. 383.

In Cook v. Halsell, 65 Tex. 6, a charge was approved that told the jury that if they found that the mortgagee intended to permit the mortgagor to continue in possession of the goods and sell the same in the ordinary course of trade the mortgage would be void.

On the other side it is held that if matters outside of the mortgage are relied on the question of fraud is for the jury. Williams v. Evans, 6 Neb. 219; Frankhouser v. Ellett, 23 Kan. 127; Lauthain v. Miller, 85 Ind. 163.

In Etheridge v. Sperry, 139 U. S. 206, 35 L. ed. 171, a case coming from Iowa in which the mortgage had no imperfections on its face but there was a parol agreement that the mortgagor might use the proceeds of his daily sales to support himself and keep up his stock applying only the surplus but all of that to the payment of the mortgage debt, the court stated that if not bound by Iowa decisions it was inclined to the opinion that the question of the validity of the mortgage was not one of law so much as of fact and good faith.

Of course courts holding that the mortgage is not avoided by the appearance of such provision on its face will not instruct the jury that evidence showing such an agreement will render it void.

Kind of agreement necessary.

A tacit understanding is sufficient to avoid the mortgage. Hangen v. Hachemeister, 5 L. R. A. 187, 114 N. Y. 566.

The agreement can be inferred from circumstances. Simmons v. Jenkins, 76 Ill. 479.

If a power of sale is implied from circumstances it is as much a part of the contract as if expressed. Benedict v. Renfro, 75 Ala. 128, 51 Am. Rep. 429.

The agreement will avoid the mortgage although it is oral. Steinart v. Deuster, 25 Wis. 136.

Effect of evidence of good faith.

Where the mortgage is lawful upon its face and there is evidence that the transaction was fair and honest, but the circumstances tend to show an agreement that the mortgagor should continue making sales as usual, the question of fraud is for the jury. Gardner v. McEwen, 19 N. Y. 124.

Anders, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

From August, 1889, until March 13, 1890, appellant and W. T. Kelleher were partners doing business as retail dry goods merchants in the city of Seattle, in this state, under the firm name and style of W. T. Kelleher & Co. On February 28, 1890, the firm, being indebted, settled with their creditors by paying half of their indebtedness in cash, and giving their firm notes for the balance to Schweitzer & Co., of San Francisco, who represented all of their creditors. There were four of these notes, each for the sum of $3,133.80, and amounting in the aggregate to $12,534.20. On March 13, 1890, the firm of Kelleher & Co. was dissolved by mutual

4. Sales by mortgagor as agent for mortgagee.

The courts are almost unanimous in holding that the mortgagee may lawfully be made the agent of the mortgagee to dispose of the mortgaged goods. Felner v. Wilson, 55 Ark. 77; Wilcox v. Jackson, 7 Colo. 524; Read v. Wilson, 22 Ill. 380, 74 Am. Dec. 159; Wilson v. Sullivan, 58 N. H. 200; Kleine v. Katzenberger, 20 Ohio St. 110; Lane v. Starr (S. Dak.) May 1, 1890; Crow v. Red River County Bank, 52 Tex. 362; Bettes v. Weir Plow Co. (Tex.) May 6, 1892; Cotton v. Marsh, 3 Wis. 221.

Although it is held in Illinois that if the mortgagor is left in full possession simply calling him agent will be of no avail. Dunning v. Mead, 90 Ill. 878.

The mortgagor may receive compensation for his services. Gleason v. Wilson (Kan.) April 9, 1892; Wilcox v. Landberg, 30 Minn. 98; Frank v. Robinson, 96 N. C. 80.

Requirement to account for proceeds.

It is generally held that a provision that the proceeds of sales shall be applied in satisfaction of the mortgage debt will prevent the mortgagee from being declared void as matter of law. Murray v. McNealy, 66 Ala. 234; Miller v. Lookwood, 32 N. Y. 300; Fletcher v. Martin, 123 Ind. 56; Abbott v. Goodwin, 20 Mo. 408; Bannon v. Bowler, 34 Minn. 416; Metzner v. Graham, 57 Mo. 404; Davis v. Scott, 22 Neb. 154; Langer v. Brown, 3 Wash. Terr. 103; Saunders v. Turbeville, 3 Humph. 272.

The mere fact of leaving the goods in the mortgagor's possession with instructions to sell and make remittances to the mortgagee does not amount to fraud as matter of law. Fisk v. Harshaw, 45 Wis. 666.

The fact that the provision as to accounting for proceeds refers to the "net proceeds" does not avoid the mortgage. Manhattan Brass Co. v. Webster Glass & Q. Co. 37 Mo. App. 145.

A provision that the mortgagor may sell the mortgaged property turning over the proceeds to the banker of the mortgagee after deducting the expenses of sale including his own salary does not render the mortgage void. Adler v. Claflin, 17 Iowa, 91.

There is, however, some dissent from the broad rule as above stated.

Thus power to sell renders the instrument void although there is a requirement to account to the mortgagee for the proceeds. The court says there is a material distinction between a provision simply to account and one which would require an application of the proceeds in satisfaction of the debt. Chopard v. Bayard, 4 Minn. 533.

If the power to sell is given to the mortgagor it is immaterial what provision is made as to the disposition of the proceeds. The mortgage will be void in any event. William Deering & Co. v. Washburn (Ill.) Jan. 18, 1892, affirming 39 Ill. App. 434.

No lien is valid which allows the debtor to carry consent. By the terms of the agreement of dissolution, Ephraim retired from the firm, and Kelleher was to retain all the stock of goods then on hand, and all other firm assets, and promised and agreed to pay all of the copartnership notes and debts, and to save Ephraim harmless from all liability on account thereof. It was also agreed between them that Ephraim should retain the same control of the business that he had before the dissolution until the notes and debts of the firm for which he was liable should be paid; but it appears from the evidence that that part of the agreement was disregarded, and that, in fact, the business was thereafter conducted exclusively by Kelleher. Notice of the dissolution was given by publication in the newspapers and personally to those with whom the firm had formerly dealt, but the firm name of Kelleher & Co. was retained by Kelleher after the dissolution. Ephraim remained in Seattle after the dissolution a greater part of the time, until about July 20 or 25, 1890, at which time he concluded to go to his home in California to remain. Before leaving, however, he entered into an agreement with Kelleher whereby the latter was to give him a chattel mortgage upon the entire stock of goods then in his store in Seattle, and upon the fixtures, and all his book accounts and notes, to indemnify him against his liabilities upon the notes to Schweitzer & Co., then amounting to $9,401.40, (one of the notes having been on his business and account for the profits only to the person holding the lien. Duncan v. Taylor, 63 Tex. 648.

A provision that the goods shall be disposed of for the sole benefit of the mortgagee either by applying the money on the mortgage or in keeping up the security by adding to the stock renders the mortgage void if it provides for an indefinite continuing lien. Byrd v. Forbes, 3 Wash. Terr. 312.

Construction of particular mortgages.

Permission to sell on credit and turn the proceeds over to the mortgagee when the accounts are collected will render the mortgage void. City Bank of Rochester v. Westbury, 16 Hun. 458.

But if the accounts are to be assigned when made and credited immediately on the indebtedness the mortgage is not fraudulent per se. Caring v. Richmond, 22 Hun. 371.

Permitting the mortgagor to make public sale of the goods, the mortgagee taking the notes given to himself and also taking all cash paid, will not render the mortgage void. Goodheart v. Johnson, 68 Ill. 58.

Permitting the continuance of the business and replenishing of the stock by a mortgagor under control of the mortgagee with a view to realizing the fund and winding up the business is not fraudulent per se. Marks v. Hill, 15 Gratt. 400.

The understanding that the proceeds are to be applied upon the mortgage debt need not be incorporated into the written permission to sell. Wilson v. Sullivan, 58 N. H. 200.

Where it was proved that the goods were to remain in the mortgagor's possession and he was empowered to make sales of them but to account to the mortgagee, if called on, the mortgage was held void because the possession and power of sale were incompatible with the avowed purpose of the deed. Lang v. Lee, 3 Rand. (Va.) 424.

A stipulation that the mortgagee should at all times hold absolute and exclusive possession against all persons but the mortgagor and release all claims to the mortgaged property as soon as the debt should be fully paid will not render the mortgage valid. Harman v. Abbey, 7 Ohio St. 218.

A parol agreement that the proceeds of the sale shall be turned over to the mortgagee will not validate the mortgage. Owens v. Hobbie, 82 Ala. 438.

A stipulation for monthly accounts to the mortgagee of the business and for payment to him of the money received to be applied under his direction to the maintenance of the business by payment of the current expenses and making purchases to replenish stock will not save the mortgage from being declared void. Joseph v. Levi, 58 Miss. 844.

Application of proceeds.

All money or credits taken by the mortgagor when acting as the mortgagee's agent will be applied to the mortgage debt. 18 L. R. A.

filled in reduction of the mortgage whether they have been collected and paid over or not. Conkling v. Shelley, 28 N. Y. 380, 84 Am. Dec. 848; Brackett v. Harvey, 91 N. Y. 220; Elsworth v. Phelps, 30 Hun. 646; Sperry v. Baldwin, 46 Hun. 125; Hawkins v. Hastings Bank, 1 Dill. 432; Wilson v. Sullivan, 58 N. H. 200; Weill v. First Nat. Bank, 108 N. C. 1; Lane v. Starr (S. Dak.) May 1, 1890; Warren v. His Creditors, 3 Wash. 43; New v. Sailors, 114 Ind. 403.

But in Michigan mortgaged chattels do not cease to belong to the mortgagor until steps are taken to end his rights. The mortgage is a mere security to the mortgagee and not a transfer of title. The mortgagor while remaining in possession is not the agent of the mortgagee but owner of incumbered property. Permission to sell at retail is permission to pass title free from incumbrance but cannot be regarded as in any sense a payment of the mortgage. People v. Bristol, 35 Mich. 33.

5. How far the instrument is void in toto.

There is much conflict in regard to the effect of the invalid provision upon the remainder of the instrument.

On the one side it is held that if the mortgage is void in law because containing a power of sale it is void not only as to the property to which the power of sale relates but as to all other property which it purports to cover. Russell v. Winne, 37 N. Y. 595, 97 Am. Dec. 755; Re Burrows, 7 Biss. 523; Harman v. Hoskins, 56 Miss. 148; Bank of Rome v. Haselton, 15 Lea, 216; Claflin v. Foley, 22 W. Va. 434; Dodds v. Johnson, 3 Thomp. & C. 215; Smith v. Kenney, 1 Mackey, 12; Grooley v. Winsor (S. Dak.) March 4, 1891; Harblson v. Tufts, 1 Colo. App. 140; Gallagher v. Rosenfield, 47 Minn. 507.

On the other side are authorities holding that even though the mortgage is held to be void as to the property to which the power of sale relates it will be valid as to other property of which no sale is contemplated. Hayes v. Westcott, 11 L. R. A. 483, 91 Ala. 143; Garrettson v. Pegg, 64 Ill. 111; Davenport v. Foulke, 68 Ind. 332; Bullene v. Barrett, 87 Mo. 136; Rocheleau v. Boyle, 11 Mont. 451; Re Kahley, 2 Biss. 333.

6. Effect of Recording Act.

The Recording Act does not repeal the statute concerning fraudulent conveyances. Wood v. Lowry, 17 Wend. 492.

The Recording Act does not make the filing of the mortgage legally equivalent to actual delivery and continued possession. Horton v. Williams, 21 Minn. 191.

If the mortgage contains provisions which on legal principles vitiate the whole instrument, recording it cannot make it even prima facie valid. Robinson v. Elliott, 39 U. S. 22 Wall. 513, 23 L. ed. 753.

paid,) and upon an indebtedness of Kelleher of $465 to Newhall Sons & Co., and of $300 to the Merced Woolen Mill Company, for which he had agreed to be responsible. The mortgage was executed according to this agreement by Kelleher and wife, on July 28, 1890, and delivered to Ephraim's agent, who caused it to be recorded on August 11, 1890. A day or two subsequent to the recording of the mortgage the respondents Fleischener, Mayer & Co. and Newstadter Bros., respectively, commenced actions against Kelleher in the superior court of King county, in which action writs of attachment were issued and placed in the hands of respondent McGraw, who was sheriff of King county, by virtue of which he levied upon and took possession of the property and goods belonging to said Kelleher, and covered by the said mortgage. Appellant, Ephraim, thereupon commenced an action to foreclose his chattel mortgage, and asked to have the same declared to be a lien prior to the attachment liens of the defendants, and prayed for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of and sell the property under the direction of the court. A receiver was accordingly appointed, who sold the property, and now holds the proceeds subject to the order of the court. As a defense to the action, the attaching defendants alleged in their answer that the mortgage was given without consideration, and was executed and delivered by Kelleher for the purpose of hindering, de-

The Recording Act has no effect to validate a mortgage in which the power of disposition is retained. Freeman v. Rawson, 5 Ohio St. 12.

The effect of the Recording Act is not to make a recorded mortgage prima facie valid which prior thereto would have been fraudulent in law. Peiser v. Peticolas, 50 Tex. 646.

The Recording Acts do not change the rules of the common law as to the validity of such mortgages. Wineburgh v. Schaer, 2 Wash. Terr. 323.

The Chattel Mortgage Act does not make valid that which the law pronounces void. Duncan v. Taylor, 63 Tex. 646.

The Recording Act does not validate the mortgage. Lewiston Nat. Bank v. Martin (Idaho) March 5, 1890.

The invalidity of the deed is not affected by the fact of its being recorded. McCormick v. Atkinson, 78 Va. 10.

But in Iowa it was held that, under the statute making the recording of the mortgage equivalent to actual delivery to the mortgagee, giving the mortgagor power to dispose of the mortgaged property in due course of trade is not fraudulent per se. Torbert v. Hayden, 11 Iowa, 435.

And Justice Story held that the statutory recording of the mortgage was notice of the power of the mortgagor to deal with the property which removed the otherwise objectionable features and rendered the mortgage valid. Mitchell v. Winslow, 2 Story, C. C. 647.

7. Effect of statutes making fraud a question for the jury.

The clause of the statute making fraudulent intent a question of fact is not applicable to written instruments which the law adjudges to be fraudulent on their face and consequently void. Robinson v. Elliott, 89 U. S. 23 Wall. 513, 23 L. ed. 758.

When it appears by the terms of the instrument that a trust has been created for the use and benefit of the mortgagee the instrument is made void by statute and there is no question for the jury. This provision is distinct from that rendering void conveyances made with intent to defraud creditors and making the question of intent one for the jury. Spies v. Boyd, 1 E. D. Smith, 445.

But where the statute provides that the question of fraudulent intent shall be deemed a question of fact, the cases will be rare in which it can be correctly stated that the mortgage is void on its face. Lockwood v. Harding, 79 Ind. 133.

8. Effect of mortgagee's taking possession.

The great majority of cases hold that if the mortgage is so fraudulent in law as to be void the mortgagee can acquire no rights which will entitle him to protection by taking possession under the mortgage. Wilson v. Voight, 9 Colo. 614; Re 18 L. R. A.

Forbes, 5 Blas. 510; Wells v. Longbein, 2 Fed. Rep. 183; Stein v. Munich, 24 Minn. 391; Janvrin v. Fogg, 49 N. H. 351; Quinn & N. B. Brew. Co. v. Hart, 43 Hun, 393; Blakeslee v. Roseman, 43 Wis. 116.

Even if possession is taken, the goods sold, and the proceeds applied upon the mortgage debt, they are not beyond the reach of creditors. Mandeville v. Avery, 124 N. Y. 387.

The mortgagee may still be made to account for the proceeds. Gallagher v. Rosenfield, 47 Minn. 510.

So foreclosure and sale under the mortgage will not alter the relations of the parties. Bremer v. Fleckenstein, 9 Or. 270.

But the mortgagor may make a valid pledge to the mortgagee of the mortgaged goods which will be effective to perfect the mortgagee's title notwithstanding the fact that the mortgage was fraudulent. Pettee v. Dustin, 58 N. H. 309.

A valid delivery of the goods to the mortgagee may be made notwithstanding the fact that the mortgage was void. Baldwin v. Flash, 58 Miss. 563.

If the goods are delivered into the possession of the mortgagee with authority to sell immediately and appropriate the proceeds to the payment of the claim before the rights of other creditors attached, the mortgagee's rights will be protected. Brown v. Platt, 8 Bosw. 331.

If before any proceedings are taken hostile to the mortgage the mortgage property is delivered to the mortgagee in good faith in satisfaction of the mortgage debt the title of the mortgagee will prevail against that of creditors subsequently proceeding against the mortgagor. First Nat. Bank of Fergus Falls v. Anderson, 24 Minn. 436.

And some courts have held that possession could be acquired under the mortgage which would entitle the mortgagee to protection. Brown v. Webb, 20 Ohio, 389; Read v. Wilson, 22 Ill. 380, 47 Am. Dec. 159; Dobyns v. Meyer, 95 Mo. 132.

Acquiring possession by replevin is sufficient. Wood v. Hall, 23 Mo. App. 113.

9. Analysis of the law in different jurisdictions.

United States Supreme Court.

Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are of course not of controlling weight upon this question since that court will follow the decisions of the state from which a case comes before it, in disposing of the question as to whether or not the mortgage is void upon its face. People's Sav. Bank v. Bates, 120 U. S. 558, 30 L. ed. 754.

Yet because of the eminent ability of that court and the careful consideration which it gives to all questions discussed by it, its utterances upon this subject will well repay an examination by any one interested in the question. In an early case where the question was not directly before it, it stated that power to appropriate the proceeds of sale to the sole benefit of the mortgagor renders the laying, and defrauding his creditors, and the said defendants, and that the same was fraudulent and void as to the defendants and the creditors of Kelleher. After the institution of the foreclosure proceedings a number of other creditors of Kelleher commenced actions against him, in which writs of attachments were issued and levied on the same goods, for the recovery of their respective claims and demands, several of whom, by leave of the court, intervened in the foreclosure suit, and likewise contested the validity of the mortgage. On September 28, 1890, and before judgment was rendered against him in any of these actions, Kelleher made a general assignment of all his property for the benefit of his creditors under the Act of March 6, 1890. An assignee was appointed, who duly qualified, and thereafter intervened in the foreclosure suit, and asked to have the mortgage declared fraudulent and void as to the creditors of Kelleher. After the making of the assignment a motion was filed by plaintiff to dissolve the attachments, which motion was overruled, and the court proceeded to try the case upon the issues thus raised. Subsequent to the commencement of his action to foreclose the mortgage, the plaintiff, Ephraim, paid or secured the payment of the Schweitzer & Co. notes described in the mortgage. Upon the trial the court gave judgment in favor of Ephraim, and against Kelleher, for the sum of $10,916 and costs, and in favor of the assignee and mortgage void. Second Nat. Bank of Leavenworth v. Hunt, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 301, 20 L. ed. 190.

In a later case, where the question was to be decided as it says on general principles, it held void a mortgage containing an express agreement that until default the mortgagors might remain in possession of the goods and sell them as theretofore and supply their places with other goods, and the goods substituted for those sold should, upon being put into the store, be subject to the lien of the mortgage, and it appeared that the mortgagors were permitted to remain in possession for more than two years, during which time less than $100 was paid in satisfaction of the debt. The court said that the creditor must take care in making his contract that it does not contain provisions of no advantage to him but which benefit the debtor and were designed to do so, and are injurious to other creditors. Retention of possession with power to dispose of the goods for the benefit of the mortgagor alone is inconsistent with the nature and character of a mortgage, is no protection to the mortgagee, and of itself furnishes a pretty effectual shield to a dishonest debtor. Whatever may have been the motive which actuated the parties to the instrument it is manifest that the necessary result of what they did was to allow the mortgagors under cover of the mortgage to sell the goods as their own and appropriate the proceeds to their purposes, and this, too, for an indefinite time, a mortgage which in its very terms contemplates such results beside being no security to the mortgagee operates in the most effectual manner to ward off other creditors; and where the instrument on its face shows that the legal effect of it is to delay creditors, the law imputes to it a fraudulent purpose. Robinson v. Elliott, 80 U. S. 23 Wall. 513, 23 L. ed. 758.

Where, in a case coming from Iowa, the mortgage had on its face no imperfections, the court held that it was not invalidated by the fact of a parol understanding at the time of its execution that the mortgagor might use the proceeds of his daily sales to support himself and to keep up the stock by purchases applying only the surplus, but all of that, to the payment of the mortgage debt. The court says that if the question were open and not affected by any settled law of the state of Iowa it inclines to the opinion that the question is not one of law so much as it is one of fact and good faith, and that the decisions of the Supreme Court of Iowa rests on sound principles although the doctrine of Robinson v. Elliott, supra, appears to be regarded as sound so far as it holds that such an instrument should not be used to enable the mortgagor to continue in the business as theretofore with full control of the property and business and appropriating to himself the benefits thereof and all the while holding the instrument as a shield 18 L. R. A.

against the attacks of unsecured creditors. Ethridge v. Sperry, 139 U. S. 204, 35 L. ed. 171.

Alabama.

In this state although the general rule was recognized that if the deed showed on its face that the intention was to hinder and defraud creditors it was void in law (Johnson v. Thweatt, 18 Ala. 744), yet for a number of years no general rule was established upon the question, but each case was disposed of on its facts, and the question of the solvency or insolvency of the mortgagor was given much prominence. Thus it was decided that where an insolvent debtor mortgages his stock by an instrument providing that he shall retain possession and make sales in the usual course of business and pay the indebtedness from the net proceeds, if the mortgagee has knowledge of the insolvency he must rebut the presumption of fraud, and if he fails to do so the mortgage will be void as matter of law. Tickner v. Wiswall, 9 Ala. 310.

A mortgage of a stock of goods authorizing the mortgagor to remain in possession and sell to responsible men in the usual way, the mortgagee to have control of the proceeds for the purpose of paying the debt and providing that all goods subsequently purchased should be subject to the mortgage is not void on its face but becomes so upon proof that the mortgagor was insolvent to the knowledge of the mortgagee and soon after the mortgage was executed an attempt was made to remove the goods out of the state. Constantine v. Twelve, 29 Ala. 607.

A mortgage by an insolvent to one knowing his condition whose debt is not due or bearing interest, conveying the entire stock but fixing no law day and reserving power to the mortgagor to sell in the usual course of trade covering goods brought into the store to keep up stock is void. Price v. Mazange, 31 Ala. 701.

The mortgage is void if it ties up more than enough to satisfy the debt for an unreasonable time, and the mortgagor is insolvent. Reynolds v. Welch, 47 Ala. 200.

A deed is fraudulent on its face if made by an insolvent debtor to secure debts past due, which covers future acquisitions to stock and gives the mortgagor possession with power of sale for several months and it appears that there were other existing creditors at the time it was executed. Commercial Bank of Selma v. Brewer, 71 Ala. 374.

Where the mortgage covers practically all the property of the insolvent, which is worth twice the amount of the debt, and the mortgagor is impliedly given power to sell in the usual course of business, the mortgage is void. Benedict v. Renfro, 75 Ala. 128, 51 Am. Rep. 429; Renfro v. Goetter, 78 Ala. 311.

A statute was subsequently passed making void instruments reserving a trust for the maker since the intervenors, and against the plaintiff for their costs. As a conclusion of law from the facts found, the court stated that, as to the assignee and creditors of Kelleher, the mortgage sued on was fraudulent and void, and that the proceeds of the property in the hands of the receiver should be delivered to the assignee as assets under the assignment. The plaintiff excepted to all the conclusions of law stated by the court, except that which stated that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the defendants, and moved the court to so change the conclusions of law as to state that the mortgage should be foreclosed as against all of the defendants. The court denied the motion, and the plaintiff duly excepted. Judgment was thereupon entered in accordance with the conclusions of law stated by the court, and the plaintiff appealed to this court.

Following the description of the property, the mortgage recites, in substance, that it is given to secure, indemnify, and hold harmless the mortgagee from all liability, loss, or damage accruing, directly or indirectly, by reason of the failure or refusal of the said W. T. Kelleher to pay off and satisfy the whole or any part of the amount due or to become due upon all or any of the aforesaid promissory notes, or upon all or any of the aforesaid accounts, or upon all or any of the claims of the creditors of the original firm of Kelleher & Co. for whose benefit the aforesaid promissory notes were executed.

which the mortgages have been declared void as matter of law upon reservation of power to sell and dispose of the proceeds alone. See McDermott v. Eborn, 90 Ala. 258.

If a power of sale is implied from circumstances it is as much a part of the contract as if expressed. Benedict v. Benfro, supra.

A stipulation that the mortgagee may take possession on default is an implied reservation to the mortgagor of possession until that time with power of sale and renders the mortgage void. Owens v. Hobbie, 88 Ala. 468.

A provision that the mortgagor shall retain possession and sell for and on account of the mortgagee, paying over the proceeds of sale at the end of each week, or oftener if required, is not fraudulent on its face. Murray v. McNealy, 86 Ala. 234.

But a parol agreement that the proceeds of the sale shall be turned over to the mortgagee will not validate the mortgage. Owens v. Hobbie, supra.

The mortgage may be valid between the parties. Wiley v. Knight, 27 Ala. 326.

Power to sell as the demand of trade in the usual way shall require "to the same extent as though this instrument had not been made" and no requirement that the proceeds are to be applied upon the mortgage, or so invested as to fix a continuing trust on them for the purposes of the mortgage, renders the mortgage void as against creditors. Martin v. Ogden, 41 Ark. 186.

Although the mortgage may be valid between the parties, and as to property not within the power of sale. Lund v. Fletcher, 30 Ark. 825.

That the agreement does not appear upon the face of the instrument is immaterial. It is sufficient to avoid the transaction if it is shown by extrinsic evidence. Gauss v. Doyle, 46 Ark. 122.

Making the mortgagor the agent to sell the goods does not render the mortgage void. Fink v. Ehrman, 44 Ark. 310; Felner v. Wilson, 55 Ark. 77.

California.

The question is not an open one in California since a statute provides that "no mortgage of personal property shall be valid against any other than the parties to it unless possession of the mortgaged property is delivered to and retained by the mortgagee." See Meyer v. Gorham, 5 Cal. 322.

Where the mortgagor by an agreement, express or implied, is permitted to continue in possession of and sell the stock of goods, shifting in their nature, at retail, for his own benefit, the mortgage is void. First Nat. Bank of Pierre v. Comfort (Dak.) Feb. Term, 1893.

Permitting sales for the purpose of replenishing stock does not avoid the mortgage. McKay v. Shotwell, 6 Dak. 124.

District of Columbia.

A mortgage permitting the mortgagor to retain possession and use the property, and purporting to cover "every article that may be purchased by way of replenishing the stock," is void. Fox v. Davidson, 1 Mackey, 102.

It is void in toto. Smith v. Kenney, 1 Mackey, 12.

Florida.

If the mortgagor has power to sell the goods at his discretion or in the usual course of business the mortgage is void. Logan v. Logan, 22 Fla. 562.

The mortgage is not void as between the parties to it nor as against a third person whose claim is not based on a valuable consideration. McCoy v. Boley, 21 Fla. 804.

Georgia.

The Georgia Code, § 1954, permits mortgages upon stocks of goods which shall cover the stock as it changes from time to time. See Johnson v. Patterson, 2 Woods, C. C. 443.

Under that statute the mortgage cannot by purchase or addition of new goods be made to cover an amount greater in value than the stock originally mortgaged. Chiselm v. Chittenden, 45 Ga. 213.

Where the goods mortgaged are put into a partnership concern against an equal amount of goods furnished by the other partner the mortgage does not cover the goods bought to replenish sales from the partnership stock. Anderson v. Howard, 49 Ga. 813.

The mortgage will cover goods bought on credit to replenish stock sold which come into the store free from liens. Goodrich v. Williams, 50 Ga. 423.

It also sets forth the fact that the parties thereto had been partners; that the firm was dissolved by Kelleher purchasing the interest of Ephraim, the giving of the notes to Schweitzer & Co. for the benefit of their creditors, and the agreement of Kelleher to pay the firm liabilities. The mortgage also contains the following provisions: "And it is agreed, if the mortgagors shall fail to cause said promissory notes, and each of them, to be duly paid off, satisfied, and canceled, or shall fail or refuse to cause the aforesaid account of Schweitzer & Co. to be paid off and satisfied, or shall fail or refuse to cause the aforesaid account in favor of the Merced Wool Mill Company to be paid off and satisfied, or if the aforesaid stock, goods, wares, merchandise, and fixtures, or any part thereof, shall be levied upon by any writ of attachment, execution, or other proceedings, or shall come into the hands of any sheriff, assignee, receiver, administrator, executor, or other officer, or if all or any one of the aforesaid promissory notes shall fall due and remain unpaid, then, and in that event, the mortgagee may immediately take possession of said property, goods, wares, merchandise, fixtures, book accounts, and promissory notes, using all force necessary so to do, and may immediately proceed to sell the same, in the manner provided by law, and from the proceeds may pay the whole amount due, or thereafter to become due, upon each and all of the aforesaid promissory notes,

A mortgage providing that the mortgagor shall keep possession of the goods, sell them in the usual course of trade and out of the proceeds pay certain creditors named, the mortgage to become void when this is done, which shall be within fifteen months, all after-acquired property to be subject to its provisions, is void. Davis v. Ransom, 18 Ill. 303.

Permission to sell and receive the proceeds and retain a certain sum therefrom each month to enable the mortgagor to run the business, pay hands, and support his family, renders the mortgage void. Greenbaum v. Wheeler, 90 Ill. 236.

That the agreement was not inserted in the mortgage is not important. Huschle v. Morris, 181 Ill. 580, affirming 29 Ill. App. 484.

An agreement extraneous to the mortgage will avoid it. Barnett v. Fergus, 51 Ill. 552, 99 Am. Dec. 547.

Permitting the mortgagor to retain and use the stock consisting of liquors does not necessarily imply the power to sell them so as to render the mortgage void. Cleaves v. Herbert, 61 Ill. 126.

Permitting the mortgagor to make public sale of the goods, the mortgagee taking the notes given to himself and also taking all cash paid, will not render the mortgage void. Goodheart v. Johnson, 88 Ill. 58.

Continuing the mortgagor in the store to assist in the sale of the goods under the supervision of the mortgagee will not avoid the mortgage. Read v. Wilson, supra.

But leaving the mortgagor in exclusive possession with permission to sell although as agent of the mortgagee renders the mortgage void as against bona fide creditors and purchasers. Dunning v. Mead, 90 Ill. 373.

If the power to sell is given to the mortgagor it is immaterial what provision is made as to the disposition of the proceeds. The mortgage will be void in any event. William Deering & Co. v. Washburn (Ill.) Jan. 18, 1892, affirming 39 Ill. App. 424.

Indiana.

The course of decision in this state has occasioned some difficulty to persons attempting to state the Indiana law. But a comparison of the various decisions of the court seems to show little if any conflict and a fair degree of adherence to one general rule. An early decision held that if a mortgage is executed merely as a cloak to protect property in the hands of a mortgagor from his creditors, the mortgagor still retaining possession and the right of disposition, and these facts appear on the face of the mortgage, the court should declare it void. New Albany Ins. Co. v. Wilcoxson, 21 Ind. 358.

So where the mortgage is on a stock of goods the only use that can be made of which is to sell them in the usual course of trade, and contains a provision that the mortgagor shall retain possession "with the privilege of using the same," it is void. Mobley v. Letts, 61 Ind. 11.

A statute was passed which made the question of fraudulent intent one of fact, under which the court said the cases will be rare in which it can be correctly stated that the mortgage is void on its face. Lookwood v. Harding, 79 Ind. 183.

In accordance with that doctrine, it was held that the mere fact that the mortgagor is authorized to sell the goods at retail will not render the mortgage fraudulent if there was nothing to show that he was to apply the proceeds to his own use. Morris v. Stern, 80 Ind. 281.

That where the authority to sell the mortgaged goods is by a writing executed contemporaneously with the mortgage the question of fraud is for the jury. Louthain v. Miller, 85 Ind. 163.

That a fraudulent intent cannot be judicially inferred from the fact that the mortgagor by the terms of the mortgage may remain in possession with leave to sell the property even though he be not by stipulation in the mortgage required to account for the proceeds of sale. Fisher v. Syfers, 109 Ind. 518.

That a court cannot declare that a provision vesting the right of disposition in the mortgagor vitiates the mortgage. Muncie Nat. Bank v. Brown, 112 Ind. 481.

And in a case in which it did not appear whether the authority of the mortgagor to sell the goods appeared on the face of the mortgage or not the court said that under the statute a mortgage cannot be declared void on its face. McFadden v. Hopkins, 61 Ind. 482.

So where a mortgage of liquors and other property provided that the mortgagor should keep possession until the note became due the claim was made that the mortgage was void on its face for not requiring the mortgagor to account to the mortgagee for the proceeds of sales made by him, relying on Mobley v. Letts, 61 Ind. 11; but the court and upon the account of the aforesaid Newhall Sons & Company, and upon account of the said Merced Woolen Mill Company; and also from the proceeds aforesaid, pay and satisfy the reasonable costs and expenses of selling said stock, appropriating the proceeds thereof to the purposes aforesaid, and for the payment of reasonable and proper attorney's fees, in the sum of ten per cent of the amount of said stock so taken and sold; and, further, that in the event that the mortgagee shall at any time deem himself to be insecure by reason of the failure of said W. T. Kelleher to pay and satisfy the aforesaid notes and accounts, or from any other cause, then the said Ephraim shall have the right to take possession of said property, and sell the same, in the same manner, for the same purposes, and with the same power, as hereinbefore granted." No provision is made in the instrument for selling the mortgaged goods by the mortgagor, but the proof shows that at the time the mortgage was given it was understood and agreed between the parties that Kelleher should have the right to sell the goods in the usual course of trade, and use part of the proceeds to pay for such new goods as might be required to keep up the stock, and to defray the expenses of conducting the business, and apply the balance in discharge of the obligation set forth in the mortgage.

The controlling question in this case is whether the court below erred in adjudging said that under the statute the mortgage could not be declared void on its face, that fraud in such cases was a question of fact. McFadden v. Fritz, 90 Ind. 592.

But the court still held that the construction of written instruments is for the court, and it may tell the jury the effect of the language used in the instrument where there is no dispute as to what provisions it contains. Louthain v. Miller, 85 Ind. 163.

And finally the court said, where no agreement as to the disposition of the proceeds appears the court cannot infer an intention that the mortgagor may use them for his own benefit or that the mortgage was made with fraudulent intent and in the absence of any showing as to what application was made of the proceeds it will be presumed that the mortgagor remained in possession under an agreement to account as agent of the mortgagee and the proceeds of sales will be regarded as applied to the liquidation of the mortgage debt. But if an understanding appears, either on the face of the mortgage or in a contemporaneous agreement, that the mortgagor was not to account for the proceeds but might deal with the property to all intents and purposes as if it was his own, an inference of fraud arises which renders the mortgage void. New v. Sailors, 114 Ind. 408.

This last decision, it will be seen, varies but little from the doctrine originally announced in New Albany Ins. Co. v. Wilcoxson, 21 Ind. 358.

The state court took the position that the mortgage is void only as to the property permitted to be sold. Davenport v. Foulke, 68 Ind. 382.

While the Federal court for that district regarded the entire mortgage as void. Re Burrows, 7 Biss. 523.

Authority to the mortgagor to sell and apply the proceeds to the payment of the mortgage debt does not vitiate the mortgage. Fletcher v. Martin, 128 Ind. 66; Mayer v. Feig, 114 Ind. 577.

The mortgagor may be permitted to retail and apply the proceeds in satisfaction of the mortgage debt. Overman v. Quick, 8 Biss. 184.

The mortgage is not invalid if the proceeds of sales are to be applied in payment of the debt secured. Rindakopf v. Vaughan, 40 Fed. Rep. 304. Iowa.

Under the statute making the recording of the mortgage equivalent to actual delivery to the mortgagee giving the mortgagor power to dispose of the mortgaged property in due course of trade is not fraudulent per se. Torbert v. Hayden, 11 Iowa, 435.

The mortgagor may retain possession and dispose of the mortgaged property by sale, if done in good faith. Fromme v. Jones, 13 Iowa, 481.

A mortgage merely giving the mortgagor the power of sale will not be declared void on its face. Meyer v. Gage, 65 Iowa, 610.

And is not rendered so by the fact that no provision is made as to the application of the proceeds of sales. Clark v. Hyman, 55 Iowa, 20, 39 Am. Rep. 160; Meyer v. Evans, 66 Iowa, 185.

A provision that the mortgagor may sell the mortgaged property turning over the proceeds to the banker of the mortgagee after deducting the expenses of sale including his own salary does not render the mortgage void. Adler v. Clafin, 17 Iowa, 91.

A mortgage containing reservations to the mortgagor, first, to sell before default in the usual course of retail trade, keeping the property up to its then value, second, to retain in his hands the avails of the sales, 33 per cent of which shall be applied on the notes secured by the mortgage, is not fraudulent on its face. Hughes v. Cory, 20 Iowa, 399.

The mortgage is not rendered fraudulent in law by the fact that the mortgagor is insolvent and that he is permitted to retain possession and dispose of the goods in the usual course of trade and appropriate a part of the proceeds to the support of himself and family. Sperry v. Etheridge, 63 Iowa, 544.

The mortgage is not void as matter of law because it provides for an extension of time of the indebtedness and that the mortgagor shall have the right to retain possession and carry on the business in the usual retail way for one year paying the cost and expenses of running the business and keeping up the stock to what it was when the mortgage was given. Jaffray v. Greenbaum, 64 Iowa, 492.

The Federal courts in Iowa have to some extent refused to follow the state courts and have held the mortgages void as matter of law. Crooks v. Stuart, 2 McCrary, 17, 7 Fed. Rep. 800; Argall v. Seymour, 4 McCrary, 55; Wells v. Langbein, 20 Fed. Rep. 183.

This course, so far as there is real conflict, would seem to be plainly erroneous in view of the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in Etheridge v. Sperry, 139 U. S. 236, 35 L. ed. 171; although Judge Shiras attempts to explain the apparent conflict between the state and Federal decisions in the case of Lyon v. Council Bluffs Sav. Bank, 29 Fed. Rep. 581, which opinion as much as any shows the real point of variance between the two lines of decision obtained throughout the country.

If the mortgage does not show that the sales are to be for the mortgagor's benefit the burden is on the party asserting the invalidity of the mortgage to show that such was the intention in order to have the mortgage set aside. Maish v. Bird, 23 Fed. Rep. 578.

Taking possession will not render the mortgagee's title good. Wells v. Langbein, 20 Fed. Rep. 183.

the mortgage in question fraudulent and void as to the assignee and the creditors of the mortgagor. The instrument is in the usual form of indemnity mortgages. It shows no infirmities upon its face, and was executed in accordance with the provisions of the statute, and apparently for a legitimate purpose; and, if it is to be declared invalid, it must be either by reason of the parol agreement between the parties at the time of its execution, whereby the mortgagor was permitted to appropriate part of the proceeds of the property for the purposes of replenishing the stock and paying the expenses of carrying on the business, or because the mortgage was given and received for the purpose of enabling the mortgagor to defraud his other creditors. The doctrine that fraud may be deduced, as a legal conclusion, from the mere retention by the mortgagor of the property mortgaged, can have no application under our law of chattel mortgages, for the reason that by our statute the mortgagor is the owner of the property, and, unless he stipulates to the contrary, is entitled to the possession, even after default. The mortgage is a mere lien, by virtue of which no title passes or can pass to the mortgagee, except by foreclosure and sale, in the manner provided by law. This is the plain import of the provisions of chapter 141, and §§ 618, 619, Code 1881, (1 Hill's Code, chaps. 1-8, title 19,) relating to mortgages on personal property; and, the mortgagor in this case

An agreement outside of the mortgage that the mortgagor may continue disposing of the goods in the usual course of business and use a portion of the proceeds thereof in the support of his family, paying the remainder over in discharge of the debt, does not avoid the mortgage. Frankhouser v. Ellett, 22 Kan. 127.

Where the mortgagor is permitted to have the entire possession of the property with power to sell the same and dispose of the proceeds thereof, as he may choose, the mortgage should generally be held void as against the mortgagor's creditors. Leiser v. Glaser, 22 Kan. 552.

Where the mortgage did not contain any provision as to proceeds and the mortgagor was a near relative of the mortgagee, and the mortgaged property was worth much more than the mortgage debt, and there were other circumstances tending to show that the mortgage was executed for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of the mortgagor, it was held void. Ibid.

A stipulation that the mortgagor may pay store and living expenses out of the proceeds does not avoid the mortgage. Whitson v. Griffin, 30 Kan. 211.

The mortgagee may place the mortgagor in possession as his agent to sell the property and such agent may receive compensation for his services. Gleason v. Wilson, 48 Kan. 500.

The fact that the mortgagor neglects to account for the proceeds of sale according to agreement will not render the mortgage void. Howard v. Rohlfing, 36 Kan. 357.

Kentucky.

No decision from this state has been found which deals with the question under consideration.

In Ross v. Wilson, 7 Bush, 33, there is nothing to show any agreement between the parties as to sales, but it does appear that the mortgagee acquiesced in sales by the mortgagor of the mortgaged property and the misappropriation by him of the proceeds. The question raised by such state of facts is not within the scope of this note and the court expressly distinguished Edgell v. Hart, 9 N. Y. 216, 59 Am. Dec. 532, from the one before it on the ground that the contract in the New York case permitted the mortgagor to buy and sell goods under cover of the mortgage.

lent per se if such possession is not inconsistent with the security of the mortgage and there is not mingled in the contract any intention to delay or defraud other creditors or withhold the property from them beyond what may have been necessary for the mortgagee's protection. Brinley v. Spring, 7 Me. 241.

A clause allowing the mortgagor to remain in possession for a year with an understanding that the business should go on as before under the control of the mortgagor will not avoid the mortgage as matter of law. Googins v. Gilmore, 47 Me. 15, 74 Am. Dec. 472.

As between the parties a mortgage is good with a stipulation giving the mortgagor the power of selling and with the proceeds to purchase other goods, and so on forever, all of which should be subject to the lien. Allen v. Goodnow, 71 Me. 421.

An agreement that the mortgagor may continue in possession of the mortgaged goods and sell them in the usual course of trade and apply the proceeds to his own use is merely evidence of fraud subject to explanation, and evidence for that purpose is therefore admissible. Briggs v. Parkman, 3 Met. 264, 37 Am. Dec. 89.

A mortgage of a stock of goods is not fraudulent per se because of a provision therein that the mortgagor may sell and dispose of some of the goods provided he forthwith purchase and place in the store other like goods of like value and apply the sales thereof to the payment of the mortgage debt. Jones v. Huggesford, 3 Met. 515.

The mortgage is not rendered void by a provision that the proceeds realized from any sale shall be applied to the purchase of other articles of the same kind to be held subject to the mortgage. Cobb v. Farr, 16 Gray, 597.

Power to sell the mortgaged property and purchase more in its place does not necessarily render the mortgage void. Codman v. Freeman, 3 Cush. 309.

The court will not set aside as fraudulent a mortgage because of a provision that until default the mortgagor may retain possession and make sales substituting other goods of equal value for those sold. Barnard v. Eaton, 2 Cush. 394.

having a right to the possession of the mortgaged goods, no presumption of fraud can arise from the fact that he remained in possession until the levy of the writs of attachment. This proposition does not seem to be disputed by the respondents. Nor is it claimed that the mortgage in controversy would have been rendered invalid by an agreement or provision for the sale of the goods by the mortgagor in the ordinary course of trade, provided the proceeds were to be applied exclusively to the payment of the mortgage debt. Such a mortgage was held valid in the case of Langert v. Brown, 8 Wash. Terr. 102, and we feel confident that no court in such a case would now hold the contrary doctrine, unless controlled by statute or bound by prior decisions.

But the respondents contend that the fact that the mortgagee agreed to allow the mortgagor to use part of the proceeds of the sales to purchase additions to the stock, and to pay the running expenses of the business, invalidated the mortgage as to the creditors of Kelleher; and in support of their contention they cite, among others, the case of Wineburgh v. Schaer, 2 Wash. Terr. 823, and that of Byrd v. Forbes, 8 Wash. Terr. 318. In the former case the question of the validity of a chattel mortgage was raised upon a demurrer to the answer which alleged that the mortgagor retained possession of the goods, and sold and disposed of the same in the usual course of business, and applied the proceeds to his own use and benefit, with the knowledge and consent of the mortgagee;

Power to sell the goods does not of itself avoid the mortgage. Fletcher v. Powers, 181 Mass. 832; Blanchard v. Cooke, 144 Mass. 226.

The court cannot instruct the jury that the fact that the mortgagor is given power to sell in the usual course of trade will alone warrant them in finding fraud. Sleeper v. Chapman, 121 Mass. 404. Michigan.

Where the instrument contains illegal provisions and such as are not reconcilable on any possible hypothesis with an honest and legal intent, the law declares it void upon its face because no evidence could change its character. Oliver v. Eaton, 7 Mich. 112.

A clause that the mortgagor "shall be allowed to continue the sale of goods from the store as though this instrument had not been made," simply authorizes sales in the usual course of business and does not render the mortgage void. Wingler v. Sibley, 35 Mich. 231.

The mortgage is not void in law. Hills v. Stockwell & D. Furniture Co. 23 Fed. Rep. 432.

The question of fraud is one for the jury. Morse v. Riblet, 23 Fed. Rep. 501.

A mortgage cannot properly be given under an agreement by which it is to fall due at once and be foreclosed and the property placed in the hands of a receiver who shall manage it to the exclusion of other creditors. Merchants & Mfrs. Nat. Bank v. Kent, 43 Mich. 202.

Mortgaged chattels do not cease to belong to the mortgagor until steps are taken to end his rights. The mortgage is a mere security to the mortgagee and not a transfer of title. The mortgagor while remaining in possession is not the agent of the mortgagee but owner of incumbered property. Permission to sell at retail is permission to pass title free from incumbrance but cannot be regarded as in any sense a payment of the mortgage. People v. Bristol, 35 Mich. 33.

Minnesota.

A mortgage of chattels containing an agreement that the mortgagor may retain possession and sell and dispose of the mortgaged property as his own without satisfaction of the mortgage debt is of no effect as a security and can only operate to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors. Horton v. Williams, 21 Minn. 191.

A stipulation that the mortgagor should dispose of the goods in the ordinary course of business as his own avoids the mortgage. Stein v. Munch, 24 Minn. 351.

Power to sell renders the instrument void although there is a requirement to account to the 18 L. R. A.

mortgagee for the proceeds. Chopard v. Bayard, 4 Minn. 533.

In that case the court says there is a material distinction between an agreement simply to account for the proceeds under which they might be applied to any object, even the support of the mortgagor, and one which would require their application upon the mortgage debt. It subsequently held that a provision that the proceeds of sale should be applied in satisfaction of the mortgage will prevent the mortgage being declared void as matter of law. Bannon v. Bowler, 34 Minn. 416.

Permitting the mortgagor to dispose of the goods as agent for the mortgagee and account for the proceeds does not render the mortgage void. Hawkins v. Hastings Bank, 1 Dill. 462.

But the proceeds of all sales must be credited on the mortgage whether turned over to the mortgagee or not. Ibid.

In a case of a sale of a stock of merchandise a stipulation that the vendor might act as agent for the vendee for a stipulated compensation was held not to avoid the transaction. Wilcox v. Landberg, 30 Minn. 93.

A provision requiring the mortgagor to replenish and keep up the stock will not render the instrument valid. Gallagher v. Rosenfield, 47 Minn. 510.

The Recording Act does not make the filing of the mortgage legally equivalent to actual delivery and continued possession. Horton v. Williams, 21 Minn. 191.

Possession acquired under the mortgage will not perfect the title of the mortgagee. Stein v. Munch, 24 Minn. 351.

But if before any proceedings are taken hostile to the mortgage the mortgage property is delivered to the mortgagee in good faith in satisfaction of the mortgage debt the title of the mortgagee will prevail against that of creditors subsequently proceeding against the mortgagor. *First Nat. and the court held, upon the facts as admitted by the demurrer, that the mortgage was void as to the creditors of the mortgagor. But in so holding the court did not attempt to express its own view as to the rule that should govern in determining the validity of such instruments, but followed the binding decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Robinson v. Elliott, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 518, 22 L. ed. 758. In delivering the opinion of the court, Turner, J., said: "If we were at liberty to do so, it would be profitable to take up these cases, [referred to by counsel,] and attempt to extract from them the rule upon the subject that seems to be most consonant with sound reason. We are stopped on the threshold of the investigation, however, by an authority of such weight that it would have great force with the court of any state where the question was still an open one; and that, as to this court, is binding and authoritative. We refer to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Robinson v. Elliott, reported in 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 518, 22 L. ed. 758. It was decided in that case, by the unanimous voice of the full bench, that a chattel mortgage upon a stock of goods in trade, which permits the mortgagor to remain in possession of the property, and in its disposition by sale in due course of trade, at his discretion, until the maturity of the debt purporting to be secured by it, is fraudulent and void as to other

The right to sell the property must be expressed to render the mortgage void as matter of law. Hitchler v. Citizens Bank, 63 Miss. 408.

If the power of sale does not appear on the face of the mortgage the court cannot declare it void. Summers v. Boos, 43 Miss. 749, 2 Am. Rep. 658; Hilliard v. Cagle, 46 Miss. 841.

It is only where the conveyance so unmistakably reserves the right to the mortgagor to deal with the property as his own that all evidence to the contrary should be excluded as contradicting the writing that the court can declare the deed fraudulent in law. Britton v. Criswell, 68 Miss. 306.

A clause conveying "all the goods that may be hereafter purchased to be sold in the store" is not such an express provision for the continuance of the business as to render the mortgage void on its face. Baldwin v. Little, 64 Miss. 128.

General rules.

To render a mortgage fraudulent on its face it must plainly or by necessary implication express the right of the grantor to remain in possession and dispose of the property. Voorhis v. Langsdorf, 31 Mo. 451.

If the goods are to remain in the possession of the mortgagor to be disposed of in the ordinary course of business the mortgage is void. White v. Graves, 68 Mo. 223.

Permission to remain in possession for the purpose of carrying on the business as before will render the mortgage void. Lodge v. Samuels, 50 Mo. 204; Moser v. Claes, 23 Mo. App. 420.

But the mere fact that the mortgagor is to remain in possession will not render the mortgage void. Hisey v. Goodwin, 30 Mo. 866.

Authorizing the mortgagor to retain possession and dispose of the goods in the regular course of business paying out of the proceeds all necessary expenses of the business and of the support of the mortgagor and his family as long as he should deposit the excess to the credit of the mortgagee is void. Place v. Langworthy, 13 Mo. 629, 30 Am. Dec. 758.

The constructive fraud which exists where there is an agreement that the grantor in a deed of trust shall remain in possession and continue to sell in the ordinary course of business is sufficient to support an attachment. Reed v. Pelletier, 23 Mo. 173. The court will not hear extrinsic evidence to enable it to pronounce the mortgage void as matter of law. Weber v. Armstrong, 70 Mo. 217.

A contemporaneous agreement is sufficient to avoid the mortgage. State v. D'Oench, 31 Mo. 453; State v. Jacob, 2 Mo. App. 138.

Construction of particular mortgages.

A mortgage by a mechanic covering all tools, machinery, materials, stock, etc., that may now or hereafter belong to the mortgagor in the course of his trade or business is not void on its face. State v. Tasker, 31 Mo. 445.

The mere fact that the mortgaged property is a stock of drugs is not sufficient to show an implied reservation of a power of sale. Weber v. Armstrong, 70 Mo. 217.

Attempting to cover the goods "which may be added from time to time to said stock" is not sufficient to render the mortgage void upon its face. Voorhis v. Langsdorf, 31 Mo. 451.

Describing the goods as those "now kept and offered for sale at the storeroom at," etc., and extending it to cover and include any goods which the mortgagor might thereafter add to the stock, does not render it void on its face. Hewson v. Tuttle, 72 Mo. 623.

A mortgage is not void if it expressly prohibits the mortgagor from making sales without the express consent of the mortgagee. Thompson v. Foerstel, 10 Mo. App. 290.

It is void if it confers on the mortgagor power to substitute other property in place of that covered by the mortgage. State v. Busch, 38 Mo. App. 440.

And if it attempts to cover "substitutes." Godard v. Jones, 78 Mo. 518.

Instructions.

If the evidence shows the mortgage to be void the court should so instruct. McCarthy v. Miller, 41 Mo. App. 200.

The court should instruct that if the jury find that the mortgagor was to be left in possession with power to sell they should find the conveyance void as to creditors. Bullene v. Barrett, 87 Mo. 186.

Taking possession.

There seems to have been a change of opinion in this state as to the effect of taking possession. It was held at one time that taking possession of the goods will not perfect the title of the mortgagee. Armstrong v. Tuttle, 34 Mo. 432.

But subsequent cases have decided that if the mortgagee takes possession in good faith to secure his claim before the rights of other creditors attach, he may hold the property against their claims. Greeley v. Reading, 74 Mo. 909.

creditors, without reference to the bona fides of the parties. We gather from the opinion, however, that the court strongly doubted if the mortgage would be invalid in case the money derived from the sale of the mortgaged property was applied, and was understood to be applied, to the extinction, in whole or in part, of the mortgage debt. This authority must govern us in the decision of this case." But that case can hardly be regarded as an authority in support of the contention of respondents, for the reason that in the case at bar it does not appear that the mortgagor was authorized by the mortgagee to apply the proceeds of the property sold to his own use and benefit. But the case of Byrd v. Forbes, to some extent at least, would seem to support the claim of the respondents, and was probably relied on as authority for the conclusion reached by the learned judge of the superior court in this case. In that case it was stipulated, among other things, in the mortgage, that "until default be made in the payment of any of the said promissory notes, and so long as the mortgagor shall keep up his stock of goods so as to be good and ample security for the payment of the principal and interest of the said promissory notes, that the said mortgagor may and shall have the right to retain possession of the mortgaged property, and sell and dispose of the same in the usual course of his retail business and trade or in job lots for the sole use and benefit of mort-

A mortgage on a stock of goods and fixtures giving power to sell the goods in the usual course of business is not invalid as to the fixtures. Bullene v. Barrett, 87 Mo. 138; Kennedy v. Dodson, 44 Mo. App. 554.

Proceeds to be applied on mortgage.

New Jersey.

The fact that the mortgagor is authorized to sell in the usual course of business does not render the mortgage void per se, but the question of fraud is one of fact to be determined in the same manner as other questions of fact are determined. Lister v. Simpson, 38 N. J. Eq. 438.

gage, until the said promissory notes are fully paid, and said mortgage debt is fully paid and satisfied." And the court held that the mortgage was void for indefiniteness, and as being fraud on creditors of the mortgagor. It was observed by Chief Justice Greene, who delivered the opinion of the court, that the mortgage fell fairly within the principle underlying the case of Robinson v. Elliott, 89 U. S. 22 Wall. 518, 22 L. ed. 758. But it would seem that the decision of the court, in its application of the doctrine of constructive fraud, really went beyond the underlying principle in the case of Robinson v. Elliott; for in the latter case of Mr. Justice Davis, speaking for the court, used this language: "But there are features ingrafted on this mortgage which are not only to the prejudice of creditors, but which show that other consideration than the security of the mortgagees, or their accommodation even, entered into the contract. Both the possession and right of disposition remain with the mortgagors. They are to deal with the property as their own, sell it at retail, and use the money thus obtained to replenish their stock. There is no covenant to account with the mortgagees, nor any recognition that the property is sold for their benefit." It may be reasonably inferred, from the language above quoted, that the court would have sustained the mortgage then before it had the features spoken of not been ingrafted on it; and we do not feel certain that the Early decisions.

In this state the broad proposition that a stipulation in the mortgage giving the mortgagor possession with power of sale rendered the mortgage void was not at once established. The courts seemed to approach it gradually. The earliest cases seem to have been decided after a consideration of all the facts bearing on the question of fraud.

Thus it was held that—

Permitting the mortgagor to remain in possession and sell in the usual course of trade after the mortgage has become forfeited without any accounting between the parties, or any knowledge of the amount due, the amount of the mortgage being originally much greater than the debt, is fraudulent as matter of law. Divver v. McLaughlin, 2 Wend. 586.

That where the mortgage is kept secret and the mortgagor remains in possession using and disposing of the property as absolute owner, a verdict against the validity of the mortgage will be sustained although the jury was wrongly instructed. McLachlan v. Wright, 3 Wend. 384.

That a stipulation in the mortgage that the mortgagor shall remain in possession of the goods until default accompanied by the authority of the mortgagee that he may deal with them in all respects as other merchants do with their merchandise renders the mortgage void in law notwithstanding it is filed under the provisions of the Recording Act. That Act does not repeal the statute concerning fraudulent conveyances. Wood v. Lowry, 17 Wend. 492.

But a mortgage leaving the mortgagor in possession was upheld in Lery v. Welsh, 2 Edw. Ch. 443, 6 L. ed. 460, although he continued to make sales in the usual course of trade on the ground that such possession was not inconsistent with the object and intention of the parties and there had been no forfeiture of the mortgage although it does not appear by what authority he continued making sales.

The rule established.

The question came before the new court of appeals soon after its organization.

The mortgage provided that the mortgagor was to remain and continue in quiet possession and full enjoyment of the property and the circumstances of the parties and other provisions in the mortgage tended to show an intention that the mortgagor should go on selling the goods as a merchant as though he was the absolute owner. The court was 18 L. R. A.

equally divided in opinion, four of the judges holding that the mortgage was void upon its face; while the other four, although admitting that if the mortgage contained a provision allowing the mortgagor to go on selling and disposing of the goods at his pleasure it would not be a mortgage or create any lien, yet were of the opinion that, since no such provision appeared on the face of the mortgage and a resort to other evidence was required to prove it, the case ought to be submitted to the jury, stating that since the statute made retaining of possession presumptive evidence of fraud if there was no evidence of good faith the court should declare the fraud as matter of law; but if there was evidence of good faith the question became one of fact and should be submitted to the jury. Gräwold v. Sheldon, 4 N. Y. 582.

When the question again came before the court it appeared that by the terms of the mortgage and the schedule attached the mortgagor was to retain possession and sell in the usual course of trade and the mortgage lien was to attach to any purchases as they were from time to time made. The instrument was held to be void as to creditors as matter of law. Edgell v. Hart, 9 N. Y. 218, 59 Am. Dec. 522, affirming 13 Barb. 380.

The court subsequently in discussing the question said that where the agreement is that the mortgagor shall make sales for his own benefit, it shows conclusively that it was given for some purpose other than that of securing a debt to the mortgagee, and that its only operation must be to prejudice others, and therefore it cannot be shown that the mortgage was not made in bad faith and without design to hinder or defraud creditors since such can be its only effect. It is so plainly fraudulent that the court should so pronounce it, and it is immaterial whether the agreement appears on the face of the instrument or not. Russell v. Winne, 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 388, 37 N. Y. 595, 97 Am. Dec. 755.

An agreement that the mortgagor may deal with the goods for his own benefit destroys the value of the mortgage as a security and makes it available only to protect the property from creditors and secure it to the mortgagor. Such a transaction is necessarily fraudulent, whether it is contained in the mortgage or not. Southard v. Pinckney, 5 Abb. N. C. 196; 8 C. sub' nom. Southard v. Benner, 72 N. Y. 425.

A mortgage which is made with the purpose and effect of allowing the mortgagor to continue in possession and to sell the mortgaged goods at retail, and receive the proceeds to his own use, is fraudulent and void as against creditors because it furnishes conclusive evidence of fraudulent intent. The instrument cannot operate according to its intent without defrauding creditors. Marston v. Vultor, 12 Abb. Pr. 144, 8 Bosw. 159.

In discussing the effect of the statute making court would have held the mortgage void in the case of Byrd v. Forbes, on the authority of Robinson v. Elliott, if it had had before it the late case of Etheridge v. Sperry, 180 U. S. 266, 35 L. ed. 171, in which that case, among others, is reviewed, and its meaning explained. We therefore do not consider the case of Byrd v. Forbes as absolutely settling the law of this state upon the question, and we certainly would not be disposed to extend the doctrine there laid down, even if we should apply it to a like state of facts. Moreover, we venture the suggestion that the mortgage under consideration in that case might well have been interpreted as showing an honest intention on the part of the parties to it; and, if that be true, it could hardly be said to be void as matter of law. When two constructions can be given to a written instrument, one making it consistent, and the other inconsistent, with honesty and fairness, the former should be adopted. It was said by Campbell, J., in Gay v. Bidwell, 7 Mich. 519, to be a cardinal rule never to infer a dishonest meaning if an honest one is possible, and consistent with the whole tenor of the instrument. This is a sound and just rule of construction, and furnishes a safe test in determining the validity of chattel mortgages. The tendency of the later decisions appears to be against declaring these instruments fraudulent in law, unless they are necessarily so upon their face, and towards leaving the fraud a question for the jury one of the courts said that an instrument containing a trust for the benefit of the mortgagor is made void by statute, and that there is no question for the jury. That the question is entirely different from the onus arising under the statute declaring void conveyances made with intent to delay or defraud creditors and making the question of intent one for the jury. Spies v. Boyd, 1 E. D. Smith, 445.

The doctrine finally became fully settled that if the mortgage contemplates the disposal of the property by the mortgagor in the usual course of business, it is void. Wagner v. Jones, 7 Daly, 375; Ball v. Slaughter, 20 Hun, 355.

One claiming under the mortgage must affirmatively show, in the absence of change of possession, that the mortgage was made in good faith and without any intent to defraud creditors or purchasers, and also that the mortgage was duly filed. Otis v. Still, 8 Barb. 110.

But the court cannot declare the mortgage void unless an agreement has been made either in the mortgage or between the parties to it, the necessary construction of which permits the mortgagor to make sales for his own benefit. Chatham Nat. Bank v. O'Brien, 6 Hun, 231.

Construction of particular provisions.

The mere insertion of a provision that the mortgage shall be a continuing lien upon "the stock or goods thereafter brought into the store," is not of itself sufficient to show permission to the mortgagor to deal with the goods which will render the mortgage void per se. Yates v. Olmstead, 56 N. Y. 632, reversing 65 Barb. 43.

An agreement that the mortgagor may sell for cash or on credit, use the proceeds in the business, pay a certain amount on the debt each year, keep the stock in about the same condition, and give a new mortgage each year to cover additions, renders the mortgage void. Cook v. Bennett, 38 N. Y. S. R. 632.

A mortgage purporting to cover all goods that may be substituted for those mortgaged is void. Carpenter v. Simmons, 1 Robt. 300; Spies v. Boyd, 1 E. D. Smith, 445.

A mortgage of a stock in trade and the "increase and decrease" thereof, with a provision that the mortgagor shall remain in possession, is void as matter of law. Mittnacht v. Kelly, 3 Keyes, 407, 3 Abb. App. Dec. 301.

The mere presence of a covenant that the mortgagor shall "keep about the same amount of stock on hand," will not render the mortgage fraudulent as matter of law. Stedman v. Batchelor, 23 N. Y. S. R. 436.

A covenant to execute new mortgages upon all goods purchased to replenish stock does not render the mortgage void. Hincks v. Field, 37 N. Y. S. R. 724.

Permission to sell on credit and turn the proceeds over to the mortgagee when the accounts are collected will render the mortgage void. City Bank of Rochester v. Westbury, 16 Hun, 453.

But if the accounts are to be assigned when made and credited immediately on the indebtedness the mortgage is not fraudulent per se. Caring v. Richmond, 22 Hun, 371.

Implied provisions in the mortgage that the mortgagor may sell on credit, taking good business paper which the mortgagee will accept and apply on the debt, and that part of the avails of sales may be used to replenish stock, which shall be substituted in the mortgage in place of the goods sold, by monthly renewals, do not make the mortgage void on its face, but the further agreement to permit the mortgagor to use part of the avails for personal expenses will do so. Brackett v. Harvey, 91 N. Y. 220, reversing 25 Hun, 502.

Agreements not in the mortgage.

Contemporaneous agreements render the mortgage void. Re Cantrell, 6 Ben. 432.

A tacit understanding is sufficient to avoid the mortgage. Hangen v. Hachmeister, 5 L. R. A. 137, 114 N. Y. 566.

If the agreement exists the mortgage is void although the agreement does not appear on its face. Potts v. Hart, 90 N. Y. 163.

If the agreement is found to exist from the evidence it renders the mortgage void as matter of law. Sperry v. Baldwin, 46 Hun, 125.

Question for jury.

If there was no direct proof of such an agreement, but evidence from which it can be inferred, the case is one for the jury. Bainbridge v. Richmond, 17 Hun, 303.

Where the mortgage is lawful upon its face and there is evidence that the transaction was fair and honest but the circumstances tend to show an agreement that the mortgagor should continue making sales as usual, the question of fraud is for the jury. Gardner v. McEwen, 19 N. Y. 124.

Mortgage wholly void.

The mortgage is void not only as to the part which can be sold but in toto. Russell v. Winne, 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 368, 37 N. Y. 595, 97 Am. Dec. 755; Dodds v. Johnson, 3 Thomp. & C. 215; Spies v. Boyd, 1 E. D. Smith, 442; Smith v. Ely, 10 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 553.

The mortgage cannot be perfected by taking possession as against existing creditors. Dutcher v. Swartwood, 15 Hun, 31; Quinn & N. B. Brew. Co. v. Hart, 48 Hun, 336; Delaware v. Ensign, 21 Barb. 89; Smith v. Ely, supra.

Even taking possession and selling the goods and applying the proceeds in satisfaction of the mortgage will not give the mortgagee a right to retain them against attacking creditors. Mandeville v. Avery, 124 N. Y. 387, reversing 37 Hun, 73.

question of fraud open to investigation as matter of fact; and this would seem to be not only consonant with reason, but in accord with sound policy.

In New v. Sailors, 114 Ind. 407, the mortgagor was authorized by the terms of the mortgage to retain the possession of the property mortgaged, with authority to sell at retail, in the ordinary course of trade. There was no agreement that the proceeds should be applied to the liquidation of the mortgage debt, not anything to show an agreement or understanding that the mortgagor might use the proceeds for his own benefit, and it was held that it could not be judicially inferred that the mortgage was made with fraudulent intent. See also Fisher v. Syfers, 109 Ind.

514; McFadden v. Frits, 90 Ind. 590; Morris v. Stern, 80 Ind. 227. And it may be here remarked that these cases hold the contrary doctrine to that supposed to obtain in Indiana at the time the decision in the case of Robinson v. Elliott was rendered; and as the Federal courts follow the decisions of the highest courts of the several states in which the actions arise in determining the validity of chattel mortgages, if the same case were again before the Supreme Court of the United States it would in all probability be decided in accordance with the doctrine of the Indiana decisions to which we have referred. See Etheridge v. Sperry, supra. In Kansas, mortgages with stipulations like the one before us have, so far as we are aware, been

But it has been held that if the goods are delivered into the possession of the mortgagee with authority to sell immediately and appropriate the proceeds to the payment of the claim before the rights of other creditors attached, the mortgagee's rights will be protected. *Brown v. Mortgagor as agent for mortgagee.

A mortgage of a stock of merchandise which requires the mortgagor to take charge of and sell the goods and apply the proceeds to the debt by paying them over weekly to the mortgagee, and to follow the mortgagee's directions in the conduct of the business, is not fraudulent as matter of law. Ostrander v. Fay, 8 Abb. App. Dec. 431.

An agreement that the mortgagor shall keep possession and retail the goods for cash only, paying over the money to the mortgagee is not fraudulent as matter of law but presents a question of good faith for the jury. *Ford v. But all money or credits taken by the mortgagor when acting as the mortgagee's agent will be applied in reduction of the mortgage, whether they have been collected and paid over or not. Conkling v. Shelley, supra; Brackett v. Harvey, 91 N. Y. 220; Ellsworth v. Phelps, 80 Hun, 646; Sperry v. Baldwin, 46 Hun, 125; Smith v. Ely, 10 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 553.

Such mortgage is within the provisions of a statute making void all conveyances containing a trust universally sustained, if made in good faith. In Whitson v. Griffith, 30 Kan. 211, a case quite parallel with this, a chattel mortgage on a stock of goods containing a provision that the mortgagor might retain possession and sell the property in the course of trade, and account for the proceeds, and receive out of such proceeds the expenses of operating the business, together with compensation and the means of subsistence of the family of the mortgagor, during the continuance of the business, was upheld and sustained by the court; and the earlier decisions of that court are to the same effect. See Frankhouser v. Ellett, 22 Kan. 127, 31 Am. Rep. 178; Howard v. Rohlfing, 86 Kan. 357. In Michigan, as in Indiana, the question of fraudulent intent is declared by statute to be a question of fact for the determination of the jury. But the decisions of the supreme court of that state discuss the question quite as much upon principle as with reference to the statute, and we infer from the adjudged cases that the rulings of the court would have been the same had no statute been enacted upon the subject. In the leading case of Oliver v. Eaton, 7 Mich. 108, which was very similar in point of fact to the one now before us, the question of fraudulent chattel mortgages is very exhaustively discussed, and the law applicable to the subject very clearly and forcibly stated. In speaking of what instruments are void upon their face, and why they are so, the court said: "The law, Murray*, 2 Tenn. Ch. 743.

The deed is not void if it contains a provision that the mortgagor shall account for the proceeds. Saunders v. Turbeville, 2 Humph. 272.

Texas.

In this state there appear to have been two changes of doctrine, the first by the court's changing its opinion; the second by statute. It was at first held that power to sell in the usual course of trade without applying the proceeds upon the mortgage but requiring the substitution of other goods renders the mortgage void. Peiser v. Petcolas, 50 Tex. 644.

But the doctrine of that case was limited to some extent, and changed by a subsequent case which decided that power to the mortgagor to conduct his business as usual in the ordinary course of trade will not render the mortgage void as matter of law. Scott v. Alford, 53 Tex. 92.

The court in that case said that it is only where the fact or intention which avoids the deed is apparent on its face, or a necessary deduction therefrom, that the court can pronounce it void.

But under a statute subsequently passed the court held that if the mortgagor is insolvent he cannot retain possession with power of sale, either by an express provision in the mortgage or by a contemporaneous agreement, without rendering that mortgage void. Texas Nat. Bank v. Lovenberg, 63 Tex. 510.

In Wilber v. Kray, 73 Tex. 534, the statute is construed to cover a case in which it did not appear that the mortgagor was insolvent. And in Cook v. Halsell, 85 Tex. 6, a charge was approved that told the jury that if they found that the mortgagee intended to permit the mortgagor to continue in possession of the goods and sell the same in the ordinary course of trade the mortgage would be void.

Employing the mortgagor to sell the stock as agent for the mortgagee is not prohibited. Bettis v. Weir Plow Co. (Tex.) May 6, 1892.

If the mortgagor act as agent for the mortgagee the mortgage is not void. Crow v. Red River County Bank, 52 Tex. 362.

But no lien is valid which allows the debtor to carry on his business and account for the profits where an instrument contains illegal provisions, and such as are not reconcilable, on any possible hypothesis, with an honest or legal intent, declares it void upon its face, because no evidence could change its character. The cases in which this absolute and unchangeable presumption arises are not numerous. There are other cases in which, upon the face of the instrument, a statutory presumption arises which is only prima facie evidence of fraud; and there are still more cases in which the whole illegality charged must be made out by extrinsic evidence. In both of the classes last named the jury must determine all the facts." And in the same case the court makes this pertinent observation: "By leaving each case to the jury, each instrument is made to stand upon its own actual merits; which is much safer in questions of fraud whose manifestations are infinitely various than the adoption of fixed rules, which must fail to meet numerous cases." See also Gay v. Bidwell, supra, and People v. Bristol, 35 Mich. 28. In Iowa, the same doctrine has been maintained by an unbroken line of decisions for more than a quarter of a century. Torbert v. Hayden, 11 Iowa, 485; Hughes v. Cory, 20 Iowa, 399; Meyer v. Gage, 65 Iowa, 606; Meyer v. Evans, 66 Iowa, 179.

In the latter case, by the terms of the instrument the mortgagor reserved the right to sell the stock of goods at retail, in the ordinary course of trade; and there was a parol understanding that the mortgagor should keep up the stock, and that the expenses of carrying on the business should be paid out of the proceeds of the sales; and there was no provision in the mortgage, nor any parol agreement that any portion of the proceeds of the sales should be applied on the mortgage debt, but by the terms of the mortgage the mortgagee had the right at any time to take possession of the property and sell the same for the satisfaction of the debt. And it was held that the validity of the mortgage depended upon the good faith of the parties to the transaction. In Etheridge v. Sperry, supra, the Iowa decisions above cited are referred to, and the doctrine held by them approved. In that case the question to be determined was whether, as matter of law, a mortgage given by a merchant on his stock of goods to secure debts not yet due, which upon its face had no imperfections, contained no reservations for the benefit of the mortgagor, and was apparently only for the security of the mortgagee, and gave him full power to take possession on default in payment, or on any misconduct of the mortgagor, or whenever he pleased, was invalidated by the fact of a parol understanding, at the time of its execution, that the mortgagor might use the proceeds of his sales to support himself, and to keep up the stock by purchases, applying all of the surplus to the mortgage debt, or whether such an agreement was simply to be taken into consideration, together with the other circumstances, as bearing upon the question of good faith of the parties. The Supreme Court of Iowa held the mortgage valid, and an appeal was prosecuted to the Supreme Court of the United States. The plaintiff in error relied on the cases of Second Nat. Bank of Leavenworth v. Hunt, 78 U.S. 11 Wall. 391, 20 L. ed. 190; Robinson v. Elliott, 89 U.S. 23 Wall. 513, 22 L. ed. 758; and Means v. Dowd, 128 U.S. 273, 32 L. ed. 429,—all cited by the respondents in this case,—as sustaining his contention that the instruments were in-only to the person holding the lien. Duncan v. Taylor, 63 Tex. 646.

Lee*, 3 Rand. (Va.) 424.

Permitting the mortgagor to sell for the sole purpose of applying the proceeds on the mortgage debt does not avoid the mortgage. Langert v. Brown, 3 Wash. Terr. 108.

But a provision that the goods shall be disposed of for the sole benefit of the mortgagee either by applying the money on the mortgage or in keeping up the security by adding to the stock renders the mortgage void if it provides for an indefinite continuing lien. Byrd v. Forbes, 3 Wash. Terr. 319.

Money received under a power to sell for the valid in law. And in reference to those cases Mr. Justice Brewer, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "While there are some points of similarity between each of those cases and this, and while there are observations in the opinions filed in them pertinent and correct with reference to the special facts, which, if disconnected from those facts and applied here, might seem authoritative, yet there are clear and sufficient reasons why neither the decisions nor the opinions should control this case." After referring to the facts appearing in each of those cases, and fully explaining the intent and meaning of the case of Robinson v. Elliott, the court proceeded to say: "In neither of those cases is it affirmed that a chattel mortgage on a stock of goods is necessarily invalidated by the fact that either in the mortgage or by parol agreement between the parties the mortgagor is to retain possession with the right to sell the goods at retail. On the contrary, it is clearly recognized in them that such an instrument is valid, notwithstanding these stipulations, if it appears that the sales were to be for the benefit of the mortgagee. What was meant was that such an instrument should not be used to enable the mortgagor to continue in business as theretofore, with full control of the property and business, and appropriating to himself the benefits thereof, and all the while holding the instrument as a shield against the attacks of unsecured creditors." In determining the question before it the court accepted the law of Iowa upon the subject, as settled by the decisions of the supreme court of that state, as decisive, and accordingly held the mortgages in controversy valid. The concluding portion of the opinion is devoted to a discussion of the question upon general principles, without special reference to local decisions; and, as it is the latest expression of the views of the court upon the subject to which our attention has been directed, we feel fully warranted in quoting it at length. It is as follows: "Indeed, if this were an open question, we could not be blind to the fact that the tendency of this commercial age is towards increased facilities in the transfer of property, and to uphold such transfers so far as they are made in good faith; and it is at least worthy of thought whether the rulings made by the supreme court of Iowa do not tend to make chattel mortgages more valuable for commercial purposes, without endangering the rights of unsecured creditors. The law now generally requires a record of all such instruments, and that, like the recording of a real estate mortgage, gives notice to all parties interested of the fact and extent of incumbrances. Why should a transaction like this be condemned if made in good faith, and to secure an honest debt? The owner of a stock of goods may make an absolute sale of them to his creditor in payment of a debt. If an absolute, why not a conditional, sale, with such conditions as he and his creditor may agree upon? As between the parties, no court would question this right or refuse to enforce the conditions. The interests of the general public are not prejudiced by any such transaction between debtor and creditor. Indeed, they are rather promoted by any arrangement under which the mortgagor can continue in business, for in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the taking of possession by a creditor results in closing the business, and turning the debtor out of employment. The only parties who can claim to be injuriously affected are unsecured creditors. But they are notified by benefit of the mortgagee must be applied in satisfaction of the mortgage whether received by the mortgagee or not. Warren v. His Creditors, 3 Wash. 48.

West Virginia.

Reservation of the power to sell the stock in the usual course of trade renders the mortgage void as being inconsistent with the trust and adequate to the defeat thereof, and it is not made valid by the further provision to supply the place of any goods sold by additional purchases. Kuhn v. Mack, 4 W. Va. 194.

H. P. F.

the record of the exact relations between the mortgagor and mortgagee, and surely subsequent creditors have no right to complain if these deal with the mortgagor with full knowledge of such relations. Existing creditors may, of course, challenge the good faith of the transaction; but, if they cannot disturb an absolute sale when made in good faith, why should they be permitted to challenge a conditional one, if made in like good faith? The fact that fraudulent relations are possible is hardly a sufficient reason for denouncing transactions which are not fraudulent. So, if the question were open or a new one, unaffected by any settled law of the state, we incline to the opinion that the question is not one of law, so much as it is of fact and good faith; and that the decision of the supreme court of Iowa rests on solid principles."

While the decisions of the courts of the various states on this subject are irreconcilably in conflict, it seems to us that the rule adopted in the foregoing decisions not only rests on sound principles but is dictated by wisdom and justice. It is claimed, however, by the learned counsel for respondents, that this mortgage is fraudulent in fact, if not in law. But we have carefully examined all the testimony in the case, and we are not convinced by the evidence that appellant was actuated in accepting this mortgage by any other motive than a desire to secure indemnity from liability upon the debts therein set forth. From the evidence before us there can be no doubt of appellant's liability upon the notes and accounts mentioned in the mortgage, or that Kelleher, in consideration of appellant's interest in the firm of Kelleher & Co., at the time of its dissolution, promised and agreed to pay the notes, and to indemnify appellant against all liability thereon, and all loss or damage resulting therefrom; and the fact that Kelleher was indebted to others at the time the mortgage was given did not render the transaction fraudulent. There is nothing in our statutes preventing a debtor, even in failing circumstances, from preferring one creditor over another in paying his debts. Nor is it illegal for one creditor to take security from his debtor, though others may thereby be prevented from collecting their claims, if the transaction is entered into solely for the purpose of security, and not for the purpose of aiding the debtor to defraud his other creditors. While conceding that the assignee of Kelleher was properly permitted by the court to intervene in the foreclosure proceeding, it is contended by appellant that the court erred in permitting certain attaching creditors to so intervene, and that the court further erred in refusing to strike out the complaints of the intervenors, after the assignment, for the alleged reason that the attachments were dissolved by force of the Assignment Law of March 6, 1890, and that a mere creditor at large had no legal right to intervene for the purpose of contesting the validity of the mortgage. But if we concede that the attachments were discharged by Kelleher's assignment for the benefit of his creditors, after levy but before judgment, and that, generally, a creditor at large cannot intervene in such an action, we are nevertheless of the opinion that these creditors were authorized by section 1997 (Code of 1881) to contest the right of appellant to foreclose the mortgage, which was all they undertook to do. They asked no affirmative relief whatever, but simply that the instrument be declared invalid as to them.

From all the facts in this case, we are satisfied that this mortgage was valid between the parties when made, and we are not satisfied that it was rendered invalid by any subsequent conduct of the parties. We are therefore constrained to conclude that the court erred in holding the instrument void as to respondents. But we think the mortgage should not be declared a lien for the whole amount of the judgment rendered in favor of appellant. According to its own showing, he paid the three notes mentioned in the mortgage, amounting to $9,401.80, by giving his bond for $900 of that sum, and paying or securing the remainder, which is $8,501.40, at the rate of 70 cents on the dollar, including the expenses. The whole sum actually paid on the notes by him by reason of the default of Kelleher amounts to $6,850.98, which, added to the accounts for which he became responsible, makes the aggregate sum of $7,615.98. From this should be deducted the sum of $400, received by him from Kelleher out of the proceeds of the mortgaged goods. This leaves the sum of $7,215.98 as the amount, exclusive of the attorneys' fees provided for in the mortgage, and costs, for which the mortgage should be declared a lien. We have included no interest, for the reason that we have discovered no evidence showing that any was paid.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment for plaintiff, and against defendant W. T. Kelleher, for said sum of $7,215.98, together with 10 per cent of said sum as attorneys' fees, and for costs, and a decree foreclosing said mortgage lien, and applying the proceeds of said mortgaged property to the satisfaction of said judgment and decree.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

W. S. LAWSON, Pff. in Err.,

v.

E. B. CONAWAY.

(..... W. Va.)

*1. In an action against a physician for malpractice, a witness testified that he was "well acquainted with the physical ability of the plaintiff to perform manual labor, both before and since the breaking of his arm; that the said plaintiff, before the injury, was a strong able-bodied man; that since he has been hurt the plaintiff has been unable to perform no more than one half a man's work; that witness had worked with plaintiff both before the arm was broken and since; that witness and plaintiff were both farmers, and lived near together." This testimony was competent, and ought not to have been excluded.

2. The general rule is that, where a party is competent to prove the motives and intentions which have governed his own conduct, he may state in general terms that he did or refrained from doing a particular thing, material to the issue, on account of information received from a third person; but he cannot go into details, or give conversations with third persons, held not in the hearing of the opposite party.

3. When a physician is employed to attend upon a sick person, his employment continues while the sickness lasts, unless put to an end by the assent of the parties, or revoked by the express dismissal of the physician. The physician is bound to bestow such reasonable ordinary care, skill and diligence as physicians in the same neighborhood, in the same general line of practice, ordinarily have and exercise in like cases. Time and locality are to be taken in the account, and the physician is bound to exercise the average degree of skill possessed by the profession in such locality. In the absence of special agreement, his engagement is to attend the case as long as it requires attention, unless he gives notice of his intention to discontinue his visits, or is dismissed, as aforesaid; and he is bound to exercise reasonable and ordinary care and skill in determining when his attendance should cease. But his engagement is not to cure the patient; that is, he does not insure that his treatment will be successful. The mere failure to effect a cure does not even raise a presumption of a want of proper care, skill, and diligence. It is the duty of the patient to co-operate with the physician, and to conform to his prescriptions and directions, and if he neglect to do so he cannot hold the physician responsible for his own neglect. On the other hand, he has a right to rely upon the instructions and directions of his physician, and incurs no liability by so doing.

4. If a physician sue for his services, and there is no appearance by the patient, defendant in that suit, recovery by the former does not estop the latter from bringing a cross-action for malpractice; but if he appear, unless the record show that it was not to defend, but solely to disclaim the waiver to his own right, he is estopped by the recovery.

*Headnotes by LUCAS, P.

5. A declaration charged that the defendant after having entered upon the treatment and cure of the plaintiff, "carelessly, negligently, and unskillfully conducted himself in that behalf," etc., and that by means of the defendant's "careless, negligent, improper, and unskillful attention," etc., the injury resulted. Under these averments, the plaintiff might recover for abandonment of his treatment by the physician.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Tyler County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages against defendant, a physician, for alleged malpractice. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. G. D. Smith and Stuart & Farr, for appellant:

It was the duty of defendant to use reasonable care and diligence in treating plaintiff's arm, and the plaintiff had a right to presume the defendant had discharged his duty in treating his arm, and had the right to rely on the treatment, instructions, and directions given him by the defendant.

See Riley v. West Virginia, O. & P. R. Co. 27 W. Va. 150; Patten v. Wiggin, 51 Me. 594, 81 Am. Dec. 598; Leighton v. Sargent, 37 N. H. 460, 59 Am. Dec. 888.

Plaintiff if entitled to recover could recover for "costs and expense paid out in endeavoring to be cured."

If plaintiff had a right to recover, he had a right to recover according to the permanent reduction of his power to earn money.

See Riley v. West Virginia, O. & P. R. Co. supra; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 606; Ransom v. New York & E. R. Co. 15 N. Y. 415; People v. Hays, 20 How. Pr. 84; Starkie, Ev. p. 526.

There is not one word of evidence even tending to prove that Lawson ever accepted Smith as his physician instead of Conaway. Conaway had notice that Lawson relied on him, by the efforts of Lawson to get him to come back. This was sufficient. If he had not had notice, it might be considered that he waived Conaway's services for Smith's. Notice to either one was sufficient. By analogy the same rule would apply to a physician as to an attorney. An attorney cannot delegate his authority.

See Crotty v. Eagle, 35 W. Va. 143; Story, Ag. § 18.

Conaway had no right to testify to a conversation between him and Smith in the absence of Lawson.

1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 98, 99.

If Conaway had the right to employ Smith, and if he should be credited with Smith's visits, then Smith was his agent, and he would be responsible for Smith's acts, conduct, declarations, and treatment of the arm.

Smith's admissions, declarations, directions, statements, and acts bound Conaway.

Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Christie, 5 W. Va. 325; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 118.

By instructing that treatment by the physicians to the 11th of the month, so it was done with ordinary skill, etc., was all that was required of them, the court virtually instructed the jury that Conaway was by Lawson discharged on the 11th.

This was an instruction as to weight of evidence.

2 Whart. & S. Medical Jurisprudence, § 1092; McDowell v. Crawford, 11 Gratt. 405; State v. Thompson, 21 W. Va. 741.

This instruction said to jury if they found that "the plaintiff accepted the services of Smith instead of Conaway, and made no objection, etc." There is no evidence to warrant any such instruction. All the evidence on the subject is in substance that Conaway sent Smith, and Lawson was all of the time sending for Conaway and not recognizing Smith as the physician.

Physicians and surgeons are bound to exercise such reasonable care and skill as is usually possessed and exercised by physicians and surgeons in good standing in the vicinity or locality of his practice, having due regard to the advanced state of medical or surgical science at the time, where he holds himself out and accepts employment as such physician or surgeon.

Nelson v. Harrington, 1 L. R. A. 719, 72 Wis. 591, 7 Am. St. Rep. 900.

There might be mere quacks as a profession in a community, and if the instructions given are right then it would be by these that a standard would be set, but the law does not recognize such standard. The comparison is between physicians in good standing.

A physician cannot turn a case of this character over to another who never treated a case of like kind, and escape responsibility for his acts, just because the patient did not drive the one sent off and refuse his advice or instructions.

If Lawson did suggest that it was not necessary for physicians to come back in the absence of warning by them to him of the danger, yet Conaway would be responsible. He could not escape responsibility unless patient acted contrary to his advice.

Moor v. Vazie, 31 Me. 875; Hibbard v. Thompson, 109 Mass. 286.

Physicians are presumed to know the danger of ceasing their visits in case of this kind on eleventh day, and it was their duty to have so warned the patient. Then if he, contrary to the advice, discharged them, he no doubt would be responsible for consequences, but otherwise not.

Lucas, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action on the case for damages against a physician for malpractice. The plaintiff sued in the circuit court of Tyler county for $10,000 damages, but the jury found for the defendant, and the court gave judgment. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, and took sundry exceptions, and the case comes before this court on the bills of exception reserved in the court below, and made a part of the record. We will take these up in their order, and dispose of such of them as are material to the issue involved.

The first exception is to the ruling of the circuit court in excluding the following testimony of one C. W. Smith, called for the plaintiff: "Witness testified that he was well acquainted with the physical ability of the plaintiff to perform manual labor both before and since the breaking of his arm; that the said plaintiff, before the injury, was a strong, able-bodied man; that since he has been hurt the plaintiff has been unable to perform no more than one half a man's work; that witness had worked with plaintiff both before the arm was broken and since; that witness and plaintiff are both farmers, and live near together." We think that this was competent testimony, and was improperly excluded. It is the expression of neither an opinion nor a conclusion, but a fact going to show the inability to work on the part of the plaintiff, as compared with his former condition, and was relevant and proper. In the form given, it was certainly not very valuable testimony, but that was for the jury. Its relevancy and competency were unquestionable. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 440.

The second bill of exceptions was taken because the court admitted the following testimony given by the defendant, E. B. Conaway, in his own behalf: "State whom you employed to treat plaintiff's arm after the 5th day of October, 1888. Answer. On the 6th day of October, 1888, A. Lawson came for me to go to see plaintiff, and I sent Dr. Smith to attend him. On October 11, 1888, I sent Smith again. Question by same: State what, if anything, Dr. Smith told you plaintiff said to him (Smith) about coming back to see plaintiff on the visit of October 11, 1888. A. In the morning Dr. Smith told me that Lawson had discharged us,—this was at my office, in Centreville, the morning after the visit,—and that he wanted me to take a haystack on the bill." The general rule is, where a party is competent to prove the motives and intentions which have governed his own conduct, he may state in general terms that he did or refrained from doing a thing on account of information received from third persons; but he cannot go into details as to conversations with third persons, held not in the hearing of the opposite party. In this case the witness could have stated that he refrained from paying another visit to the plaintiff, who was his patient, on account of information received from Dr. Smith, and this would have been competent. But the conversation itself, or the words of Dr. Smith, were incompetent. No injury can be perceived, however, inasmuch as Dr. Smith was himself called, and proved the conversation. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 124.

The third bill of exceptions embraces instruction No. 1 given for the defendant over the objection of the plaintiff. That instruction is as follows: "Instruction No. 1: Gentlemen of the jury, it is claimed by the plaintiff that the defendant was employed to treat professionally, as a surgeon, his injured arm. By the defendant accepting the employment he bound himself to use in his treatment of the arm a reasonable, ordinary degree of care and skill of the profession in his community, but he did not undertake to use the highest degree of care and skill, nor, in the absence of a special agreement, did he undertake to perform a cure. Nor can you infer that the defendant was negligent simply because a cure was not effected. The burden of proving his case by a preponderance of the evidence rests upon the plaintiff." This instruction is substantially correct. Kuhn v. Brownfield, 84 W. Va. 256, 11 L. R. A. 700. The objection urged against it by counsel is that it uses the word "profession," instead of the more accurately descriptive term, "physicians in good standing." Perhaps the latter words would have been better, but I think we may say that the word "profession," used in this connection, is equivalent to "physicians and surgeons," and the qualifying words, "in good standing," are not generally inserted by the text-writers. For example, Mr. McClelland defines the contract as follows: "The implied contract of a surgeon is not to cure, but to possess and employ in the treatment of a case such reasonable skill and diligence as are ordinarily exercised in his profession by thoroughly educated surgeons; and, in judging of the degree of skill required, regard is to be had to the advanced state of the profession at the time." The author further adds the following qualifications: "Time and place must be taken into consideration. Reasonably, as much cannot be expected of physicians in remote localities, where he is cut off from opportunities of improvement, as from physicians living in communities where opportunity is afforded of seeing disease and accidents under more varied forms; nor from this latter class should as high a degree of attainments be exacted as from physicians connected with large hospitals, or who reside in large cities. If it were otherwise, we should find but few physicians except in populous communities. The very favorable rule has been laid down in the law that the least amount of skill, therefore, with which a fair proportion of the practitioners of a given locality are endowed, is taken as the criterion by which to judge the physician's ability or skill." McClelland, Civil Malpractice, 18, 19. In the case of Smother's v. Hanks, 34 Iowa, 286, 11 Am. Rep. 141, the rule is laid down that the measure of skill and diligence "is that ordinarily exercised in the profession by the members thereof as a body; that is, the average of the reasonable skill and diligence ordinarily exercised by the profession as a whole." The instruction is therefore, I think, couched in language substantially correct, and not calculated to mislead the jury.

Instruction No. 2 was excepted to by the plaintiff for the same reasons he urged against No. 1, and his objections have already been answered. The same may be said of instruction No. 3, which relates to the discharge of his physicians by the plaintiff. That instruction is as follows: "Instruction No. 3: If the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiff, through Dr. W. A. Smith, on the 11th day of October, 1888, discharged the defendant from the management and treatment of his arm, and if you further find from the evidence that prior to the 11th day of October, 1888, the defendant and Dr. W. A. Smith exercised the ordinary care, skill, and diligence of their profession in their community in the management and treatment of the arm, then you must return a verdict for the defendant." All of the authorities admit that the patient may at any time discharge or dismiss his physician, and from that moment such physician is relieved from responsibility. It would be very strange if the law were otherwise.

The fourth instruction is as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, W. S. Lawson, by his own negligence, directly contributed in any degree to the injury sued for, they will find for the defendant." As an abstract proposition of law, this instruction might perhaps be correct; but, under the evidence set out in this record, I am inclined to think it ought not to have been given, except with modifications. Supposing the theory of the defense to have been correct,—that the patient had dismissed his physician on the 11th of October, and that subsequent to that date the patient was negligent. Would it be seriously contended that this neglect on his part would interfere with his right of recovery, provided he proved that the conduct and treatment of his physician up to the 11th October had been utterly unskillful, and totally careless and negligent? I think not, and therefore the instruction, in the form propounded, was calculated to mislead, and should not have been given. So, also, if the physician, at a certain period, wrongfully abandoned his patient, and left him to his fate, any subsequent neglect on the part of the patient would not prevent his recovery. In other words, the contributory negligence must be contemporaneous with the main fact charged as negligence, in order to prevent a recovery; and the instruction should have been so framed as to adapt it to the evidence, and to leave no room for misapprehension on the part of the jury.

The fifth instruction for the defendant is as follows: "Instruction No. 5: The jury are instructed that there is no issue in this case, for them to consider, as to whether Dr. Conaway or his agent abandoned the treatment of plaintiff's arm. The only issue is whether the defendant, Dr. Conaway, or his agent, Dr. Smith, failed to exercise the ordinary care and skill of their profession in their community while they treated the arm." This instruction is plainly erroneous, and should not have been given. The charge in the amended declaration is that the defendant, after having been employed as physician and surgeon, entered upon the treatment and cure of the plaintiff, and so "carelessly, negligently, improperly, and unskillfully conducted himself in that behalf, and then and there so carelessly, negligently, improperly, and unskillfully applied his cure and treatment upon the said grievous hurts, broken bones, injuries, cuts, bruises, and fractures of the arm," etc., as to produce damage. The declaration further charges that injury resulted to the plaintiff "by means of the careless, negligent, improper, and unskillful attention" on the part of the defendant. This, then, is the complaint and averment of the declaration; and it did charge and give full notice to the defendant that he was required to defend himself against a want of attention, which includes abandonment, almost as plainly as if that term had been used. Counsel have urged that abandonment was not charged in the declaration, and in support of their proposition cite us to the case of Hawker v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 15 W. Va. 628, 36 Am. Rep. 825, and Bemus v. Howard, 8 Watts, 255. In the first of these cases the declaration charged that the engineer on a railway train saw the plaintiff's stock, and, after seeing it, so negligently conducted his train, etc., as to injure or kill it. Under this declaration, this court refused to permit the plaintiff to prove that if the engineer did not see the stock it was his own fault and neglect, and that he ought to have seen it. Now, admitting this to be a correct decision, (and I myself have always thought it too technical,) that case has no application to the facts of the one we are now considering. In the latter the averments of the declaration do, by necessary implication cover the charge of abandonment, as the equivalent of neglectful attention or want of attention. The language of the declaration carefully distinguishes between the unskillful treatment of the fracture and the negligent personal or professional conduct of the physician, and distinctly charges both species of negligence and carelessness. The Pennsylvania case reported in 3 Watts, 255, to which we have been cited, is inapplicable, for the reason that, if it be correctly stated by the court, the declaration did not charge a want of attention on the part of the physician. At any rate, all we can say is that, if there is anything in that case contrary to the views herein expressed upon the pleadings and evidence in the present case, the former is manifestly wrong.

The ninth bill of exceptions embraces instruction No. 1, asked for by the plaintiff, which the court refused, and gave an instruction of its own in lieu thereof, against the objection of the plaintiff's counsel. The instruction asked for, and the modification, are as follows: "Instruction No. 1: The court instructs the jury that it was the duty of the defendant, after entering upon the treatment of the plaintiff's fractured arm, to use all reasonable care and diligence in treating the injuries thereof, and that the plaintiff had a right to presume that the defendant had discharged his duty as such physician, and also had the right to rely upon the treatment, instructions, and directions given to him by the defendant." To the giving of said instruction the defendant, by counsel, objected, which objection was sustained by the court; and the court, in lieu thereof, gave the following instruction, in the words and figures following, to wit: "No. 1: If the jury believe that defendant undertook the treatment of plaintiff's fractured arm as surgeon, it was his duty to bring to its treatment reasonable and ordinary care, skill, and diligence; and if the jury believe that the defendant failed to discharge such duty with ordinary skill and care, and that the injury complained of resulted from such failure, without fault or negligence on the part of the plaintiff, which by ordinary care and prudence on his part could have been avoided, then defendant is liable." It will be observed that the modified instruction given by the court has no relation to that asked for by the plaintiff, and totally omits all reference to the point of law upon which the plaintiff was insisting. The instruction, in form, is not hypothetical, but the hypothesis, if framed, could only have included a fact which seems to have been taken for granted, and may be considered as a concession upon all hands, viz., that the defendant did actually enter upon the treatment of the plaintiff's fractured arm. If the instruction had said that, if the jury found the defendant entered upon the treatment of the plaintiff's fractured arm, then the defendant was bound to use all reasonable care, etc., and the plaintiff had a right to rely on instructions and directions, if any, given by the defendant, the proposition would have been correct, and the instruction unobjectionable in form.

I think there was no error in refusing the plaintiff's third instruction, because it fails to distinguish between the expenses and damages resulting from the original fracture and those consequent upon malpractice. Field, Damages, § 600; Leighton v. Sargent, 81 N. H. 119, 64 Am. Dec. 323.

Before closing, it is perhaps necessary to define with more accuracy than we have yet done the implied contract between physician and patient, the violation of which on the part of the former constitutes malpractice. When a physician is employed to attend upon a sick person, his employment continues while the sickness lasts, and the relation of physician and patient continues, unless it is put an end to by the assent of the parties, or is revoked by the express dismissal of the physician. The physician is bound to bestow such reasonable, ordinary care, skill, and diligence as physicians and surgeons in the same neighborhood, in the same general line of practice, ordinarily have and exercise in like cases. Time and locality are to be taken into the account, and the physician is bound to exercise the average degree of skill possessed by the profession in such localities. In the absence of special agreement, his engagement is to attend the case as long as it requires attention, unless he gives notice of his intention to discontinue his visits, or is dismissed by the patient, and he is bound to exercise reasonable and ordinary care and skill in determining when his attendance should cease. But his engagement is not to cure the patient, nor does he insure that his treatment will be successful. The mere failure to effect a cure does not even raise a presumption of a want of proper care, skill, and diligence. It is the duty of the patient to co-operate with the physician, and to conform to his prescriptions and directions, and if he neglect to do so he cannot hold the physician responsible for the consequence of his own neglect. On the other hand, he has a right to rely upon the instructions and directions of his physician, and incurs no liability by doing so. McClelland, Civil Malpractice, 18, 19, 109; 14 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 80, 82; 15 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 439.

A feature in the case, yet to be noticed, is the fact that the plaintiff introduced a justice of the peace, who proved, substantially, that for his services in this behalf the defendant recovered a judgment against the plaintiff. The docket or record, if it may be called such, of said justice, was before the jury, but seems to have been omitted intentionally from the record here. It is claimed in this court by counsel for defendant in error that this judgment against the plaintiff below estopped him from prosecuting his cross-action for malpractice. As the case will have to go back to the circuit court, we deem it our duty to decide this interesting question. As a general rule, estoppel by a former judgment has to be introduced by a special plea of res judicata. No such plea was offered by the defendant in this case: but, on the other hand, the plaintiff himself introduced this record of the magistrate's court; and, if we had it before us, we should be able to decide whether the plaintiff had proved himself out of court,—a privilege which he always has and, through his counsel, not unfrequently, though unwittingly, exercises. The question involved is this: In a suit for malpractice, is the plaintiff estopped by a judgment in an action against him, brought by the physician, to recover compensation for services rendered in the same case. Upon this subject the decisions are much divided. In New York, in the leading case of Gates v. Preston, 41 N. Y. 118, and in Bellinger v. Craigie, 31 Barb. 584, the affirmative was held, and such has been the uniform current of decision in that state. Blair v. Bartlett, 75 N. Y. 150, 31 Am. Rep. 455; Dunham v. Bower, 77 N. Y. 76, 33 Am. Rep. 570. New Jersey, Arkansas, and perhaps other states, have followed the New York decision. Ely v. Wilbur, 49 N. J. L. 685, 60 Am. Rep. 668; Dale v. Donaldson Lumber Co. 48 Ark. 188. Upon the other hand, in Indiana, Ohio, Wisconsin, and perhaps other states, a contrary doctrine has been held. Goble v. Dillon, 86 Ind. 327, 44 Am. Rep. 808; Sykes v. Bonner, 1 Cin. R. 464; Ressequie v. Byers, 52 Wis. 650, 38 Am. Rep. 775.

The dividing line between the New York decisions and those of the states which have taken a contrary view is upon the fact whether the judgment obtained by the physician was a judgment by default; for all the cases concede that if the patient has appeared, and defended the action on the ground of neglect or want of skill, the judgment against him is an estoppel, and he cannot bring his cross-action for malpractice. But when the judgment is by default, and no defense whatever has been made, the majority of the cases would seem to hold that the question of malpractice or diligence and skill was not involved, and that the patient has not impaired his right of action by neglecting or refusing to appear to the suit against him. Finding this contrariety of opinion in the courts of last resort, we naturally recur to the text-writers to ascertain how the scale ought to be adjusted, and what held to be the better opinion. But, instead of resolving our doubts, we find the conflict renewed with an energy almost acrimonious in its vigor. We find that Mr. Bigelow (1886) dissents from the New York decisions upon the ground that the right to sue for malpractice was a cross-demand, and the defendant might elect to litigate it in the first suit, but if he declined to do so it was reserved to him for future action. On page 175 of Bigelow on Estoppel, he thus comments upon the New York decisions: "Such an argument, however, like the view taken by the courts of New York, that the former judgment has shown that the services or property, according to the case, were of value, while the second suit declares or may declare the same to be worthless, is only plausible; for a judgment on default is not equivalent, in principle or on authority, to a judgment on an issue fought out. Judgment on default is good for the primary purpose of a judgment for plaintiff. It gives him the right to have the sum adjudged collected. But it has not the full effect of a res judicata, because in reality it has been ex parte. There is the best authority for saying that judgment by default does not conclude defenses in confession and avoidance in a different action. And if the view here presented, that the cross-demand is an independent cause of action, is correct, it cannot matter that the former judgment was rendered upon an issue contested, if that issue did not embrace the cross-demand." Upon the other hand, Mr. Herman (1886) takes the opposite view, and denies that the action for malpractice can be, in strict legal sense, a counterclaim, and hence it cannot, he argues, in the absence of statutory regulations, be the subject of an independent action. 1 Herman, Estoppel, § 235. In section 236 he states his argument, in earnest and vigorous language, as follows: "Courts maintaining a doctrine contrary to that of Gates v. Preston do so, except where otherwise compelled by statute, by violating every principle on which the doctrine of res judicata is founded. Without citing again the long and unbroken line of cases which will be found in another portion of this work, we may state the following as the substance of the decisions: First, the maxim, interest reipublice ut sit finis litium, has never yet been questioned; and, second, whenever a matter is adjudicated, such judgment decides every matter which pertains to that cause of action, or the defense set up, or which is involved in the measure of relief to which the cause of action or defense entitles the party, even though such matter may not be set forth in the pleadings so as to admit proof and call for an actual decision upon it. This principle prevails throughout the civilized world, with but few exceptions, and includes, not only what actually was determined, but also extends to every other matter which, under the issues, the parties might have litigated in the case,—to everything within the knowledge of the parties which might have been set up as a ground of relief or defense. This principle is but the repeated reiteration of the maxim above cited, which is so deeply fixed in the law of fundamentals. This maintenance of this principle is one of the necessities in all civilized communities, and it has been handed down, from generation to generation, without ever being questioned, until the present time; and we doubt whether there ever can be a so well-established and universally sustained principle of law. A court that cannot doubt, distinguish, or make an exception to a well-settled rule of law is among the impossibilities of this age. The case of Gates v. Preston follows the universal rule above cited. In the early case of Marriot v. Hampton, 7 T. R. 269, it was held that where, in an action, a party had a complete defense, as payment, and failed to maintain it, he was concluded by that judgment, and, although he had the written receipt of the plaintiff, yet he was compelled to pay the same money twice. This principle has never been questioned. So a party having a defense like that of usury, limitation, coverture, a statutory right of exemption, or any defense which will defeat a plaintiff's claim, and fails to set up such defense, cannot thereafter relitigate matter which would have defeated the plaintiff's action in another cause between the same parties by simply reversing their positions as parties." A later writer, (1891.) as umpire in the dispute between Herman and Bigelow, decides against the New York view, and supports the western cases, as having the better reason, (2 Black, Judgm. § 769:) "Thus, where a physician sued a party for services rendered by him in treating a broken limb, and the defendant appeared and pleaded general denial, it was held that the fact of performance of plaintiff's contract was impliedly averred and denied by the pleadings, and that a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the services as claimed necessarily included the fact of due performance by the plaintiff, and that the question of malpractice was involved in the issue, and concluded by the judgment, so that the patient could not thereafter sue upon that cause of action. And a similar rule has been applied in Massachusetts, though the services were of an entirely different nature, where defense was taken to the first action on the ground of negligence, but without seeking to recoup the damages. But these cases have been vigorously criticised and resolutely denied in decisions rendered in other states, which seem to us to be much better supported by legal reason and the best considerations of convenience and justice. This may be illustrated by the judgment in the case of Resseguie v. Byers, 53 Wis. 650, 38 Am. Rep. 775, where, after an action was commenced for malpractice in attendance upon a certain case, defendant instituted a suit before a justice of the peace for the value of his services for such attendance, in which suit the defendant interposed a general denial as to the value of the services, but afterwards failed to appear at the trial, and judgment was given for the physician for the amount he claimed. It was held that such judgment was no defense to the action for malpractice, and a supplementary answer setting it up as a plea in bar was demurrable."

Amidst this great contrariety of opinion, we must draw our conclusions in conformity with the spirit of our own decisions, and according to the dictates of a sound adherence to general principles. No court has insisted more strenuously upon the doctrine of res judicata than has our own. Western M. & M. Co. v. Virginia O. C. Co. 10 W. Va. 250; Henry v. Davis, 18 W. Va. 280; Corrothers v. Sargent, 20 W. Va. 351; Mason v. Harper's Ferry Bridge Co. Id. 228; Wandling v. Straw, 25 W. Va. 692; McCoy v. McCoy, 20 W. Va. 794; Seabright v. Seabright, 33 W. Va. 152; Parsons v. Riley, 33 W. Va. 464, Sayre v. Harpold, 33 W. Va. 558. Nevertheless, I think a safe conclusion to be reached is that if the physician sue for compensation for his services, and there is no appearance by the patient, a recovery by the former does not estop the latter from bringing his cross action for malpractice; but if he appear, (unless the record show that it was not to defend, but solely to disclaim the waiver of his own right,) he is estopped by the recovery. The right to sue for malpractice is both a defense and a subject for cross-action, and if used for either purpose—that is, either by way of defense or recoupment—it destroys the vitality of the claim, if sought to be used in an independent action; and, if the patient has appeared in the suit by the physician, he was bound to make all the defenses he had, and hence he is estopped by the fact that he had a defense of malpractice, of which he failed to avail himself. But, if he has not appeared, then the question of malpractice has never been adjudicated, and he is at liberty to assert his claim by an independent action.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed, the cause remanded, the verdict set aside, and a verdict de novo awarded, and in the new trial the circuit court will conduct its proceeding in accordance with the principles herein announced.

Holt, J., dissenting:

We still retain the common-law system of pleading, though greatly modified, and the well-known common-law classification of personal actions into actions ex contractu and ex delicto is still kept up. In fact, the classification must be a somewhat natural one, for we see it carefully observed under the modern systems of code pleading. Even the substantive law itself, treating of correlative civil rights and duties, is now classified and discussed, for the most part, under the general heads of contracts and torts. It is fair, therefore, to conclude that the distinctions which have led to this classification, in both the substantive and objective law, are founded somewhat in the nature of the things themselves, or have been found to be useful and convenient in practice, and so should not be lightly disregarded and confounded; for system depends upon science, and science upon classification. This was a common-law action of trespass on the case, in tort, brought by the plaintiff, Lawson, against defendant, Conaway, to recover damages for malpractice in treating a fracture of plaintiff's arm, with damages laid at $10,000. The case was tried on a plea of not guilty, and no other, and the jury found in favor of defendant. During the trial it came out in evidence on plaintiff's side that Dr. Conaway had sued the plaintiff before a justice for his services in treating the plaintiff's arm, and had recovered a judgment for $18, to show, I suppose, that defendant had collected his fee. Counsel for the defendant, Dr. Conaway, contend that when the doctor sued for his bill there was involved in that the very question which was passed upon by the jury in the case at law, citing as authority for such contention Ely v. Wilbur, 49 N. J. L. 685, 60 Am. Rep. 668; Dale v. Donaldson Lumber Co. 48 Ark. 183; Bellinger v. Craigue, 31 Barb. 534; Blair v. Bartlett, 75 N. Y. 150, 31 Am. Rep. 455. I think it could be shown that the weight of authority is the other way, under code practice, as well as at common law. I understand our law upon the subject, apart from chapter 50 of the Code, to be as follows: The malpractice described in plaintiff's declaration is a common-law tort, and properly made the subject of an action in case. But because it is a tort which results from a breach of duty, and relating to and directly growing out of the services of Dr. Conaway as a surgeon, for which service Lawson had agreed expressly or impliedly to pay, it may, at Lawson's option, be filed as a recoupment against the surgeon's suit for his services. But Lawson is not compelled to put it in, by way of recoupment or counterclaim, on pain of being thereafter barred by the judgment in the action for such services. Our practice is to leave this to the choice of Lawson, so that he may act upon such considerations of fitness, convenience, and the like, as the circumstances of his case may dictate, in regard to the time and the mode of enforcing his claim for damages; and no better illustration can be given of the fitness of leaving to him such choice than the case in hand, for in this state the jurisdiction of a justice, though large, is special, and limited to $300, while the plaintiff's account for $18 could not be sued for in the courts of general jurisdiction, because too small. The patient's claim could not be recovered before a justice, though fully proved, because too large. See sections 52, 56, chap. 50, Code, where it is perhaps included under the term "Counterclaim," but the option is given to sue for the whole amount in any court having jurisdiction. If the plaintiff, Lawson, had appeared before the justice, and filed his claim of $10,000 for malpractice as a counterclaim in defense or reduction of the doctor's claim of $18 for his services, and $18 had been thus used, it is by no means clear that he could afterwards have sued for the excess. But this involves questions that I do not care now to discuss; for if Lawson's demand for $10,000 is a counterclaim, within the meaning of the term as used in section 55 of chapter 50, then the option is given him to sue for the whole amount in any court having jurisdiction, and so he would not be precluded from maintaining this action ex delicto, although, when sued by Dr. Conaway, before the justice, for $18, he appeared and otherwise answered the action, yet did not produce his claim for the $10,000, with his evidence in support thereof. For these reasons, I am constrained to dissent from the doctrine laid down in point No. 4 of the headnotes, especially as I do not regard such question of res judicata as fairly arising on this record.

nunc pro tunc. Held, such entry nunc pro tunc was unauthorized and illegal, and was properly treated by the circuit court as a nullity.

(Brannon J., dissentia.)

(December 17, 1892.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Doddridge County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of a justice of the peace refusing to revive in favor of plaintiff as representative of the estate of A. J. Lowther, deceased, a judgment alleged to have been recovered by Lowther against defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. John Bassel and S. D. Turner for plaintiff in error.

Mr. Jackson V. Blair, for defendant in error:

Had the two justices jurisdiction of the case on the 20th of March, 1888, and the power to enter the so-called nunc pro tunc judgment? If not, then their act was coram non judge, and an absolute nullity.

Sibley v. Howard, 3 Denio, 72, 45 Am. Dec. 448.

If the motion to revive is a substitute for the writ of scire facias as counsel for plaintiff concede, and the writ is a new action on the judgment, the fact that such "motion was opposed" by the defendant was equal, before the justice, to the formal plea of nul tiel record, which not only denied the existence of any such record as that claimed by plaintiff, but put in issue the validity of the nunc pro tunc judgment.

1 Rob. Old. Pr. (Va.) 585; Eppes v. Smith, 4 Munf. 466; Burk v. Treggs, 3 Wash. (Va.) 216.

Had this been an action on a judgment which by appeal, limitation, or otherwise had become vacated, or that was void, could not such defense have been successfully interposed? If so, then why should a motion or scire facias to revive a judgment that never had any legal existence be sustained?

Evans v. Taylor, 28 W. Va. 184; Kanawha & O. R. Co. v. Ryan, 81 W. Va. 364; King v. Bates, 80 Mich. 367, 20 Am. St. Rep. 518.

Our statute provides that judgment shall be entered within twenty-four hours after the trial.

W. Va. Code, chap. 50, § 114.

The rendition of the judgment would necessarily have to be first.

Justices of the peace being required to render judgment within a given time cannot do so afterwards. If required to render judgment immediately after receiving the verdict, he has no authority to render it the next day thereafter.

Sibley v. Howard, 3 Denio, 72, 45 Am. Dec. 448.

Taxing costs is a judicial act, and therefore a justice of the peace who does not render judgment for costs within the time allowed him to render judgment, cannot do so afterwards.

that the entry of a judgment after the time specified by statute is an absolute nullity. The opinions and briefs very fully present the authorities on the question.

See Smith v. Briggs, 3 Denio, 78.

A judgment entered by a justice by virtue of a statutory authority must show that the requirements of the statute have been complied with, and if it fails in this, it is void.

Beach v. Botsford, 1 Dougl. (Mich.) 199, 40 Am. Dec. 45.

Originally justices were only "peace officers," having no jurisdiction in civil causes, their duties being chiefly ministerial.

1 Bl. Com. 849.

Their judicial powers have been created by statutes that are in derogation of the common law. Hence they must follow strictly the statute in the performance of judicial acts. It must appear from the face of their proceedings that they have acted within the scope of their jurisdiction, otherwise their judgments may be impeached collaterally. "No presumptions are indulged in favor of their jurisdiction."

When Justices Nutter and Randolph failed to render and enter judgment on the verdict within the twenty-four hours, jurisdiction was lost, and their power at an end.

To warrant the entry of a nunc pro tunc judgment, there must be record evidence; that is, that such entry can only be made upon the production of some note, entry, or memorandum from the records or quasi records of the court, which shows in itself, without the aid of parol evidence, that the alleged judgment was rendered and what were its character and terms.

Black, Judgm. §§ 132, 135.

The entry must purport to be an actual judgment conveying the sentence of the law, as distinguished from a mere memorandum, note, or recital that a judgment had been or would be rendered.

Black, Judgm. § 115.

In Putnam v. Van Allen, 46 Hun, 492, the justice impaneled a jury which tried the case, and returned a verdict in favor of the defendant. The justice immediately made his memorandum on his minutes of testimony, specifying the items of costs, the amount thereof, and indorsed "Verdict for defendant," and "Judgment for costs against plaintiff, rendered." It being suggested that the costs were excessive, he determined the amount allowable, notified counsel thereof, and entered the items in his minutes, informed counsel that certain witness fees were included but did not enter them in the minutes. Four days thereafter he wrote down the amount of the witness fees, entered and signed judgment, dating it back as of the day of trial. Held, that the judgment was not rendered until the later date, and was void.

The defendant was by this clandestine and unauthorized act of the justices deprived of his right to obtain a writ of certiorari within the time allowed by law.

Long v. Ohio River R. Co. 35 W. Va. 883.

When a trial miscarries, or when by some act or omission of the court, jurisdiction is lost, the plaintiff is in the first instance entitled to a new trial, and in the second, to bring a new action.

Dunlap v. Robinson, 12 Ohio St. 530.

If it be true that the justices actually performed their judicial functions within the statutory period, and only failed or neglected to perform their ministerial duties, then the plaintiff has his remedy against them on their official bonds.

Gannon v. Donn, 7 D. C. 264; 12 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, p. 397, note 7.

Lucas, P., delivered the opinion of the court:

A. J. Lowther brought an action before a justice in Doddridge county, and a verdict of the jury was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, on the 8th of April 1886, for $184. No judgment was entered upon this verdict. The docket showed, however, that an execution had issued at the date of the verdict. On the 31st December, 1887, a renewed execution was issued. This execution recited that a judgment had been rendered by W. E. Nutter, J. P., and L. F. Randolph, J. P., on the 8th day of April, 1886. On the 17th of January, 1888, the defendant, Davis, by his counsel, moved before the justice to quash the execution which motion the justice denied, and the defendant appealed. The case was tried by the circuit court on this appeal, and was there dismissed upon the ground that the appeal was improvidently awarded. Thereupon a further appeal from the decision of the circuit court refusing to quash the execution, was prosecuted to this court, and here the judgment of the circuit court, overruling the motion to quash the execution, was reversed, and the case remanded. Point 1 of the syllabus of the case as tried here was, (Lowther v. Davis, 83 W. Va. 132:) "An execution purporting to be issued upon the judgment of a justice, where there is in fact no such judgment, but simply the verdict of the jury, is void, and the justice should quash such execution upon notice and motion." The judgment of this court proceeded upon the ground that there was no such judgment as the one recited by such execution. The concluding paragraph of the opinion of this court upon this branch of the case is as follows: "These provisions [that is, the provisions of the Code previously cited] clearly show that no execution can be issued by the justice until there is a judgment rendered upon which it can be issued. It is clear that no execution can be issued on the verdict of a jury, but that there must be a judgment entered on the verdict by the justice to authorize the execution; and unless there is such judgment, the execution is void, and should be quashed on a proper motion by the defendant therein."

While this appeal was pending, viz., on the 20th of March, 1888, the two justices who tried the case originally met together, and entered the following order: "A. J. Lowther v. W. H. H. Davis. March 20th, 1888. We, W. E. Nutter and L. F. Randolph, justices of the peace who presided at the trial of this cause on, to wit, the 8th day of April, 1888, in which trial a verdict was rendered by the jury in favor of the plaintiff, having failed to enter judgment as prescribed by law, do enter the judgment now for that time in the following words and figures, to wit: It is therefore considered by the court that A. J. Lowther recover from W. H. H. Davis the sum of $221.93, with interest from the 8th day of April, 1888, until paid, and his cost by him in this behalf expended, which is ascertained to be thirty-two dollars and 50 cents, ($32.50.) Given under our hands this 20th day of March, 1888. W. E. Nutter, J. P. L. F. Randolph, J. P."

The plaintiff afterwards died, and his administrator made a motion before the justice to revive the judgment in his name, and defendant opposed the motion, and the justice refused to revive; and on appeal to the circuit court that action was affirmed, and the administrator brings the case here on appeal.

In this action of the circuit court, in refusing to revive this judgment, we think there was no error, but that it was clearly right on several grounds. In the first place the case may be regarded as a res judicata, this court having in effect directed the execution to be quashed upon the ground that no such judgment had been rendered or entered. It is true that the record now produced, of an attempt on the part of the two justices to enter a judgment nunc pro tunc, was not then before this court; but the principle, often announced, is that everything litigated on the former trial, or which might and ought to have been litigated, is closed by the final adjudication here. The attempt to enter a judgment nunc pro tunc might have been made before the execution issued which was here quashed; and the parties, having failed to make the attempt before bringing the case to this court, ought not to be permitted to do so after this court had decided that no judgment had been rendered. Moreover, the language of this court, as above quoted from the opinion, precluded the idea that the entry of a judgment within the time prescribed by the statute is not essential to its validity. But, secondly, were it otherwise the language of the Code, (see section 114, chap. 50,) taken in connection with other provisions in pars materia, is too unequivocal to admit of misconstruction. Where the language is unambiguous, no ambiguity can be authorized by interpretation. Five or six sections of the Code, immediately succeeding section 114, show that the object of the Legislature was to draw a marked distinction between the rendition of a judgment and its entry. When, therefore, in section 114, the Legislature provides, "In other cases judgment shall be entered within twenty-four hours, (Sundays excepted,) after the trial," it is taking unwarranted liberty with their language to say that when they used the word "entered" they meant "rendered;" or to hold that the judgment, if rendered, might be entered after the lapse of not only twenty-four hours, but of two years after its rendition, as was attempted in this case. The question as to what constitutes the entry is an entirely different one. All that can be said upon that subject is that the very least required to give validity to the judgment is some written evidence contained in the papers or on the docket that it has been rendered, and this writing must be made within the twenty-four hours, (Sundays excepted,) as prescribed by the statute. In the third place, this entry of the judgment made by these justices seems to have been done upon their own mere motion and without any notice whatever to the defendant in the court below. It is a well-established rule that, if they regarded the omission of the entry as a mere clerical error, they could only correct such error upon reasonable notice to the other party. This is the well-established practice in the circuit courts, and in this court. See Code, chap. 184, §§ 1, 5. In any point of view, we must regard this action of the justices as absolutely without warrant of law and entirely null and void. It is well known that the justice's court has no regular term, and if his proceedings are to be carried in his own breast for years, and then entered in a case no longer pending, his docket and proceedings would soon be in a chaotic condition, and absolutely useless for any practical purpose. In the case of Powell v. Com., 11 Gratt. 823, in construing the power of the court over a judgment rendered at a previous term, and the power of amendment of judgments and decrees by the judge in vacation, after the adjournment of the term, it was said: "It was intended to authorize amendments in support of a judgment in cases in which there was something in the record by which they could safely be made. It could not have been intended to authorize an amendment to be made upon the individual recollection of the judge, or by proof abundant." So in regard to the correction of clerical errors generally. Mr. Black thus lays down the rule: "That a court has a right at a term, subsequent to one at which a judgment is rendered, to correct, by an order nunc pro tunc, a clerical error or omission in the original entry, is indisputable. The error, whether of omission or commission, must appear from the record of the proceedings in which the entry of judgment is made." 1 Black, Judgm. § 181. In Halley v. Baird, 1 Hen. & M. 24, it was held that the "district court has no power or jurisdiction to reverse, alter, or amend a judgment given at a former term of the said court which had been entered on the order book and signed by a judge in open court." Upon the other hand, in Shelton v. Welch, 7 Leigh, 175, it was held that a clerical error might be corrected at a subsequent term. In the present case, if it were conceded that a justice of peace could at any time enter a judgment nunc pro tunc, after the termination of his session at which it was rendered, he certainly could not do so except upon reasonable notice to the parties interested, nor could he at any time do so from his own recollection of what had occurred, but would have to rely exclusively upon some sufficient evidence appearing in the record or papers in the case, showing that such a judgment had been rendered.

We think it quite evident, therefore, in the present case, the justices acted without warrant of law, in excess of their jurisdiction, and that the action of the Circuit Court in refusing to renew the pretended judgment was correct and must be affirmed.

Brannon, J., dissenting:

A. J. Lowther brought an action before a justice in Doddridge county, and a verdict of a jury was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $184. No entry of a judgment was made in the docket. The docket shows that an execution issued on the date of the verdict. On December 31, 1887, another execution issued, which by the final action of this court was quashed. Lowther v. Davis, 83 W. Va. 132. This execution recites that judgment had been rendered April 8, 1886, for the debt. On 20th March, 1888, the two justices who tried the case entered in the docket an order reciting that they had presided at the trial on the 8th day of April, 1886, in which a verdict had been rendered by a jury in favor of the plaintiff, and, having failed to enter judgment, they entered a formal judgment nunc pro tunc in accordance with the verdict. The plaintiff afterwards died, and his administrator made a motion before the justice to revive the judgment in his name, and the defendant opposed the motion and the justice refused to revive the judgment, and upon appeal to the circuit court the court also refused to revive it, and the administrator brings the case here. The question is, Was there any judgment to be revived? Is the judgment entered March 20, 1888, nearly two years after the rendition of the verdict, void because it was not entered within twenty-four hours after the trial, as required by Code, § 114, chap. 50? If void because the jurisdiction of the justices had lapsed, there cannot be a revival; but if not void, there can be. Were it an open question, I should be inclined to say that the statute is directory, made for the benefit of the plaintiff, not the defendant; that a justice's court would fall under that general principle applicable to all courts,—that is, that the court once in possession of the cause can go on until final judgment the verdict being merely an interlocutory occurrence while the proceeding is going on, and standing good until judgment on it. Otherwise a costly trial comes to naught because, merely, the justice takes a little too much time to consider. But there have been too many decisions in states where similar statutes prevail to allow this construction. They hold that judgment must be rendered within the prescribed time. Our statute says the judgment must be "entered" within the time. What does the word "entered" here mean? It means that judgment must be rendered—pronounced—within the time, but not necessarily entered in the docket within that time.

In Conwell v. Kuykendall, 39 Kan. 707, though the section of the statute required judgment within four days, the court said, to obviate difficulty, the word, "entered," should be interpreted as "rendered;" that when the justice formed his mind, and announced it, that was judgment, while recording it afterwards would do; that it was the almost universal practice in all courts to announce judgments, and afterwards record them. That the word "entered," in section 114, means "rendered," is shown from the fact that the justice is to ascertain balance after credits, and enter judgment, thus showing that it means the formation and decision of the mind as to the legal result of the case, and it is shown by the further important fact that it is other sections (178 and 179) which command him to enter certain things in the docket, among them the judgment. The judgment of the justice shall be stated; that is, the one already entered or announced. What is a judgment? Upon such a question as that involved in this case, we must have a correct conception of what it is. The docket entry is not the judgment, but only evidence that a judgment was rendered. Judgment is what is ordered and considered; not the mere entry of what is ordered and considered. We sometimes speak of the record entry as the judgment, but it is no more the judgment, accurately speaking, than a note for money is the money or debt itself. Hickey v. Hinesdale, 8 Mich. 267. A judgment is the "decision or sentence of the law, pronounced by a court or other competent tribunal, upon the matter contained in the record." 3 Bl. Com. 395; Jacobs, Law Dict.; Freeman, Judgm. § 2. When, after the facts are found, the court pronounces the decision on them, that is the judgment. That is the judicial act,—the act of the court as a court speaking the sentence of the law,—whereas the entering it in the roll, the docket, or the order or judgment book, call it by whatever name, is an act of different nature, a clerical or ministerial act, one to constitute merely a memorial to attest that the judicial act of pronouncing judgment was in fact done. In view of these principles a justice must pronounce his judgment within twenty-four hours after the trial; but if he does so, his failure to enter it in his docket within that time will by no means rob the party of his judgment. He could, weeks later, compel him by mandamus to enter it. At common law, magistrates, after pronouncing judgments, have been justified in entering up the written record even after commitments to prison under them, and after proceedings by certiorari or other process had been commenced to impugn them for informality. Massey v. Johnson, 12 East, 67, 81, 82. In Gray v. Cookson, 16 East, 18, the record was drawn up six months after judgment rendered. See Rex v. Barker, 1 East, 186. In Hall v. Tuttle, 6 Hill, 33, 40 Am. Dec. 383, the court, of a justice's judgment, said: "This shows the formal entry of the judgment to be quite an unimportant matter. Where it is necessary for the purpose of evidence, it may be made at any time." Suppose a justice, after a verdict, announce judgment thereon, but omits to record it in his docket. You can compel him to do so by mandamus. You show the docket and verdict, and prove his rendition of judgment. You need not have record evidence to prove his announcement of judgment. This is the rule as to proceedings of inferior courts. 2 Freem. Judgm. § 410. It is otherwise as to courts of record. The law fixes no limitation for such entry or for a nunc pro tunc entry. 2 Freem. Judgm. § 56. Suppose the justices in this case had entered a memorandum of judgment on the summons. That would not be a docket entry. No law requires them to make such memorandum. It, however, would be used as evidence of a judgment, and from it judgment in the docket could be afterwards entered.

But we are acting under the statute. The court in the case just cited, having spoken of the law independently of the statute, then adverted to the New York statute requiring judgment to be forthwith rendered and entered in the docket, and held the same principle, saying the judgment must be rendered forthwith; but not so with the docket entry, notwithstanding the statute as to both declared that it must be done forthwith. The reason given was that the one act was judicial, the other merely ministerial. The court held the statute in reference to the docket, specifying various things which it must show, to be directory, and the acts to be performed by the justice in reference thereto ministerial. These principles are sustained by authority in New York, whence our statute came, and other states where similar ones prevail. Walrod v. Shuler, 2 N. Y. 184; Rish v. Emerson, 44 N. Y. 876; opinion, Sibley v. Howard, 8 Denio, 72, 45 Am. Dec. 448, and note; opinion, McNamara v. Spees, 25 Wis. 589; Mattheus v. Houghton, 11 Me. 877; Lynch v. Kelly, 41 Cal. 284; Freem. Judgm. §§ 53, 58a; Digges v. Dunn, 1 Munf. 56; Shadrack v. Woolfolk, 82 Gratt. 707, 718; 1 Black, Judgm. § 106. In Wisconsin where the statute requiring judgment forthwith exists and where its construction is more rigid than elsewhere it has been twice held that "if judgment is rendered at the proper time (by being audibly pronounced so that it may be heard by the parties and others present) that is sufficient and the justice may subsequently enter it on his docket and tax the costs." Wearne v. Smith, 82 Wis. 412; Kleinsteuer v. Schumacher, 85 Wis. 608. The cases of Sibley v. Howard, 8 Denio, 72, 45 Am. Dec. 448; Watson v. Davis, 19 Wend. 871, and McNamara v. Spees, 25 Wis. 589, were cases where not only the docket entry but the judgment—the decision—was not announced till after the time limited. It must not be thought because in ordinary courts judicial acts are performed by a judge but the ministerial ones by a clerk that in the case of a justice who performs both, all his acts are judicial. The nature of the act is tested by its nature not by the accident of the person performing it. In Hickey v. Hensdale, supra, the court said the acts of the justice in making docket entries were ministerial like those of a clerk. I repeat then that if a justice does announce judgment within twenty-four hours after verdict the judgment is not void because the entry in the docket is not made within that time. It is however important that justices who perform such important functions in the administration of justice should promptly enter their proceedings in the docket, just as much as it is that judges of superior courts should record their action, and they are culpable for not so doing.

But now comes another question,—the only question which has given me any serious concern. The judgment shows on its face that it was entered long after the date of the verdict, not purporting to have been done while the proceeding was in fieri, but is one entered nunc pro tunc; and it may be that it is not itself conclusive of the fact that judgment was pronounced within 24 hours after the trial, and that it is necessary to ascertain by other evidence that it was then rendered, where it purports to be nunc pro tunc. Our Statute (Code, chap. 50, § 182) makes the docket evidence of a judgment, but it does not make it the sole evidence, for it may be proven by entries or memoranda among the papers required by law to be kept, even by oral evidence of the justice. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 513; Freem. Judgm. § 410; note, 40 Am. Dec. 886. Re Wight, 184 U. S. 136, 83 L. ed. 865, the United States Supreme Court held that a nunc pro tunc order could be made on the recollection of the judge that an order had been made. The justices making this entry of judgment are the same who received the verdict. It is a circumstance to show such judgment. I hardly think this case ought to be regarded as a judgment nunc pro tunc, but simply as the performance of a ministerial act of entry of judgment announced at date of verdict, on the knowledge of the justices, nothing appearing tending to show that judgment was not so announced, but I am treating it, in the strongest light against its validity, as a judgment nunc pro tunc, holding that there is sufficient evidence to warrant such judgment, and, if there is, certainly such data would warrant the mere clerical act of entry in the docket. Here the docket shows that, on the date of the verdict, execution issued. We can read this entry, and could read the execution, were it in the record, but we are to presume it following the law, reciting the judgment, date, parties, and amount, as section 185, chap. 50, requires. The docket entries and verdict give us certainty as to parties, amount, dates, etc., necessary for judgment. The note of the execution follows right after the verdict in the docket. Is it not cogent evidence that judgment had been given on the verdict? For law of nunc pro tunc judgment, see opinion Mitchell v. Overman, 103 U. S. 64, 26 L. ed. 870. Upon such data I think a judgment could be entered at any time. Here was a verdict, and judgment would follow as a matter of course, in the absence of motion to set it aside, and we would perhaps presume its rendition; but the docket shows the issue of an execution the very day of the verdict. 3. In such matters, equality and not identity or community, of accommodations, is the extreme test of conformity to the requirements of the Amendment.
4. The regulation of domestic commerce is as exclusively a state function as the regulation of interstate commerce is a Federal function. This statute is an exercise of the police power, and expresses the legislative conviction that the separation of the races in railway conveyances, with proper sanctions for substantial equality of accommodations, is in the interest of public order, peace, and comfort. It is a matter of legislative power and discretion, with which courts cannot interfere.
5. A proper construction of the statute does not, as contended by relator, authorize a conductor to assign a passenger to a coach to which his race does not belong, nor does it bind the passenger to accept such wrongful assignment, nor exempt the officers from action for damages in case of such wrongful assignment, and refusal to carry when disobeyed. The discretion vested in the conductor to decide primarily the coach to which each passenger belongs is only the necessary discretion attending every imposition of any duty, to determine whether the circumstances under which the duty arises exist. He exercises such discretion at his peril, and that of his employer.

In Day v. Owen, 5 Mich. 520, 72 Am. Dec. 62, which was decided prior to the adoption of the 14th Amendment, it was held that the legality of a regulation for steamboat passengers which denied cabin passage to colored persons depended on the reasonableness of such regulation and that this was a mixed question of law and fact to be found by the jury. An answer setting up such a regulation in an action on the case by a colored passenger for denying him such privileges was held good against general demurrer and judgment rendered thereon for the defendant.

It was admitted in West Chester & P. R. Co. v. Miles, 55 Pa. 209, that a person could not be excluded by a public carrier on account of color, but the contention was as to the separation of colored and white passengers, and it was held that in the absence of any statute to the contrary the passengers might be separated if their accommodations were equal.

So in McGinn v. Williams (C. C. D. Md.) 5 Gen. Dig. 350, it was held that a steamer might furnish separate tables for white and colored passengers provided they were in all respects equal in the quality of their accommodations.

And it has been held in several cases that where the accommodations were equal in all respects the colored passengers on a railroad might be compelled to take a separate car. Cherapeaks, O. & S. W. R. Co. v. Wells, 95 Tenn. 433; Council v. Western & A. R. Co. 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 636; Heard v. Georgia R. Co. 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 712; Houck v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 83 Fed. Rep. 235.

Fenner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We have held that when a party is prosecuted for crime under a law alleged to be unconstitutional, in a case which is unappealable, and where a proper plea setting up the unconstitutionality has been overruled by the judge, a proper case arises for the exercise of our supervisory jurisdiction, in determining whether the judge is exceeding the bounds of judicial power by entertaining a prosecution for a crime not created by law. State v. Orleans Parish Crim. Dist. Ct. Judge, 39 La. Ann. 132; State v. Hicks, 44 La. Ann. —. Relator's application conforms to all the requirements of this rule. He alleges that he is being prosecuted for a violation of Act No. 111 of 1890; that said Act is unconstitutional; that his plea of its unconstitutionality has been presented to, and overruled by, the respondent judge; and that the case is unappealable. He therefore applies for writs of certiorari and prohibition, in order that we may determine the validity of the proceedings, and, in case we find him entitled to such relief, may restrain further proceedings against him in the cause. answer, maintains the constitutionality of the law and the validity of his proceeding.

The legislative Act in question is entitled "An Act to promote the comfort of passengers on railway trains; requiring all railway companies carrying passengers on their trains in this state to provide equal, but separate, accommodations for the white and colored races, by providing separate coaches or compartments, so as to secure separate accommodations; defining the duties of the officers of such railways; directing them to assign passengers to the coaches or compartments set aside for the use of the race to which such passengers belong; authorizing them to refuse to carry on their trains such passengers as may refuse to occupy the coaches or compartments to which he or she is assigned; to exonerate such railway companies from any and all blame or damages that might proceed from such refusal; to prescribe penalties for all violations of this Act," etc. The first section of the Act requires that "all railway companies carrying passengers in their coaches in this state shall provide equal, but separate, accommodations for the white and colored races, by providing two or more passenger coaches for each passenger train, or by dividing the passenger coaches by a partition, so as to secure separate accommodations," and that "no person or persons shall be permitted to occupy seats in coaches other than the ones assigned to them on account of the race they belong to." The second section provides "that the officers of such passenger trains shall have power, and are hereby required, to assign each passenger to the coach or compartment used for the race to which such passenger belongs. Any passenger insisting on going into a coach or compartment to which by race he does not belong, shall be liable to a fine of $25, or, in lieu thereof, to imprisonment for a period of not more than twenty days in the parish prison." And a like penalty is imposed on "any officer of any railroad insisting on assigning a passenger to a coach or compartment other than the one set aside for the race to which said passenger belongs;" and it is further provided that, "should any passenger refuse to occupy the coach or compartment to which he or she is assigned by the officer of such railway, said officer shall have power to refuse to carry such passenger on his train, and for such refusal neither he nor the railway company shall be liable for damages in any of the courts of this state." The third section provides penalties upon officers, directors, conductors, and employés of railway companies who shall refuse or neglect to comply with the provisions of the Act.

We have had occasion very recently to consider the constitutionality of this Act, as applicable to interstate passengers, and held that if so applied it would be unconstitutional, because in violation of the exclusive right vested in Congress to regulate commerce between the states. State v. Hicks, 44 La. Ann.—. The instant case presents no such application of the statute; but it appears on the face of the information that relator was proceeded against as "a passenger traveling wholly within the limits of the state of Louisiana, on a passenger train belonging to

The Civil Rights Act of Congress does not give a right to a penalty for discrimination by a carrier against colored persons as the right denied is not one of the rights of a citizen of the United States as such, and therefore is not the subject of legislation by Congress. *Cully v. A state law requiring separate but equal accommodations to be furnished for colored and white passengers is void so far as it applies to interstate commerce. State v. Hicks, 44 La. Ann.—.

But a state statute which applies only to commerce within the state is not unconstitutional regulation of commerce because it requires railroads to provide equal but separate accommodations for white and colored passengers by providing separate cars or separate divisions of a car for colored persons. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Mississippi, 133 U. S. 587, 33 L. ed. 784, affirming 5 L. R. A. 132, 66 Miss. 662.

So state laws prohibiting any discrimination as to color between passengers are unconstitutional so far as they apply to interstate commerce, such as the carriage of passengers by vessel making voyages between different states. Ball v. De Cuir, 95 U. S. 485, 24 L. ed. 547.

In Central R. Co. of N. J. v. Green, 86 Pa. 427, it was held that a state statute might impose a penalty on a carrier for making any distinction based on the color of passengers. No question of interstate commerce was decided in this case.

The same case decides that under the Pennsylvania Act of March 22, 1897, making it unlawful to exclude "any person or persons" on account of color, only one penalty was incurred for the exclusion of man and wife at the same time.

B. A. R.

the East Louisiana Railroad Company, carrying passengers in their coaches within the state of Louisiana." It thus appears that the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States is not involved.

The relator's plea of the unconstitutionality of the statute contains no less than fourteen enumerated paragraphs, which do not require reproduction, because most of them are argumentative, and no provisions of the state or Federal Constitutions are referred to, as violated by the statute, except the 13th and 14th Amendments to the Constitution of the United States. The whole gravamen of relator's plea is contained in the fourteenth ground, which is as follows: "That the statute in question establishes an insidious distinction and discrimination between citizens of the United States, based on race, which is obnoxious to the fundamental principles of national citizenship, perpetuates involuntary servitude, as regards citizens of the colored race, under the merest pretense of promoting the comforts of passengers on railway trains, and in further respects abridges the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the United States, and the rights secured by the 13th and 14th Amendments of the Federal Constitution." So far as the 13th Amendment is concerned, its application to this statute may be at once eliminated, because the Supreme Court of the United States has clearly decided that it does not refer to rights of the character here involved. We will, for the sake of brevity, quote only the syllabus of the decision, as follows: "The 13th Amendment relates only to slavery and involuntary servitude, which it abolishes; and although, by its reflex action, it establishes universal freedom in the United States, and Congress may probably pass laws directly enforcing its provisions, yet such legislative power extends only to the subject of slavery and its incidents; and the denial of equal accommodations in inns, public conveyances, and places of public amusements imposes no badge of slavery or involuntary servitude upon the party, but, at most, infringes rights which are protected from state aggression by the 14th Amendment." Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 3, 27 L. ed. 835. We may, therefore, confine ourselves to the question whether or not the statute violates the 14th Amendment, which provides that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." A further elimination may be made of the question whether a statute requiring separate accommodations for the races, without requiring the accommodations to be equal, would contravene the amendment, because the statute here explicitly requires that the accommodations shall be equal.

We thus reach the sole question involved in this case, which is whether a statute requiring railroads to furnish separate, but equal, accommodations for the two races, and requiring domestic passengers to confine themselves to the accommodations provided for the race to which they belong, violates the 14th Amendment. The first branch of the above question, as to the binding effect of the statute on railways, has been definitely decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, on a statute almost identical, holding that the provision requiring railroads to furnish separate, but equal, accommodations was valid. Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Mississippi, 188 U. S. 587, 88 L. ed. 784. But the court said: "Whether such accommodation shall be a matter of choice or compulsion [on the part of passengers] does not enter into this case." The validity of such statutes, in so far as they require passengers, under penalties, to confine themselves to the separate and equal accommodations provided for the race to which they belong, has not, as yet, been directly presented to, or decided by, the Supreme Court of the United States. But the validity of such statutes, and of similar regulations made by common carriers in absence of statute, and the validity of similar regulations or statutes as applied to public schools, has arisen in very many cases before the highest courts of the several states, and before inferior Federal courts, resulting in an almost uniform course of decision to the effect that statutes or regulations enforcing the separation of the races in public conveyances or in public schools, so long, at least, as the facilities or accommodations provided are substantially equal, do not abridge any privilege or immunity of citizens, or otherwise contravene the 14th Amendment. We refer to the following, among other numerous, decisions: West Chester & P. R. Co. v. Miles, 55 Pa. 209; State v. McCann, 21 Ohio St. 210; People v. Gallagher, 93 N. Y. 488, 45 Am. Rep. 232; Cory v. Carter, 48 Ind. 387, 17 Am. Rep. 738; State v. Duffy, 7 Nev. 842; People v. Easton, 13 Abb. Pr. N. S. 160; Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. State, 66 Miss. 662, 5 L. R. A. 132; Lehev v. Brummell, 103 Mo. 546; Dawson v. Lee, 83 Ky. 49; Ward v. Flood, 48 Cal. 36, 17 Am. Rep. 405; Chesapeake, O. & S. W. R. Co. v. Wells, 85 Tenn. 618; Bertonneau v. City Schools Board of Directors, 3 Woods, C. C. 177; The Sue, 22 Fed. Rep. 848; Logwood v. Memphis & C. R. Co. 23 Fed. Rep. 318; Murphy v. Western & A. R. Co. Id. 637.

It would little boot for us to make extensive quotations from these decisions. They all accord in the general principle that, in such matters equality, and not identity or community, of accommodations, is the extreme test of conformity to the requirements of the 14th Amendment. The cogency of the reasons on which this principle is founded perhaps accounts for the singular fact that, notwithstanding the general prevalence throughout the country of such statutes and regulations, and the frequency of decisions maintaining them, no one has yet undertaken to submit the question to the final arbitrament of the Supreme Court of the United States. In a case which arose as far back as 1849, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, through its great Chief Justice, Shaw, considered this subject, saying: "Conceding, therefore, in the fullest manner, that colored persons, the descendants of Africans, are entitled by law to equal rights, constitutional and political, civil and social, the question then arises whether the regulation in question, which provides separate schools for colored children, is a violation of any of these rights." And the court held that it was not, saying in conclusion: "It is urged that this maintenance of separate schools tends to deepen and perpetuate the odious distinction of caste, founded in a deep-rooted prejudice in public opinion. This prejudice, if it exists, is not created by law, and cannot be changed by law. Whether this distinction and prejudice, existing in the opinions and feelings of the community, would not be as effectually fostered by compelling colored and white children to associate together may well be doubted." Roberts v. Boston, 5 Cush. 198. The general rule applied to carriers is well stated by Mr. Hutchinson: "If the conveyance employed be adapted to the carriage of passengers separated in different classes, according to the fare which may be charged, the character of the accommodations afforded, or of the persons to be carried, the carrier may so divide them; and any regulation confining those of one class to one part of the conveyance will not be regarded as unreasonable, if made in good faith, for the better accommodation and convenience of the passengers." Hutchinson, Carr. par. 542. In applying this rule, the supreme court of Pennsylvania said: "The right to separate passengers being clear, in proper cases, and it being the subject of sound regulation, the question remaining to be considered is whether there is such a difference between the white and the black races in this state, resulting from nature, law, and custom, as makes it a reasonable ground of separation." The court then proceeds to discuss these differences, taking care to say: "To assert separateness is not to declare inferiority in either. It is simply to say that, following the order of Divine Providence, human authority ought not to compel these widely separated races to intermix." Concluding, the court said: "Law and custom having sanctioned a separation of races, it is not the province of the judiciary to legislate it away. . . . Following these guides, we are compelled to declare that at the time of the alleged injury there was that natural, legal, and customary difference between the white and black races in this state which made their separation, as passengers in a public conveyance, the subject of a sound regulation to secure order, promote comfort, preserve the peace, and maintain the rights both of the carriers and passengers." West Chester & P. R. Co. v. Miles, 55 Pa. 209. Both the decisions from which we have quoted were rendered before the adoption of the 14th Amendment, but in states where the civil rights of the colored race were fully recognized. We have referred to them as indicating the germinal principles which have been followed in the numerous decisions cited above, applying to the 14th Amendment. That Amendment, it is well 18 L. R. A.

settled, created no new rights whatever, but only extended the operation of existing rights, and furnished additional protection for such rights. Barbier v. Connolly, 118 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923; United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 23 L. ed. 588; Slaughter House Cases, 83 U. S. 16 Wall. 86, 21 L. ed. 394.

The statute here in question is an exercise of the police power, and expresses the conviction of the legislative department of the state that the separation of the races in public conveyances with proper sanctions enforcing the substantial equality of the accommodations supplied to each, is in the interest of public order, peace, and comfort. It undoubtedly imposes a severe burden upon railways, but the Supreme Court of the United States has held that they are bound to bear it. It impairs no right of passengers of either race, who are secured that equality of accommodations which satisfies every reasonable claim. The regulation of domestic commerce is as exclusively a state function as the regulation of interstate commerce is a federal function. It is as much within the control of state legislation as the public school system or the law of marriage. To hold that the requirement of separate, though equal, accommodations in public conveyances, violated the 14th Amendment, would, on the same principles, necessarily entail the nullity of statutes establishing separate schools, and of others, existing in many states, prohibiting intermarriage between the races. All are regulations based upon difference of race; and, if such difference cannot furnish a basis for such legislation in one of these cases, it cannot in any. The statute applies to the two races with such perfect fairness and equality that the record brought up for our inspection does not disclose whether the person prosecuted is a white or a colored man. The charge is simply that he did "then and there, unlawfully, insist on going into a coach to which, by race, he did not belong." Obviously, if the fact charged be proved, the penalty would be the same whether the accused were white or colored.

We have been at pains to expound this statute because the dissatisfaction felt with it by a portion of the people seems to us so unreasonable that we can account for it only on the ground of some misconception. Even were it true that the statute is prompted by a prejudice on the part of one race to be thrown in such contact with the other, one would suppose that to be a sufficient reason why the pride and self-respect for the other race should equally prompt it to avoid such contact, if it could be done without the sacrifice of equal accommodations. It is very certain that such unreasonable insistence upon thrusting the company of one race upon the other, with no adequate motive, is calculated, as suggested by Chief Justice Shaw, to foster and intensify repulsion between them, rather than to extinguish it.

We will conclude by noticing some charges made against the statute by relator, based, as we think, on an utterly unwarranted construction. He claims that the statute vests the officers of the company with a judicial power to determine the race to which the passenger belongs; that they may assign the passenger to a coach to which by race he does not belong, and that such assignment is binding on the passenger; and that, though wrongfully made, the officers and the railway company are exempted from any legal responsibility. The reading of the statute utterly repels these charges. Not only does not the statute authorize the conductor or other officer "to assign a passenger to a coach to which, by race, he does not belong, but it affirmatively requires him to assign each passenger to the coach used for the race to which such passenger belongs," and it punishes for failure to make such assignment. When the statute authorizes the conductor to refuse to carry any passenger who shall "refuse to occupy the coach to which he or she is assigned by the officer of such railway," it obviously means an assignment according to the requirements of the Act, i. e. to the coach to which the passenger, by race, belongs; and the exemption from damages is subject to the same construction. It is too clear for discussion that a refusal to carry a passenger because he had refused to obey an assignment to a coach to which his race did not belong would not be exempted from redress in an action for damages. The discretion vested in the officer to decide primarily the coach to which each passenger, by race, belongs, is only that necessary discretion attending every imposition of a duty, to determine whether the occasion exists which calls for its exercise. It is a discretion to be exercised at his peril, and at the peril of his employer. It is very certain that if relator shall prove, in this prosecution, that he did not, as charged, "insist on going into a coach to which, by race, he did not belong," an erroneous assignment by the conductor would not stand in the way of his acquittal, or exempt the officer and the railway from an action for damages, whatever defenses might lie open to them based on good faith and probable cause.

It is therefore ordered that the provisional writ of prohibition herein issued be now dissolved and set aside, and that the relief sought be denied, at relator's cost.

but are capable of being understood and appreciated by others, then and in all such cases the promisor undertakes that he will act reasonably and fairly, and found his determination on grounds that are just, reasonable and sensible. In this last class of cases his decision in point of correctness is, of course, subject to review by judicial triers.

Duplex Safety Boiler Co. v. Garden, 101 N. Y. 387; Wood R. & M. Mach. Co. v. Smith, 50 Mich. 565.

Cases falling in the first class are:

Gibson v. Cranage, 39 Mich. 49, 33 Am. Rep. 851; Hoffman v. Gallaher, 6 Daly, 42,—where a portrait was to be satisfactory; Brown v. Foster, 113 Mass. 186, 18 Am. Rep. 463,—in which plaintiff had agreed to make a suit of clothes for defendant; Zaleski v. Clark, 44 Conn. 218, 26 Am. Rep. 446,—where plaintiff had agreed to make a bust of defendant's deceased husband; McCarren v. McNulty, 7 Gray, 189,—in which plaintiff agreed to make a book case satisfactory to a certain person; Hartman v. Blackburn, 7 Pittsb. L. J. 140,—where a dentist made a set of teeth and agreed that they should be satisfactory; Hart v. Hart, 22 Barb. 606,—where a son agreed to support his father during his lifetime and agreed to pay his board if he should become dissatisfied with living with him.

Cases falling in the second class of cases, and where the right of decision is not absolutely reserved to the promisor, but is subject to review by judicial triers, are:

Folliard v. Wallace, 2 Johns. 895; Burns v. Munger, 45 Hun, 75,—where there was an agreement to pay money three months after he should be "well satisfied" that the title to certain property was good; Brooklyn v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 47 N. Y. 475, 7 Am. Rep. 469,—which was an agreement to keep certain streets in repair; Duplex Safety Boiler Co. v. Garden, supra,—which was a contract to repair boilers and to be paid “when defendants were satisfied that the boilers so changed were a success;” Grinnell v. Kiralfy, 55 Hun, 423,—where plaintiff contracted as a soubrette in a theatrical troupe upon condition that her employer might annul the contract if he should “feel satisfied” that she was incompetent or inattentive to business, etc.; Doll v. Noble, 5 L. R. A. 554, 116 N. Y. 230,—where a written contract provided that the polishing, staining and rubbing of the wood-work on defendant’s houses was to be done “to the entire satisfaction of the owner.”

In Tyler v. Ames, 6 Lana. 280, and Spring v. Ansonia Clock Co., 24 Hun, 175, it was held that under a contract similar to the present one, the employer might discharge his employé arbitrarily and without disclosing any reasons therefor.

Neither case was decided by a court of last resort, and are evidently overruled by the later cases of Duplex Safety Boiler Co. v. Garden and Doll v. Noble, supra, and are practically overruled in the cases of Weaver v. Klaw, 43 N. Y. S. R. 675, and Hydecker v. Williams, 45 N. Y. S. R. 637.

Gray v. Central R. Co. of N. J. 11 Hun, 70, and Heron v. Davis, 8 Bosw. 336, are both New York cases, and are controlled by the later decisions in the same court.

In all cases the dissatisfaction must be real and not pretended, and must be honestly entertained in good faith.

Exhaust Ventilator Co. v. Chicago M. & St. P. R. Co. 66 Wis. 218; Hartford S. Mfg. Co. v. Brush, 48 Vt. 528; Daggett v. Johnson, 49 Vt. 345; Lynn v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 60 Md. 404; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Brydon, 65 Md. 193; Sibley Mfg. Co. v. Chico, 24 Fed. Rep. 893.

Where one party has substantially complied with the terms of a contract which he is to perform to the satisfaction or approval of the other party, whereby the property of the latter has been benefited, the benefits being of such a character that they must necessarily be appropriated and retained by the party for whom they were made, the contractor is entitled to compensation.

O’Dea v. Winona, 41 Minn. 424, and cases there cited; Addison, Cont. §§ 393, 394.

Mr. Henry J. Horn for respondent.

Gillilan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff, then a resident of Boston, Mass., and the defendant, a corporation, whose principal place of business was the same place, entered into this contract:

“Boston, Dec. —, 1890. We agree to pay A. C. Frary ($250) two hundred and fifty dollars per month from Jan. 1, 1891, to April 1, 1892, for his services in carrying on our business in St. Paul, to our satisfaction and under our control. American Rubber Company. R. D. Evans, I hereby accept the above. A. C. Frary.”

May 27, 1891, defendant discharged plaintiff from July 1st following, giving no other reason for it than that his conduct of its business was not to its satisfaction. If this contract reserved to defendant the right to discharge plaintiff at any time merely because it might be dissatisfied with his conduct of the business, whether it had sufficient reason to be so or not, it may have been an injudicious one for plaintiff to consent to; but there can be no question that the parties might make such a contract, and, if that is what this contract was intended to be, they must abide by it. In Buller v. Winona Mill Co., 28 Minn. 205, a contract of hiring left it to the hirer to determine what it should consider right and proper to pay for the services, and it was held that if it did so honestly and in good faith its determination was final. The cases—of which there are a great many in the books—involving stipulations more or less similar to that in this contract do not deny the capacity of the parties to stipulate that what is to be done by one of them shall be to the satisfaction of the other before any liability on the part of the latter shall arise, and to make his decision that he is not satisfied final. It would hardly be profitable to review the decisions in detail. Those which have refused to hold the parties to such a stipulation according to its letter have generally done so, we apprehend, not because the parties were not bound, if such were their contract, but because it was not the contract. It is a matter of construction. In construing such contracts the nature or character of the thing stipulated to be done, the chief purpose the parties had in view, are potent considerations. Where they have had in view to satisfy the taste, feelings, sensibility, or judgment of the party, the decisions have generally held that the stipulation that the thing to be done must be to his satisfaction was absolute, and his decision that it was not to his satisfaction was intended to be final and unquestionable. On the other hand, where the chief thing the parties have had in mind was to effect some definite purpose or end, of the performance of which others could judge just as well as the parties could, and which involved no considerations strictly personal, the stipulation that it should be done to the satisfaction of the party has been generally held not to be controlling. Of the first of these classes of cases, the painting of a portrait to the party’s satisfaction is one instance. Folliard v. Wallace, 2 Johns. 895, where the contract sued on stipulated that, in case the title conveyed to the parties in fee should prove good and sufficient in law against all other claims whatsoever, they would pay a specified sum three months after they should be well satisfied that they held the land undisputed by any person whatsoever, and against all claims, is an instance within the second class. A contract employing a servant not to do a fixed and definite work (as, for instance, to build a specified kind of fence), but to render personal services, general in their nature, and especially where the employment involves considerations of fitness, business capacity, integrity, trust, and confidence, such as in this case, comes within the first class. Certainly no third person could judge whether the performance should come up to what was expected when the contract was made so well as the employer could. There is every reason to suppose that when the parties inserted the words “to our satisfaction” they meant just what they said. There is nothing in the evidence to suggest that the defendant did not discharge plaintiff for the sole reason that it was in good faith dissatisfied with his conduct of the business.

There is nothing in any assignment not covered by what we have already said.
Order affirmed.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

STATE of New Hampshire, ex rel. RHODES et al., Petitioners,

v.

John B. SAUNDERS.

(.....N. H.)

1. Equity as a great branch of the law of their native country was brought over by the Colonists and has always existed as a part of the common law in its broadest sense in New Hampshire.
2. There is no right of trial by jury in equity proceedings.
3. An injunction against the unlawful use of buildings as a nuisance is not beyond the jurisdiction of equity on the ground that it is in the nature of a punishment of a criminal offense.
4. A statute declaring the use of a building for either of several unlawful purposes to be a nuisance abatable in equity does not introduce an exceptional mode of trial or change the ordinary course of procedure on questions properly triable by jury.
5. A nuisance cannot be abated with or without legal process if it has been discontinued and has not been renewed when proceedings are begun against it.

(December 26, 1880.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Trial Court for Hillsborough County made during the trial of an equity suit under the Laws of 1887, chap. 77, to abate a liquor nuisance. Case discharged.

The questions raised by the exceptions were:

1. As to the validity of the chapter under which the petition was filed.
 2. Whether or not defendant was entitled to trial by jury.
 3. Whether or not the state was required to prove the existence of the illegal use of the building on the day the petition was filed.
- Chapter 77 of the Laws of 1887 is as follows:
"Section 1. Any building, place, or tenement in any town or city that is resorted to for prostitution, lewdness, or illegal gaming, or that is used for the illegal sale or keeping for sale of spirituous or malt liquors, wines, or cider, is declared to be a common nuisance. Section 2. The supreme court shall have jurisdiction in equity, upon information filed by the solicitor for the county, or upon petition of not less than twenty legal voters of such town or city, setting forth any of the facts contained in section 1 of this Act, to restrain, enjoin or abate the same; and an injunction for such purpose may be issued by said court, or any justice thereof."

The further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. J. H. Andrews, D. F. O'Connor, William Little and A. R. Simmons, with Messrs. W. L. Foster and J. P. Bartlett, for defendant.

Messrs. Robert M. Wallace and Samuel Upton, for plaintiffs:

The maintaining a common nuisance by using a building for liquor purposes would be a crime.

The fact that this statute is silent as to what the punishment or penalty for this offense is makes no difference, for it is punishable in the discretion of the court, like most common nuisances.

When the forbidding statute is silent as to the punishment, it is an indictable misdemeanor at common law.

Bishop, Crim. Law, §§ 84, 849; Bishop, Statutory Crimes, §§ 138, 873; State v. Fletcher, 5 N. H. 257.

If a statute makes a thing a public nuisance and directs how it shall be punished, probably the common-law right of abatement still attaches.

1 Bishop, Crim. Law, 150c, and cases cited.

This statute does just the reverse; it establishes a way of abatement and prohibition for the future, and is silent as to the penalty, leaving that to the courts.

There is no constitutional right of trial by jury in equity cases.

Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 210, 20 Am. Rep. 194; Perkins v. Scott, 57 N. H. 81; Bellows v. Bellows, 58 N. H. 60; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 81 L. ed. 205.

The object of the injunction in cases of this kind is not alone or perhaps mainly, to abate the nuisance, but to restrain the respondent from a repetition of the offense in the future.

2 Story, Eq. § 862.

By a perpetual injunction the remedy is made complete through all future time; whereas, an information or indictment at common law can only dispose of the present nuisance, and for future acts new prosecutions must be brought.

2 Story, Eq. § 924.

To have an injunction against a private nul-

NOTE.—The exhaustive and able review of the subject of jury trials in chancery which the court has given in the opinion leaves no opportunity for annotation on that question.

The Legislature recognized the injurious effect of such nuisances as these, and sought to prohibit and prevent them in the future in proper cases.

Statutes of this kind are to be construed so as not to defeat the obvious intentions of the Legislature.

Bishop, Statutory Crimes, § 193, note.

Neither are they to be construed so as to work an absurdity.

Bishop, Statutory Crimes, § 200.

We have a reasonable time to file our petition.

Mr. James W. Remick, also for plaintiffs:

The power of the Legislature to condemn, regulate, restrain and if necessary to prohibit and destroy, whatever is injurious to the public health and morals, or offensive to the public sense, is universally recognized, and nowhere more distinctly than in New Hampshire.

State v. Noyes, 80 N. H. 279; State v. Marshall, 1 L. R. A. 51, 64 N. H. 549; State v. Campbell, 64 N. H. 402; State v. Freeman, 83 N. H. 426; State v. Clark, 28 N. H. 176, 61 Am. For more than three hundred years, independent of any statute, the enjoining of common nuisances, on information, by some one representing the public, has been an established branch of equity jurisdiction. It is supported by a chain of precedents, extending back to the time of the Virgin Queen.

The ground and theory of the jurisdiction must commend itself to every judicial mind.

Littleton v. Fritz, 65 Iowa, 488, 54 Am. Rep. 19; Carleton v. Rugg, 5 L. R. A. 193, 149 Mass. 550.

Of the saloon as a nuisance, and for the simple purpose of restraint and prevention, by the process of injunction, the jurisdiction of courts of equity is certain, and in no way altered or affected by the fact that the maintenance of the saloon is also a crime.

Bishop, Crim. Proc. 1415; Wood, Nuisances, p. 814; High, Inf. § 524; State v. Crawford, 28 Kan. 726, 42 Am. Rep. 182; Littleton v. Fritz, supra; Carleton v. Rugg, supra; Hamilton v. Whitridge, 11 Md. 128, 69 Am. Dec. 184.

A thing may be criminal and yet be the subject of civil proceedings.

Nobody ever pretended, so far as I know, that these proceedings, with their fishing depositions, and other incidents of civil trial, were in violation of any provision of the Constitution, because the act which gave rise to them was criminal.

Bishop, Crim. Law, §§ 264, 265; Bishop, Crim. Proc. 1418.

Nor is this right to civil proceeding limited to private individuals who have sustained injuries distinct from the state, as suggested by defendant; but the state itself is entitled to a civil remedy in addition to its criminal remedy, to accomplish any allowable civil object.

State v. Barrels of Liquor, 48 N. H. 369; Bishop, Crim. Law, § 266.

Whenever and wherever the question has been discussed, the authority of the Legislature has been emphatically declared, and always without dissent, except in recent case of Carleton v. Rugg, where the court was divided.

Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 81 L. ed. 205; Littleton v. Fritz, 65 Iowa, 488, 54 Am. Rep. 19; Carleton v. Rugg, 149 Mass. 550, 5 L. R. A. 193.

In this case, since the act fails to designate the mode of trial, it is the duty of the court to presume that the Legislature intended a constitutional mode.

Cooley, Const. Lim. § 186; Willard v. Harvey, 24 N. H. 344; Cheshire Co. Teleph. Co. v. State, 63 N. H. 169; Gage v. Ruess, 107 Ill. 11.

Though the Legislature had affirmatively declared that every question of fact should be determined by the court, yet you would be bound to sustain the act so far as it declares liquor saloons common nuisances, and so far as it provides for their restraint by the injunction process.

East Kingston v. Towle, 48 N. H. 65, 97 Am. Dec. 575, 2 Am. Rep. 174.

In proceedings for an injunction against a common nuisance, so declared by statute, there is no constitutional right to a jury trial.

Profatt, Jury Trial, pp. 84, 85.

Constitutions in preserving the right to trial by jury speak of the time of their adoption.

Profatt, Jury Trial, pp. 87, 88; Pomeroy, note to 2d ed. of Sedgwick, Constr. Stat. & Const. Law, p. 487.

They continue the trial where it previously existed, according to the common law in its English sense.

Scott*, 57 N. H. 80; King v. Hopkins, 57 N. H. 834; Gould v. Raymond, 59 N. H. 260.

But jury trial is not secured by article 20 in every case even, where it was had at common law, but only in those cases where it was had as a matter of right.

In proceedings in equity, in a matter proper for equitable cognizance, while the court has always been at liberty to send questions of fact to a jury for its own enlightenment, there is not, was not, and never has been, independent of express statutory or constitutional provision for it, any absolute right, in behalf of the parties, or either of them to demand a jury trial, except in two cases, which are peculiar to the English civilization and in no way related to the present subject, or applicable to American conditions.

It has always been the undoubted prerogative of the equity court, with the exceptions hinted at, to hear and determine for itself, every question of fact putting issue upon the record, in any matter truly belonging to equity jurisdiction.

Mr. Profatt, § 90 says: "As a matter of right, the jury trial, could not be claimed in a court of equity, except in the two cases of an heir and rector."

An attempt has been made to show that proceedings to enjoin common nuisances constituted a further exception to the rule.

But if there were nothing else, the fact that no English or American text-writer, ancient or modern, has recognized such exception, would be conclusive that it never existed.

Among the earlier English cases, where the jurisdiction to enjoin without trial was exercised or recognized, we mention—

Dond's Case, Moore, 288, decided in the Exchequer, 29 Eliz.; Atty-Gen. v. Burrige, 10 Price, 350; Atty-Gen. v. Richards, 2 Anst. 603; Atty-Gen. v. Forbes, 2 Myl. & C. 123; Atty-Gen. v. Johnson, 2 Wils. 87.

Even in the cases where the court declines to enjoin without trial at law, the rule is not absolute. It is a practice founded more on conscience than necessity. It always rests in the sound discretion of the court.

Goodyear v. Day, 2 Wall. Jr. 288; Root v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 105 U. S. 189, 26 L. ed. 975.

In Eden, chap. 11, after asserting and proving the jurisdiction, the commentator says: "But notwithstanding the jurisdiction, the courts of equity are extremely unwilling to interpose in cases of public nuisance, without a trial at law."

See also Burnham v. Kempton, 44 N. H. 95; Wason v. Sanborn, 45 N. H. 171; Bassett v. Salisbury Mfg. Co. 47 N. H. 487, 82 Am. Dec. 179.

This unwillingness explains why precedents of trial by the court were so rare, prior to 1792, and precludes any inference of want of jurisdiction.

Where the matter complained of is not ipso facto a nuisance, but may be so according to circumstances, the court will require those circumstances to be ascertained by a verdict; but where it is in itself a nuisance the court (if there is sufficient evidence of its existence,) will restrain it without verdict.

Eden, chap. 11; Yard v. Ford, 2 Saund. 172; Atty-Gen. v. Doughty, 2 Ves. Sr. 453; Ripon v. Hobart, 3 Myl. & K. 169; Kirkman v. Handy 11 Humph. 406, 54 Am. Dec. 45; Mohawk Bridge Co. v. Utica & S. R. Co. 6 Paige, 554, 3 L. ed. 1099; High, Inj. 271; Burnham v. Kempton, 44 N. H. 97.

The nuisances within the provisions of the Act under consideration are all nuisances per se.

Train v. Boston Disinfect. Co. 144 Mass. 523, 59 Am. Rep. 113; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205; Carleton v. Rugg, 5 L. R. A. 193, 149 Mass. 550.

Hence, in proceedings to enjoin them, there is no right to trial by jury, because, certainly, at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, jury trial in such cases, however it may have been in regard to other nuisances, could not be demanded, as a matter of right.

The court may decree perpetual injunctions without trial.

Even under the peculiar jurisprudence of New Hampshire before 1792 there is no right to jury trial.

State v. Rollins, 8 N. H. 560; Perkins v. Scott, 57 N. H. 79; Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 185, 20 Am. Rep. 194.

Judge Parker, in State v. Rollins, 8 N. H. 562, after an exhaustive consideration of this subject, held that the common law in its widest sense, and whether it had been previously practiced upon in the province or not, was continued in force by act of the provisional assembly.

The common law, in its widest sense, includes the doctrines of equity.

Furthermore, it is distinctly held, in Wells v. Pierce, 27 N. H. 513, and in Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 210, 211, "that the principles of equity were practiced upon after the revolution and before the creation of any distinct equity jurisdiction, by the courts of law.

If article 20 of the Bill of Rights is to be interpreted on the basis that equity formed no part of our jurisprudence when the Constitution was adopted, then, certainly, we must resort to the mother country, for the true application of the terms, "heretofore used and practiced."

In Marston v. Brackett, 9 N. H. 849, and Hoitt v. Burleigh, 18 N. H. 889, 890, trial by jury, in equity, of all controverted questions of fact, is held to be a constitutional right.

The principle they declared was questioned by counsel, and considered as not settled by the court, in Clark v. First Congregational Soc. of Keene, 45 N. H. 384.

But it remained for Judge Ladd to drive the entering wedge into the anomalous doctrine of these early cases in Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 210.

The court again assailed the soundness of those cases and drove the wedge still further into the doctrine in Perkins v. Scott, 57 N. H. 81.

In Bellows v. Bellows, 58 N. H. 60, the wedge was driven home and the doctrine of Marston v. Brackett, supra, riven in twain. The court said: "In proceedings in equity the parties have no constitutional right of trial by jury."

See also Davis v. Dyer, 62 N. H. 236, 18 L. R. A.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

"Equity, as a great branch of the law of their native country, was brought over by the colonists, and has always existed as a part of the common law, in its broadest sense, in New Hampshire." Wells v. Pierce, 27 N. H. 503, 512; Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 179, 210, 20 Am. Rep. 194; Penhallow v. Kimball, 61 N. H. 596, 598, 599; Carroll v. McCullough, 63 N. H. 95, 98; Eckstein v. Downing, 64 N. H. 248, 259. "Until the case of Marston v. Brackett, 9 N. H. 836, decided in 1838, it had not been intimated in this state, or anywhere else, that there was a right of trial by jury in equity proceedings. I venture to say that if such a right ever existed in this state, it was after, and not before, the observation of Chief Justice Parker in that case. It is not necessary, in the view I take, to inquire whether that observation established such a singular and anomalous doctrine in this state or not. It is enough that up to that time all the books and cases where the common law prevails are the other way."

Ladd, J., in Perkins v. Scott, 57 N. H. 55, 81. The novel doctrine, adopted "without consideration," was abandoned as soon as it was examined. Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 179, 210, 211; Bellows v. Bellows, 58 N. H. 60; Sargent v. Putnam, 58 N. H. 182; Proctor v. Green, 59 N. H. 350, 352; Davis v. Dyer, 62 N. H. 231, 236. "In all controversies concerning property, and in all suits between two or more persons, except in cases in which it has been heretofore otherwise used and practiced, the parties have a right to a trial by jury." Bill of Rights, art. 20. If this clause had been re enacted in 1792, 1851, 1876, and 1889, when constitutional amendments were submitted to the people it is not to be assumed that its original meaning would have been changed by repeated adoptions. But it has not been adopted since it took effect in June, 1784. The impression that a Constitution was adopted in 1792 (Gen. Laws, p. 40, note; Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 190-192), is erroneous. Journal of the Convention in 10 Prov. and State Papers, 57, 63, 110-114, 141-168. The state has had but one permanent Constitution. The government of 1776 was intended to be temporary. Brewster v. Hough, 10 N. H. 143; Gould v. Raymond, 59 N. H. 272. "The Constitution of 1792" is a misnomer. In article 20 of the Bill of Rights, and in article 90 of the second part of the Constitution, "heretofore" means before 1784. "All the laws which have heretofore been adopted, used, and approved in the province, colony, or state of New Hampshire, and usually practiced on in the courts of law, shall remain and be in full force until altered and repealed by the Legislature; such parts thereof only excepted as are repugnant to the rights and liberties contained in this Constitution." Article 90. "All the laws which have heretofore been . . . usually practiced on in the courts" can be read in a sense that includes only such legal rules as can be shown to have been applied in New Hampshire cases. But this is not the meaning. The English common law, modified by American conditions, is one of "the laws which have heretofore been adopted, used, and approved in the province . . . of New Hampshire, and usually practiced on in the courts." This body of New Hampshire law (being the common law of England, such parts excepted as are not consistent with the Constitution, or not applicable to the institutions and circumstances of the country) is to "remain and be in full force until altered and repealed by the Legislature." State v. Rollins, 8 N. H. 550, 563, 564; Lord v. State, 16 N. H. 325, 330, 41 Am. Dec. 729. In 1836, when the defendant in State v. Buckman, 8 N. H. 203, 29 Am. Dec. 646, was found guilty of the common-law offense of maliciously tainting and corrupting a well of water by putting the carcass of an animal in it, the state was not required to show an actual or usual practice in the New Hampshire courts in this branch of criminal law before 1784. The defendant's motion in arrest of judgment would not have prevailed if the state had admitted that this was the first American case in which the rights of person and property had been violated in the manner set forth in the indictment. These rights were brought to this state by the first settlers, and were founded on legal principles, and not on the mere evidence of law furnished by precedents and decisions. These principles would have remained in force if article 90 had not been adopted. A written order was as unnecessary for the continuance of the unwritten law in 1784 as for its introduction in 1623. "The common law of England consisted of those maxims of freedom, order, enterprise and thrift which had prevailed . . . from time immemorial. It was the outgrowth of the habits of thought and actions of the people, and was modified gradually and insensibly, from time to time, as those habits became modified. . . . Springing from the very nature of the people themselves, and developed in their own experience, it was obviously the body of laws best adapted to their needs, and, as they took with them their nature, so also they would take with them these laws whenever they should transfer their domicile from one country to another. . . . From the first, the colonists in America claimed the benefit and protection of the common law. In some particulars, however, the common law as then existing in England was not suited to their condition and circumstances in the new country and those particulars they omitted, as it was put in practice by them." Cooley, Const. Lim. 82, 84. "The first colonists of New England were fishermen and farmers, their leaders were clergymen, and though they brought with them a general idea of English law and English liberty, the registers of writs were sealed books to them, as much as they are to us at this day. Instead of attempting to follow the forms of the register, they devised processes of their own. The recital of some of them will show that no reverence for any ancient forms existed among the courts here.

We regard the ignorance of the first colonists of the technicalities of the common law as one of the most fortunate things in the history of the law; since, while the substance of the common law was preserved, we happily lost a great mass of antiquated and useless rubbish, and gained in its stead a course of practice of admirable simplicity, and one which seems to us far better than the most improved codes of practice which have been recently introduced elsewhere." Boston U. & M. R. Co. v. State, 32 N. H. 215, 230, 231. With substantive rights the first settlers brought over the incidental rights of adequate remedy and convenient procedure. Cases cited in Boody v. Watson, 64 N. H. 178, 179. If the jurisdiction of a court of equity were an arbitrary power of violating legal rights, or doing justice in cases in which there is no law and no right, it might be said that equity was not a part of the common law brought over by the colonists, and that it did not exist here before a provincial court of chancery was established. But the work of such a court being the administration of law and the maintenance of rights chiefly in cases in which the power of other courts was formerly supposed to be defective in respect to adequacy of remedy and procedure (3 Bl. Com. 429-442), the theory that equity was not a branch of the provincial law cannot be accepted without overturning the fundamental principle that adequate remedies are incidents of substantive rights, and holding that, from the necessity of sufficient means of protection, the law implies a remedial system that is insufficient. Adequate remedy includes not only real actions, writs of possession, replevin, and judgments for damages, but also the specific performance of some contracts, and specific relief by injunction, receivership, partition, and other forms of equitable decree for trusts, fraud, accident, mistake, confusion of boundaries, partnership, nuisance and other cases of equity jurisdiction.

For some purposes legal rights may be conveniently divided into classes; but every classification does not indicate that they came into existence at different times. The incidental right to an adequate remedy for the infringement of a right derived from the unwritten law is coeval with the right of which it is an incident. The law of right and remedy that was administered in State v. Buckman came with the first emigrants who landed at Portsmouth, and not with the first provincial tribunal authorized to enforce it, or the first provincial magistrate authorized to issue a warrant. Before a court was established here to administer any branch of the law, the first English inhabitants were entitled to the protection afforded by the punishment of common-law offenses, the reformation of erroneous deeds, and other adequate civil remedies, compensatory and specific. The establishment of the first provincial courts that had jurisdiction of criminal and equity cases was a recognition of existing rights, substantive and remedial. Rich v. Flanders, 39 N. H. 304, 328. If all rights were now left for one year or ten years without a judicial jurisdiction in which they could be maintained, their legal existence during the interval would not be disproved. The obstruction of navigation by a boom across the Piscataqua would have been a nuisance abatable by an injunction from the provincial court of chancery, without the process of indictment and jury trial, which would be inadequate by reason of its dilatory character. The right to an immediate remedy as adequate as an injunction, is an incident of the right of navigation which was not created by the es-establishment of a court. If there had been no court of chancery here during the provincial period, it would nevertheless be true that adequate remedies are incidents of legal rights, that the specific forms of equitable relief, so far as justice requires them, are required by a settled rule of the ancient unwritten law as interpreted and administered in this state and that by this law the defendant in State v. Buckman had a right of jury trial which he would not have had in a suit in equity. The Bill of Rights was not the beginning of law for the state. The general phraseology of article 20 and article 90 assumed the existence of a well-understood system, which was to remain in force. The jury trial given in "the court maritime" by the Act of July 8, 1776, was a peculiarity which the last clause of article 20 authorized the Legislature to abolish. Such a clause, apparently inserted out of abundant caution, does not establish the construction that article 20 excludes common-law procedure by perpetuating every temporary and local method which the Legislature were not specially authorized to alter. The right of jury trial was not introduced or enlarged in 1784. "The constitutional provisions do not extend the right; they only secure it in the cases in which it was a matter of right before." Cooley, Const. Lim. 75, 504. In this elementary doctrine the authorities concur. The provision of the Federal Constitution that in the Federal jurisdiction "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury," "is to be interpreted in the light of the principles which at common law determined whether the accused, in a given class of cases, was entitled to be tried by a jury." Callan v. Wilson, 127 U. S. 540, 549, 32 L. ed. 223, 226. For the purpose of the present inquiry, jury trial in all cases except those "in which it has been heretofore otherwise used and practiced" is jury trial "in all cases in which it has been heretofore used." Whichever expression is used, the meaning is that the unwritten jury law, brought to this country by the first settlers, is in force so far as it has not been altered by usage or legislation before 1764. Mt. Washington Road Co's Petition, 35 N. H. 184, 142-145; Patrick v. Cowles, 45 N. H. 553, 555; Cocheco Mfg. Co. v. Strafford, 51 N. H. 455, 457-459. So far as the rights of the parties in this case are concerned, the difference between article 90 and the reservation of jury trial in the Bill of Rights is immaterial. The jury law, continued in force by article 90, as a part of the existing body of laws, subject to the legislative power of alteration and repeal, is withheld from that power by the Bill of Rights. As the substance of the jury trial right of 1784 would exist to-day if no Constitution had been adopted and no statute had been enacted, and as it is not claimed that the Legislature have attempted to impair it, the question is whether, by the unwritten law, there would have been a right of jury trial in this case in May, 1784, before the Constitution took effect, if the case had then been pending in a court of equity. The essentials of jury trial, "and the cases in which it had been otherwise used and practiced, are shown by common-law principles and by history." Wooster v. Plymouth, 62 N. H. 193, 203. Conflicting precedents of different times and places are examined for common-law rules presumed to be founded on reason. A jury trial is a proceeding in which the jury are the judges of the facts, and the courts are the judges of the law. This was the true rule of the common law, and this is the rule adopted by the Constitution, instead of the one practiced on here before and after 1784. Pierce v. State, 18 N. H. 536; State v. Hodge, 50 N. H. 510, 522, 523. The usage in which the historical right of jury trial is to be found is not merely that of an American province and state but also that of the race among whom this trial was an old institution when they brought it to the new world. "Suppose at some period after the adoption of the Constitution, and before the Act of 1832 conferring general equity powers upon the supreme court, the Legislature had given to the court a single isolated branch of equity jurisdiction and power,—as, for example, that of decreeing the specific performance of contracts, without creating it a court of chancery by name, and without providing that any of the forms of chancery proceedings should be observed,— . . . what difference could it make whether the equity power to enforce the specific performance of a contract had ever been exercised by any tribunal, either in the province or the state, before or not? If it was a power never used or practiced in the province before the Constitution in any form, then to determine the true application of the terms 'heretofore used and practiced,' as used in the Bill of Rights, we must go to the common law with respect to the new right and power thus conferred; and doing that, we find it not to be a case in which it had been used and practiced anywhere before the Constitution to have a trial by jury as matter of legal right." Ladd, J., in Perkins v. Scott, 57 N. H. 55, 81, 82. "The modes of seeking and granting relief in equity are different from those of courts of common law. The latter proceed to the trial of contested facts by means of a jury. . . . Courts of equity try causes without a jury." Story, Eq. Jur. § 81. In the construction of statutes and constitutions there is a natural presumption that, if a discontinuance or change of the universal and immemorial usage had been intended, the intention would have been shown by express words or necessary implication. Basey v. Gallagher, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 670, 22 L. ed. 452, was an appeal from the supreme court of the territory of Montana. The organic Act of the territory recognized the distinction between the jurisdictions of law and equity, and required proceedings in both to be in the same court. It was provided by statute that there should be but one form of civil action; and that issues of fact should be tried by jury, unless a jury was waived, or a reference ordered in a certain way. A bill for an injunction was brought in a territorial district court. Questions were submitted to a jury who returned a verdict on which both parties moved for judgment. On these motions the court heard the whole case on the pleadings, evidence, and verdict, and rendered a decree which was affirmed by the supreme court of the territory. In rendering the decree the district court disregarded a portion of the findings of the jury, and adopted others, and this action was approved by the supreme court of the territory, and was one of the errors assigned for reversal in the Federal court, where the decree was affirmed. "The consideration," says Field, J., delivering the opinion in that case, (page 680,) "which the court will give to the questions raised by the pleadings, when the case is called for trial or hearing, whether it will submit them to a jury, or pass upon them without any such intervention, must depend upon the jurisdiction which is to be exercised. If the remedy sought be a legal one, a jury is essential, unless waived by the stipulation of the parties; but, if the remedy sought be equitable the court is not bound to call a jury, and, if it does call one, it is only for the purpose of enlightening its conscience, and not to control its judgment. The decree which it must render upon the law and the facts must proceed from its own judgment respecting them, and not from the judgment of others. Sometimes in the same action both legal and equitable relief may be sought; as, for example, where damages are claimed for a past diversion of water, and an injunction prayed against its diversion in the future. Upon the question of damages, a jury would be required, but upon the propriety of an injunction the action of the court alone could be invoked. The formal distinctions in the pleadings and modes of procedure are abolished, but the essential distinction between law and equity is not changed. The relief which the law affords must still be administered through the intervention of a jury, unless a jury be waived; the relief which equity affords must still be applied by the court itself; and all information presented to guide its action, whether obtained through masters' reports or findings of a jury, is merely advisory. Ordinarily, where there has been an examination before a jury of a disputed fact, and a special finding made, the court will follow it; but whether it does so or not must depend upon the question whether it is satisfied with the verdict. This discretion to disregard the findings of the jury may undoubtedly be qualified by statute, but we do not find anything in the statute of Montana regulating proceedings in civil cases which affects this discretion. That statute is substantially a copy of the Statute of California as it existed in 1851, and it was frequently held by the supreme court of that state that the provision in that Act requiring issues of fact to be tried by a jury, unless a jury was waived by the parties, did not require the court below to regard as conclusive the findings of a jury in an equity case."

"It is often the primary . . . object of a suit in equity, brought by devisees and others, . . . to establish the validity of a will of real estate, and thereupon to obtain a perpetual injunction against the heir-at-law and others, to restrain them from contesting its validity in future. . . . In every case of this sort courts of equity will, unless the heir waives it, direct an issue of deviseavit vel non . . . to ascertain the validity of the will; but it will not feel itself bound by a single verdict either way, if it is not entirely satisfactory, but it will direct new trials until there is no longer any reasonable ground for doubt." Story, Eq. Jur. § 1447. "There is no doubt upon the right of 18 L. R. A.

this court to grant a new trial after a trial at bar. . . . It is admitted to be the practice of this court, where the issue is directed to inform the conscience of the chancellor, upon this principle, that it was the habit of this court to try upon the report of the circumstances, viz. the trial and all the objections, whether due attention had been given to all the considerations stated; whether, according to the common expression, the conscience of the court was satisfied or not." St. Paul's Wardens v. Morris, 9 Ves. Jr. 155, 165, 166. In that case Lord Eldon was of opinion (page 168) that, as the record stood at the original hearing, "the court had a right to refuse, but, if asked, ought to have directed an issue." O'Connor v. Cook, 6 Ves. Jr. 665, 671, was a bill for an account of tithes. The defense was immemorial payment of £20 a year in commutation. Upon the evidence the defendant contended that an issue should be sent to a jury. Lord Eldon said (in 1602): "There is no doubt that, according to the constitution of this court, it may take to itself the decision of every fact put in issue upon the record. . . . It is pretty clear that courts of equity in ancient times were more in the habit of taking to themselves the decision of questions of fact than they have thought wise and discreet in later times. As to immemorial payment, if any reasonable doubt has been raised upon it in the evidence, it has been of late thought wise and discreet to send the question of fact to a jury. All the judges have demonstrated their opinion in favor of that practice where any reasonable doubt is raised upon the fact." An issue was directed, and after verdict on a motion for a new trial, Lord Eldon said that, when courts of equity act upon the opinion of a jury, "their own judgment ought to concur with the verdict, to this extent at least, that they are not dissatisfied with the verdict." O'Connor v. Cook, 8 Ves. Jr. 585, 536.

No jury could be summoned to attend the English court of chancery, (3 Bl. Com. 452,) and there was no appeal from its decrees to a jury court. If trial by jury in equity had been a common-law right, the means of enjoying it in that jurisdiction, or on appeal, would have been provided by law. The chancellor "is equally competent to decide on disputed facts as on disputed law, and it is a matter of discretion only when he either orders or permits the parties to submit the trial of such facts to the cognizance of a jury." 3 Bl. Com. 48, Coleridge's note. When the chancellor's examination of written evidence left him in such doubt that he desired the advice of a jury, he could send an issue to a court that had power to summon a jury. If he made a decree in accordance with the jury's opinion, it was not because the verdict was a binding decision, but because he was satisfied or not dissatisfied with it. The privilege of a hearing before a jury, whose advisory verdict, obtainable only by an exercise of the chancellor's discretion, depended for its effect upon its being satisfactory or not unsatisfactory to him, was not the common-law right reserved by the Constitution. The reservation had no reference to a discretionary power exercised in Atty-Gen. v. Cleaver, 18 Ves. Jr. 211, and other cases (Story, Eq. Jur. § 923) decided before and since 1794. In the cases in which the right was reserved it was not connected with or affected by the reasonable doubts that had induced chancellors to seek the assistance of a jury, or the great or little deference that had been paid to advisory verdicts. In cases of reasonable necessity, organized society, as well as each individual, may defend personal and proprietary interests without judicial process based on the verdict of a jury. Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 434, 720, 739; Tiedeman, Pol. Powers, chap. 5; Cooley, Torts, 45-59; Haley v. Colcord, 59 N. H. 7, 8, 47 Am. Rep. 176; Weeks v. Sky, 61 N. H. 89; State v. Ray, 63 N. H. 403, 412, 56 Am. Rep. 529; Hodgden v. Hubbard, 18 Vt. 504, 46 Am. Dec. 167; Stone v. Lahey, 183 Mass. 426; Com. v. Donahue, 148 Mass. 529, 2 L. R. A. 623. "By the common law, every private person may lawfully endeavor, of his own authority, and without any warrant or sanction of the magistrate, to suppress a riot by every means in his power." Rea v. Pinner, 5 Car. & P. 260, note; Phillips v. Eyre, L. R. 6 Q. B. 15. For the better preventing the spreading of the plague, smallpox, pestilential or malignant fever, or other contagious sickness, the infection whereof may be probably communicated to others, the Act of 1714 (Laws 1771, p. 46) empowered selectmen to take care, and make effectual provision in the best manner they could for the preservation of the inhabitants, by removing infected persons to separate houses, and providing nurses and other assistance and necessities. If need so required, any justice of the peace was authorized to make out a warrant to the sheriff, his undersheriff or deputy, or constable or constables, requiring them, with advice and direction of the selectmen, to impress and take up convenient housing, lodging, nurses, tendance, and other necessities for the accommodation, safety, and relief of the sick. It was also provided that if any person coming to the province by sea happened to be visited with the plague, smallpox, pestilential or malignant fever during the voyage, or to come from any place where such sickness prevailed, a justice of the peace should forthwith take care to prevent all persons from coming on shore from the ship; if any be on shore, to send them on board again; to restrain persons from going on board; and to that end to make out a warrant directed to the proper officers, who were empowered and required to execute the same. Similar action is authorized by more recent legislation. Acts 1789, 1792, 1799, 1803, 1807, (Laws 1830, pp. 178, 180, 260-269;) Rev. Stat. chaps. 119-121; Gen. Laws, chaps. 111-113. In some cases health officers may abate nuisances without notice. Gen. Laws, chap. 111, § 5. A vessel attempting to pass into Portsmouth in violation of quarantine regulations made by the health officers may be stopped by the commander of any fort near the harbor. If such vessel attempts to pass after being hailed and forbidden, and after warning given by a shot fired ahead and a shot fired astern, then such vessel shall be fired upon and into until she shall bring to, and submit to the regulations. Act of 1807, in Laws 1830, p. 269; Gen. Laws, chap. 113, § 18. For the introduction of pestilence, a compensation suit, reinforced by indictment, jury trial, fine and imprisonment 18 L. R. A.

is not an adequate remedy. In the interior as well as on the seacoast, the protection of health and life may require measures more expeditious and effective than compensation and punishment. In many cases where public or private rights are infringed in a manner not involving life or health, immediate relief of a specific and preventive character, such as is furnished in the equity jurisdiction may be indispensable. The total obstruction of a main street of Manchester or Concord, by the erection of a building, would be a nuisance for the abatement of which it would not be necessary to wait for a session of court. The issue of an equitable process for the immediate clearance of the street would not be barred by the circumstance that the wrongdoer might suffer as much from a temporary order as from a final decree. It has never been understood that the bill of rights abolished the necessary powers of summary protection exercised by all governments, and rendered it impossible to deprive an infected person of his liberty in quarantine, destroy property and life by forcibly stopping an infected ship, or maintain public or private rights in any case of emergency and irreparable mischief, without a previous trial by jury. The limitation of legislative power by the constitutional reservation of private rights does not destroy the efficiency of government in all cases in which public or private rights require immediate and vigorous action. "In regard to public nuisances, the jurisdiction of courts of equity seems to be of a very ancient date, and has been distinctly traced back to the reign of Queen Elizabeth. . . . In cases of public nuisances, . . . an indictment lies to abate them, and to punish the offenders. But an information also lies in equity to redress the grievance by way of injunction." Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 921, 923. "In modern times, courts of law frequently interfere and grant a remedy under circumstances in which it would certainly have been denied in earlier periods. And sometimes the Legislature by express enactments, has conferred on courts of law the same remedial faculty which belongs to courts of equity. . . . In neither case, if the courts of equity originally obtained and exercised jurisdiction is that jurisdiction overturned or impaired by this change of the authority at law in regard to legislative enactments; for unless there are prohibitory or restrictive words used, the uniform interpretation is that they confer concurrent and not exclusive remedial authority." Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 644, 80. The wrongful fowage of a meadow by a millpond is a nuisance for which the injured party is entitled to damages for the past, recoverable in an action of trespass on the case, and an injunction for the future, recoverable on a bill in equity. Neither of his civil remedies would be taken away by a statute making the wrong a criminal offense, punishable, on indictment, by fine and imprisonment. His right to specific relief on a bill in equity would not be affected by a further statutory provision authorizing the same relief in a criminal prosecution of the offender. Wells v. Pierce, 27 N. H. 503, 512, 513; Alden v. Gibbon, 63 N. H. 12.

The abatement of a fowage nuisance by an injunction issued in an equity suit is a civil remedy, and not a punishment of a criminal offense. The legal character of the abatement does not depend upon the ownership of the property. If the land belongs to the state, the abatement of the nuisance is a relief of the plaintiff from future wrong, and not a penalty inflicted upon the defendant for the past. Neither does the legal character of the abating process depend upon the form of the action in which the injured party obtains redress. A prosecution under the Bastardy Act is a civil suit, although the procedure is mostly criminal. The object of the statute is to compel the defendant to indemnify the public and the mother of the child against expenses. Castles v. Welch, 68 N. H. 869; Littleton v. Perry, 50 N. H. 29-32; Ford v. Smith, 62 N. H. 419. Other statutes deal with him as a criminal. Gen. Laws, chap. 274, §§ 1, 2, 4. He is not punished twice for one offense. In some cases of homicide an indictment has been used as a civil action for the recovery of compensation. Gen. Laws, chap. 282, § 14; State v. Manchester & L. R. Co. 52 N. H. 528, 548, 549.

On an indictment for larceny, when the defendant is convicted, the owner of the stolen property is entitled to judgment and execution in common form against the convict for the value thereof, deducting the value of such part thereof as has been returned, with reasonable damages; and the defendant, if committed on the execution, has the same relief as if it had issued in an action of trespass. Gen. Laws, chap. 278, § 14. In such a case, the form of action is criminal, and the cause of action and the remedy are both criminal and civil; as they are when a judgment against the defendant on an indictment for nuisance is enforced by a mittimus punishing him for a wrong done before the indictment was found, and an abating process for the future specific and equitable relief of the injured party. Reg. v. Stephens, L. R. 1 Q. B. 702, 708, 709; 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, § 1074. The public character of the injured party is not a constitutional ground on which the civil remedy can be refused.

In State v. Crawford, 28 Kan. 726, 42 Am. Rep. 182 (an action to abate a liquor saloon, declared by statute to be a common nuisance), the court says (pages 735, 736): "While it is unquestionably true that the keeping of the saloon in question is a criminal offense, and its operation involves the commission of many criminal offenses, yet we cannot think that these facts can possibly take away any of the jurisdiction which courts of equity might otherwise exercise. It would seem to us that all sound reason and the great weight of authority is against the objection. . . . At common law all public nuisances were public offenses; and if the proposition is sound that no nuisances can be enjoined except such as are not public offenses, then, where the common law has full force, no public nuisance could ever be enjoined." Littleton v. Fritz, 65 Iowa, 488, 54 Am. Rep. 19, was an action upon a statute which provided that "any citizen of the county where such [liquor] nuisance exists, or is kept or maintained, may maintain an action in equity to abate and perpetually enjoin the same." The constitutional reservation of the right of jury trial "secures the right" says the court (pages 491, 491, 495, 65 Iowa), 18 L. R. A.

"In all cases in the trial of which a jury was necessary, according to the principles of the common law. . . . The jurisdiction of courts of equity to enjoin and abate nuisances is of very ancient origin. . . . Such a case being of equitable cognizance, neither party could, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, demand a jury trial as matter of right. . . . One maintaining a nuisance may not only be punished in a criminal proceeding, but a civil action at law to recover damages in a proper case, and an action in equity to restrain the nuisance, may be prosecuted against him. . . . The defendant, in order to succeed in the defense that the proceeding by injunction is an attempt to enforce a criminal law by civil process, demands, in effect, that the courts must establish the principle that, because the nuisance complained of is a crime, it is entitled to favor and protection in a court of equity. . . . There are many adjudged cases . . . which expressly hold that the fact that a nuisance is a crime, and punishable as such, does not deprive equity of its jurisdiction to restrain and abate it by injunction." Curleton v. Rugg, 149 Mass. 550, 5 L. R. A. 193, was a petition upon the Massachusetts Liquor Nuisance Act of 1887, of which our law is a substantial copy. It was held that the Act was constitutional; that the suit was not a proceeding to punish an offender for the crime of maintaining a nuisance; that the fact that keeping a nuisance is a crime does not deprive a court of equity of the power to abate the nuisance; and that the objection that the statute makes no provision for a trial by jury applied as well to nearly all legislation giving jurisdiction in equity. Three judges dissented, on the ground that statutes against the sale of intoxicating liquor had never been enforced by injunction in equity when the Constitution was adopted. The Legislature intended by the Act of 1887 to provide a mode of punishing criminal violations of the liquor law without jury trial, and this purpose was inconsistent with the defendant's protection "by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land." State v. Noyes, 80 N. H. 279, was an indictment upon chapter 245, Laws 1845, which provided that a bowling alley within twenty-five rods of a dwelling-house, store, shop, schoolhouse, or place of public worship, should be taken and deemed to be a public nuisance. The defendant objected to judgment on the ground that the Act was unconstitutional; that it did not authorize fine or imprisonment, but only an abatement of the nuisance; and that, as the indictment contained no allegation that the nuisance continued to exist at the time the indictment was found, no judgment of abatement could be rendered. It was held that the Act was constitutional that for the statutory nuisance the defendant was punishable by fine and imprisonment at common law; that a judgment that the nuisance be abated could only be rendered where it was alleged and proved that the nuisance continued to the finding of the indictment; but that the omission of a sufficient allegation on that point did not impair the residue of the indictment. "It is not to be conceded," says Bell, J., delivering the opinion of the court (pages 294, 295), "that places of gambling are not 'nuisances,' in the proper and legitimate sense of the word. They are certainly nuisances of the worst kind, in the sense in which disorderly houses are so called; and, at common law, keeping a gaming house is a nuisance. . . . It may be said that a bowling alley is not of itself a nuisance, since it may either remain unused, or it may be used only as a place of innocent amusement; that its injurious character depends upon the improper use alone. But the Legislature may well determine that an instrument which tends to facilitate vicious practices is of itself an evil which ought to be prohibited."

Under the Act of 1887, it is the use made of a liquor saloon that makes the building a nuisance, and the nuisance is abated by an injunction against the use. State v. Marston, 64 N. H. 603, 604. If an Act were passed authorizing an injunction against the crime of larceny, or against the violation of criminal law in general, it might be argued that punishment was the object of the Act. It would hardly be contended that, for all purposes, every wrong can be made a common nuisance by legislation. "The Legislature cannot do indirectly what it cannot do directly; it cannot change the nature of things by affixing to them new names." Field, J., in Carleton v. Rugg, supra. But it has not been shown that, for the suppression of nuisances, the power of the Legislature to provide a civil remedy by injunction in equity is limited to such kinds of nuisance as had been invented when the Constitution was adopted, or those that had then been attacked in that way. "It is competent for the Legislature to declare the possession of certain articles of property, either absolutely, or when held in particular places, and under particular circumstances, to be unlawful, because they would be injurious, dangerous, or noxious; and by due process of law, by proceedings in rem, to provide both for the abatement of the nuisance and the punishment of the offender. . . .

Putrifying merchandise may be stored in a warehouse, where if it remain it would spread contagious disease and death through a community. Gunpowder, an article quite harmless in a magazine, may be kept in a warehouse always exposed to fire, especially in the night. However secreted, a fire in the building would be sure to find it, and the lives and limbs of

. . . firemen and citizens, engaged in subduing the flames, would be endangered."

Fisher v. McGirr, 1 Gray, 1, 27, 61 Am. Dec. 881. "The repeated, continuous, and persistent violations of the statutes are what makes them [drinking saloons] nuisances, independent of the express terms of the statute declaring them to be such. . . . Every place where a public statute is openly, publicly, repeatedly, continuously, persistently, and intentionally violated is a public nuisance." State v. Crawford, 28 Kan. 726, 733. Keeping a gaming house is a nuisance at common law Ree v. Dixon, 10 Mod. 325; Ree v. Rogier, 1 Barn. & C. 272; Lord v. State, 16 N. H. 325, 41 Am. Dec. 729, although gambling was not of itself unlawful at common law, (2 Bishop, Crim. Law, [2d ed.] §§ 606, 532; Reg. v. Ashton, 1 El. & Bl. 286); or a house of ill fame, bawdy or assignation house (Bacon, Abr. title Nuisance A; Reg. v. Orrnage, 1 Salk. 384; Com. v. Howe, 13 Gray, 26; McAlister v. Clark, 33 Conn. 91; People v. Rowland, 1 Wheeler, Crim. Cas. 286; State v. Bailey, 21 N. H. 348; State v. McGregor, 41 N. H. 407; State v. Foley, 45 N. H. 466), although fornication and adultery were offenses only cognizable at common law in the ecclesiastical courts. The doctrine of Com. v. McDonough, 13 Allen, 581, 584, that keeping a house for the illegal sale of intoxicating liquor is not a nuisance at common law, may be open to question. In Smith v. Com., 6 B. Mon. 21, it was held that keeping a house for such a purpose is a public nuisance. The court says: "The habitual perpetration of the prohibited offenses in a house kept for the purpose constitutes the house a public nuisance, as it tends in a greater degree to the spread of the evil which was intended to be prohibited by these enactments. There is a specific penalty for fornication and adultery, yet it is an offense and a much higher grade of offense to keep a bawdy house or a house where those practices are indulged; and though the single offense [selling liquor] may be punished by a specific fine, the keeping of a house where those offenses are habitually encouraged and indulged is an offense of a much higher grade, and is punishable as such by an indictment at common law." Bishop says that this doctrine, "though apparently new in the law, is truly as old as the law itself. A man who holds out inducements for people to congregate, and together commit violations of a statute, not only lends the concurrence of his will to their wrongful acts, but also does what most powerfully tends to disrobe the body politic of her virtue, and of the drapery of that order which the hand of government has thrown around her; or, if he thus draws people together that in their presence he may himself infringe a law of his country, he accomplishes likewise the same evil end." 2 Bishop, Crim. Law, §§ 253, 259.

Among the cases to which the Constitution refers for information concerning use and practice are general classes in which such general principles as the common law of nuisance had been established before 1784. This law is applicable to a great variety of wrongs, old and new, that have the essential qualities of a nuisance, and are appropriately dealt with as cases of the class to which they naturally belong. Crowder v. Tinkler, 19 Ves. 617, 623; 3 Bl. Com. 5, 216; 4 Bl. Com. 166; High, Inj. §§ 772-784; Wood, Nuisances, chaps. 1, 5, 7, 13-19, 21, 24, 25; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 920-929. If dynamite, carelessly deposited by its owner on his own land in a farming town, should endanger the property and life of but one neighbor, the civil and private remedy of an injunction would not be withheld on the ground that such relief had never been given in such a case when the Constitution was adopted. If the nuisance were public, the explosive being stored in the most populous part of Manchester, an injunction could not be refused on account of the greater amount of property and life exposed to danger. Whether the wrong was or was not a criminal offense in 1784 or 1889, the public would be entitled to the civil remedy provided by equity law. If the sale of intoxicating liquor had never been, and were not now, a criminal act, and the statute had not alluded to the subject of nuisance, but had merely provided that the use of a building for the common sale of intoxicating liquor should be stopped by injunction on a bill in equity, there would be no ground for holding that the statute was enacted for the fraudulent purpose of inflicting criminal punishment in a civil suit. And an illegal purpose cannot be judicially found in the Act of 1887. It could have been passed in its present form for the legal purpose of providing a civil remedy, and it would accomplish that object in the same manner, and by the same civil process, whether it was made for that purpose, or with a design to enforce criminal law. The primary object was the suppression of a business that could be directly and constitutionally attacked by civil process in civil suits. There was no occasion to abandon the direct mode of accomplishing that object, or to propose the indirect use of civil process in the suppression of the business by the enforcement of penal statutes. So far as such a design would be circuitous, it would be superfluous. Assuming that it would be fraudulent and illegal, and would invalidate the Act, the only motive the Legislature could have for entertaining it would be a desire to defeat the law they were attempting to make. There is nothing in the Act that can overcome the presumption of constitutional intent. Dow v. Norris, 4 N. H. 16, 18, 57 Am. Dec. 400; Bell v. Glazier, 18 N. H. 184, 188; Kennett's Petition, 24 N. H. 139, 141; Colony v. Dublin, 82 N. H. 432, 434; Opinion of the Justices, 41 N. H. 555, 556; Cooley, Const. Lim. 218-221, 267. If this presumption could be set aside, there is no evidence or argument on which it could be found that the Legislature preferred an illegal purpose to a legal one, in order to nullify their own work and shield a business which they regarded as a nuisance from the process they leveled against it. "The judgment of his peers or the law of the land," in article 15 of the Bill of Rights, is synonymous with "the verdict of a jury or due process of law." Mayo v. Wilson, 1 N. H. 53, 55; Cooley, Const. Lim. 430. By the common law, judgment may be given per legem terræ, without the intervention of a jury in "all cases in the courts of equity. . . . Any legal process which was originally founded in necessity, has been consecrated by time, and approved and acquiesced in by universal consent, must be considered an exception to the right of trial by jury, and is embraced in the alternative, 'the law of the land.'" State v. Allen, 2 McCord, L. 55, 59, 60. "Due process of law undoubtedly means in the due course of legal proceedings, according to those rules and forms which have been established for the protection of private rights." Westerholt v. Gregg, 12 N. Y. 202, 209, 62 Am. Dec. 160. "It refers to certain fundamental rights, which that system of jurisprudence, of which ours is a derivative, has always recognized." Brown v. Levee Comrs. 50 Miss. 468, 479. "Due process of law in each particular case means such an exertion of the powers of government as the settled maxims of law permit and sanction, and under such safeguards for the protection of individual rights as those maxims prescribe for the class of cases to which the one in question belongs." Cooley, Const. Lim. 434. "It refers to that law of the land . . . which derives its authority from the inherent and reserved powers of the state, exerted within the limits of those fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions. . . . Any legal proceeding enforced by public authority, whether sanctioned by age and custom, or newly devised in the discretion of the legislative power, in furtherance of the general public good, which regards and preserves these principles of liberty and justice, must be held to be due process of law." Hurtado v. People, 110 U. S. 516, 535, 537, 28 L. ed. 232, 238, 239. It was held in that case that due process of law does not require an indictment by a grand jury in a prosecution by a state for murder. "A state cannot deprive a person of his property without due process of law; but this does not necessarily imply that all trials of the state courts affecting the property of persons must be by jury. This requirement of the Constitution is met if the trial is had according to the settled course of judicial proceedings." Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90, 92, 93, 23 L. ed. 678, 679; Kennard v. Louisiana, 92 U. S. 480, 23 L. ed. 478; McMillan v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 37, 41, 42, 24 L. ed. 335, 336; Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 104, 105, 24 L. ed. 616, 619, 620; Missouri v. Lewis, 101 U. S. 22, 31, 25 L. ed. 989, 992. "It is a mistaken idea that due process of law requires a plenary suit and a trial by jury in all cases where property or personal rights are involved. . . . That kind of procedure is due process of law which is suitable and proper to the nature of the case, and sanctioned by the established customs and usages of the courts." Ex parte Wall, 107 U. S. 265, 289, 290, 27 L. ed. 552, 562. Kansas v. Ziebold, 123 U. S. 623, 637, 638, 654, 31 L. ed. 205, 208, was a petition filed in a state court under section 13 of the Kansas Act of 1885, which provided that "the attorney-general, county attorney, or any citizen of the county where such [liquor] nuisance exists, . . . may maintain an action in the name of the state to abate and perpetually enjoin the same." The suit was removed into the circuit court of the United States, and was there dismissed. On appeal taken by the state, it was held (pages 672, 673, 123 U. S.) that proceedings in equity for the purposes indicated in the thirteenth section of the statute are consistent with due process of law; and "as to the objection that the statute makes no provisions for a jury trial in cases like this one," the decision was that "such a mode of trial is not required in suits in equity brought to abate a public nuisance." The decree dismissing the bill was reversed, and the cause was remanded, with directions to enter a decree granting to the state such relief as the statute authorized. A perpetual injunction, issued on a bill in equity for abatement without the verdict of a jury, was due process of law, because at common law such process, in such a case, did not require a jury trial. Eilenbecker v. Plymouth County Dist. Ct., 134 U. S. 31, 33 L. ed. 801. was a complaint filed in a district court of Iowa, for violation of an injunction issued in an equity suit on the liquor law. Notice being given, the complaint was tried upon affidavits by the court without a jury. The defendant was found guilty, and an alternative judgment imposing a fine of $500, or imprisonment for three months, was affirmed by the supreme court of the state, whose judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. The grounds of the defendant's objections were the criminal nature of the entire proceeding under the statute, excessive fine, cruel and unusual punishment, and trial by the court on affidavits, without a jury, without an indictment, without due process of law, and without the equal protection of the laws. It was held that the district court had power to issue the injunction, and that the proceeding on the complaint for violation of the injunction "is due process of law, and always has been due process of law." In the opinion the court says, 134 U. S. 40, 33 L. ed. 805: "If the objection to the statute is that it authorizes a proceeding in the nature of a suit in equity to suppress the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors which are by law prohibited, and to abate the nuisance which the statute declares such acts to be, wherever carried on, we respond that, so far as at present advised, it appears to us that all the powers of a court, whether at common law or in chancery, may be called into operation by a legislative body for the purpose of suppressing this objectionable traffic; and we know of no hindrance in the Constitution of the United States to the form of proceedings, or to the court in which this remedy shall be had. Certainly it seems to us to be quite as wise to use the processes of the law and the powers of the court to prevent the evil as to punish the offense as a crime after it has been committed." See Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 16, 32 L. ed. 846, 848, and Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 122, 123, 34 L. ed. 128, 137. In this jurisdiction, a complaint for the violation of an injunction or other decree is not ordinarily tried on affidavits if either party objects to such evidence, nor is it tried by jury; but in our present practice there is a jury trial in many cases in which it is not a constitutional right. Tasker v. Lord, 64 N. H. 279, 283. It is sometimes necessary to consider by what method of investigation, and by what tribunal, the rights of the parties will probably be most accurately and completely ascertained and adjusted. Some questions cannot be so conveniently handled by twelve jurors as by a smaller number; some cannot be adequately and properly settled with the means to which jurors are by custom restricted. Davis v. Dyer, 63 N. H. 231, 235, 236. Connecticut River Lumber Co. v. Olcott Falls Co., 65 N. H. 290, 391, is a bill in equity for an injunction against the maintenance of a dam across Connecticut river without a suitable sluiceway for the passage of logs. If the question whether the dam in its present form is a nuisance, by reason of the insufficiency of the sluice, were submitted to a jury, and they found the dam a nuisance, the verdict would not inform the defendants what alterations should be made. If a trial is necessary, the interests of both parties require that the decision should specifically determine what sluice would be sufficient. A defective sluice may be no cause for demolishing the whole dam, and the case ought not to be tried upon a misleading issue. "On the question of the proper form, dimensions, and place of a sluice, the jurisdiction of equity is as plain as in a partition of water power between millowners, the ascertainment of lost boundaries, or the laying out of a private way. At the trial term the court can cause the log way to be located and defined by a jury, and put upon them the duty of drawing a report containing a specification for the construction of the dam and sluice. But it has not been shown that the law of any country requires such work to be done by twelve unanimous persons." In the present case, if the alleged use of a building is proved, the nuisance is to be abated by injunction. There is no occasion for the trial of any other issue than the simple one of use, and there is no legal reason why that issue should not be tried by jury. It is as properly determinable in that way as the question of fraud in such cases as Tasker v. Lord. The Act of 1897, declaring the use of a building for either of several purposes to be a nuisance abatable in equity, does not introduce an exceptional mode of trial, or change the ordinary course of procedure on questions properly triable by jury. A nuisance cannot be abated, with or without legal process, if it has been discontinued, and has not been renewed when proceedings are begun against it. State v. Noyes, 80 N. H. 279, 298. A suit in equity is not commenced until the bill is filed. Clark v. Slayton, 63 N. H. 402. The statute does not authorize the maintenance of a suit and the rendition of judgment upon a cause of action that ceased to exist before the suit was brought. Case discharged.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Kansas
v.

William C. PHIPPS et al., App'ts.

(.....Kan.....)

1. The word "trade," as defined by this *Headnotes by SIMPSON, C.

NOTE.—An important case applying an "Anti-Trust Law" to a combination fixing rates of insurance in which corporations of other states are involved is above reported. The claim that insurcourt in the case of Re Pinkney, 47 Kan. 89, does not mean interstate commerce, nor was such a meaning within the contemplation of the court at the time the decision was rendered.

2. The business of insurance, as ordinarily conducted in this state by insurance companies organized under the legislation of other states is not interstate commerce.

3. Foreign insurance companies doing ance by such companies constitutes interstate commerce is, in view of prior decisions, interesting chiefly by reason of its forcible and elaborate presentation by counsel. On the general subject business in this state, that combine to control and increase the rates of insurance on property within a city in this state, violate the provision of chapter 257 of the Laws of 1889, being "An Act to Declare Unlawful Trusts and Combinations in Restraint of Trade and Products, and to Provide Penalties therefor;" and their local agents who attempt to, and do, enforce such combined rates, are subject to prosecution under the provisions of said Act.

4. The Legislature of this state has the power to prescribe the conditions upon which an insurance company organized under and by virtue of the laws of another state can do business within the limits of the state of Kansas.

(January 7, 1893.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Labette County convicting them for violating chapter 257 of the Laws of 1889 prohibiting unlawful trusts and combinations in restraint of trade. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the commissioner's opinion.

Mr. E. F. Ware, for appellants:

The Anti-Trust Law of Kansas was passed in 1889, chap. 257. Its title is: "An Act to Declare Unlawful Trusts and Combinations in Restraint of Trade and Products, and to Provide Penalties therefor."

The said law, when read parenthetically, as pertains to insurance, is as follows:

Section 1. "All arrangements, contracts, agreements, trusts, or combinations between persons or corporations designed or which tend to control the cost or rate of insurance are hereby declared to be against public policy, unlawful, and void."

Section 8. "Any person who shall attempt to carry out or act under any such arrangement, contract, agreement, trust, or combination, either on his own account or as agent of any corporation, or in any capacity whatever, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

The Constitution of the state of Kansas provides, art. 2, § 16: "No bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title."

The Supreme Court of Kansas has decided (Re Pinkney, 47 Kan. 89), that the said Act of 1889 was constitutional in that the subject of the Act was clearly expressed in the title. Therefore insurance is trade.

That decision finally settled the status of insurance companies in Kansas.

The Federal Law of July, 1890, concerning trusts, when read parenthetically as regards the case at bar, is as follows (26 U. S. Stat. at L. 209):

Section 1. "Every contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade among the several states is hereby declared to be illegal." Every person, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000.

Section 2. "Every person who shall combine to monopolize any part of the trade among the several states shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

Section 4. "The several circuit courts of the United States are hereby vested with jurisdiction."

The Federal law is exclusive of the state law; the state law is inoperative, and the defendants must be discharged.

Walling v. Michigan, 116 U. S. 456, 29 L. ed. 694.

Commerce is intercourse, and the term "interstate commerce" means intercourse between people of different states.

If insurance is trade, then insurance policies and insurance agents are instruments of trade, and the power to regulate commerce embraces all the instruments by which trade may be carried on.

"It extends to the persons who conduct it as well as to the instruments used."

Cooley v. Philadelphia, 53 U. S. 12 How. 299, 18 L. ed. 996.

Communication by telegraph is a part of commerce.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Atlantic & Pacific States Teleg. Co. 5 Nev. 102; Pensacola Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 3 Woods, C. C. 643; Pensacola Teleg. Co. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 96 U. S. 1, 24 L. ed. 708; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 480, 26 L. ed. 1067; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Pendleton, 122 U. S. 847, 30 L. ed. 1187; Ratterman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 127 U. S. 411, 32 L. ed. 229.

If the recital over the wire of an unfortunate and uninteresting piece of ancient personal history is interstate commerce, then the only definition of interstate commerce is "intercourse."

Commerce among the several states means, "intercourse between the citizens of different states."

"Power to regulate commerce" including navigation and commercial intercourse was one of the primary objects for which the United States Constitution was adopted.

2 Story, Const. 3d ed. 4.

Commerce includes the fact of intercourse, of combinations to prevent competition and creating monopolies, see notes to Lealie v. Lorillard (N. Y.) 1 L. R. A. 456; People v. North River Sugar Ref. Co. (N. Y.) 2 L. R. A. 83; Carroll v. Giles (S. C.) 4 L. R. A. 154; Richardson v. Buhl (Mich.) 8 L. R. A. 457; Herreshoff v. Boutineau (R. I.) 8 L. R. A. 469; Union Ben. Co. v. Union Hospital Co. (Minn.) 11 L. R. A. 437; Lovejoy v. Michels (Mich.) 13 L. R. A. 770.

to the Kansas Act above involved, making combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade criminally punishable, see United States v. Jellico Mountain Coke & Coal Co. 12 L. R. A. 733, 46 Fed. Rep. 432.

Another case just decided by the circuit court of the United States for the District of Massachusetts decides that an indictment under that Act must allege that there was a conspiracy in restraint of trade by engrossing or monopolizing or grasping the market, and that it is not sufficient to allege a purpose to drive certain competitors out of the field by violence, annoyance, intimidation or otherwise. United States v. Patterson (C. C. D. Mass.) March, 1893.

and of traffic, and the subject-matter of intercourse and of traffic. The fact of intercourse and traffic again embraces all the means, instruments, and places by and in which intercourse and traffic are carried on, and further still, comprehends the act of carrying them on at these places and by and with these means.

Pom. Const. Law, § 878.

It also means intercourse and navigation.

Fuller v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 81 Iowa, 207; People v. Raymond, 84 Cal. 492.

Free intercourse and trade between the states and with foreign countries can be safely regulated only by that jurisdiction that looks to the general interests of the nation as a whole rather than the special advantages of a particular locality.

State v. Pratt, 59 Vt. 590.

Congress has power to legislate over intercourse as well as traffic.

There are now, as shown by the report of the commissioner of insurance, thousands of insurance agents in the state, regularly licensed to issue policies.

The business is done in the name of the foreign company, and not in the name of the agent.

When a policy is written, a report thereof is sent out of the state to the home office of the company, and the company accepts or rejects the risk.

The money that is received for the premium is promptly remitted to the foreign company, and the company pays the agent, for the agent is not doing business for himself or in his own name.

If a building is burned and the company so elect, it can build another building in place of the one burned down, thereby trading one building for another; or the company from its treasury abroad can send into the state its money to pay the loss. If articles of property are damaged, the company reserves the right to buy them. This is intercourse.

The very genius of the business makes it interstate. It is the only known business that is naturally interstate.

During all this time the foreign corporation is not a citizen, or a resident, or an inhabitant of the state of Kansas. It is at all times foreign.

Purcell v. British Land & Mortg. Co. 42 Fed. Rep. 465; Henning v. Western U. Tele. 18 L. R. A.

Co. 43 Fed. Rep. 97; Myers v. Murray & Co. 11 L. R. A. 216, 43 Fed. Rep. 695; Conn v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 48 Fed. Rep. 177.

And the corporation is not only not domesticated, but it cannot be held to an agreement that it is domesticated, because the law says that such agreement is invalid.

Home Ins. Co. v. Morse, 87 U. S. 30 Wall. 415, 22 L. ed. 365.

The reasoning of the United States Supreme Court in Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 183, 19 L. ed. 361, is incomprehensible so far as it relates to the insurance part of the case.

If a New York insurance company sends an agent to Virginia to make a contract of indemnity to be paid by the New York party, it makes no difference whether the contract is delivered in Virginia or Quebec, so far as its interstate feature is concerned. It is still an interstate contract.

The first mistake to be noticed is that the supreme court fails to distinguish between an executed contract and an executory contract. A policy of insurance is not an executed contract.

The second mistake to be noticed is that insurance cannot be likened to a New York man who goes into Virginia and buys something. It should be likened to a New York man who goes into Virginia and sells something (indemnity) to be delivered in the future from the home office in New York. If, instead of "indemnity," we read "stoves," we find the case already decided in Wrought Iron Range Co. v. Johnson, 8 L. R. A. 273, 84 Ga. 754.

See also McCall v. California, 136 U. S. 104, 34 L. ed. 392.

It is easily possible for the insurance companies of the United States to send a committee of experts to Kansas, who would revise and prepare fire maps for the state showing every building. Then the business could be run from the home or department office. If, after the report of the committee upon maps and rates, the companies should see proper to combine, and adopt the maps and rates, then the local agent would know nothing of it, and the companies violating the laws of Kansas would have innocent local agents in Kansas carrying out the combine.

If the local agent be not guilty, and cannot be punished, and if all the other persons connected with the violation of law live outside of the state, then what is the status of the actors?

If a person outside of the state commits, by reason of an innocent agent, a crime within the state, he is guilty of committing a crime within the state.

Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 53.

Suppose a misdemeanor is committed in Kansas by a man who was never in the state, and that the man remains outside of Kansas, can he be extradited and tried in the state?

Only "fugitives from justice" can be extradited.

The most liberal opinion on that subject is Roberts v. Reilly, 116 U. S. 80, 29 L. ed. 544, and that case requires the prisoner to be in the state when the crime was committed.

Tennessee v. Jackson, 36 Fed. Rep. 258.

Courts of equity do not generally enjoin the commission of crime. But if it should, the result of such action inside the state of Kansas by the state against foreign companies would be wholly fruitless.

Kansas cannot go into the foreign Federal courts and enjoin the insurance companies at their homes from violating the laws of Kansas.

A suit brought by a state outside of its own territory, in the courts of the United States, against the citizen of another state, must be an action in which a money judgment can be rendered, and it must be a "civil suit" as to its origin.

An injunction suit by Kansas in a Federal court, as suggested, would be a suit to enforce the penal laws of Kansas. No country or state will execute the penal laws of another.

Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co. of New Orleans, 127 U. S. 265, 32 L. ed. 239; Dey v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 45 Fed. Rep. 82.

Outside of the commerce clause of the Constitution, it would seem that there had been given inherent power to Congress to legislate concerning the relations of states with citizens (and insurance companies) of other states.

Kan. Const. art. 8, § 2, art. 1, § 8.

There is no common law as to insurance.

When the United States Constitution was formed fire insurance was not a science; it was hardly a business.

What, then, is to be the construction of the Constitution of the United States as to matters of which the framers could not have foreseen the importance?

What is to be the construction as to matters that are both new and important and which can be included or excluded in the interpretation of the Constitution?

Ought we to say: What would the framers of the Constitution have done if the matter had been presented to them in its then condition?

Or ought we to say: What do the American people want now?

Obviously the latter.

Dartmouth College Trustees v. Woodward, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 644, 4 L. ed. 661; Tiedeman, The Unwritten Constitution, p. 144.

When Kansas says that insurance is trade, the Federal courts are bound to accept and follow that ruling as part of the settled policy of the state.

The United States Supreme Court is therefore at liberty to overrule Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 183, 19 L. ed. 361, and follow Re Pinkney, 47 Kan. 89.

The Supreme Court of the United States will follow and carry to their ultimate logical conclusions the decisions that the state courts give to state statutes, if valid.

If trusts are an evil, if the combinations of citizens of various states to violate the laws of other states are contrary to public policy and deserve restraint, has not Congress an implied power to recognize and control such a condition of things?

Whenever those subjects are of a national character over which the power of Congress to regulate commerce is asserted, or of a national concern, or whenever such subjects admit of a uniform interstate system of regulation, then their nature is such that Congress may by appropriate legislation regulate them exclusively.

Messrs. J. N. Ives, Atty. Gen., and J. R. Hill, with Mr. F. H. Atchinson, Co. Atty., for the State.

Simpson, O., filed the following opinion:

W. C. Phipps and Theo. Gardner, with four others, were complained against, by information, in the district court of Labette county, upon a charge of having violated chapter 257, Laws 1889, being "An Act to Declare Unlawful Trusts and Combinations in Restraint of Trade and Products, and to Provide Penalties therefor." It seems from the record that only Phipps, Gardner, Neely, and McClure were arrested. The other two defendants were not served with process. At the trial the defendants Phipps and Gardner were found guilty, while the defendants James L. McClure and George A. Neely were found not guilty. Each of the appellants was fined $100 and costs. The specific charge was that the accused were agents of various insurance companies organized under the laws of the states of New York, Colorado, Minnesota, and Connecticut; that they were doing business in this state, and that said insurance companies had combined to control the price and rate of insurance in the city of Oswego, Labette county, Kan.; that by agreement they had established certain rates, larger than those existing before said combination; and that the accused, as agents and adjusters of said companies, were engaged in compelling local agents to observe such combination rates, so established by said companies. The defendants Phipps and Gardner appeal to this court.

The counsel for the appellants contends, to state his proposition in general terms, that chapter 257, Sess. Laws 1889, so far as it affects foreign insurance companies or their agents, is in conflict with the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several states, and for that reason void; or, that the federal Anti-Trust Law of July 2, 1890, (26 U. S. Stat. at L. p. 209,) is exclusive of the state law, and that all prosecutions for such offenses as are charged in this information must be commenced in the Federal courts, and hence these appellants must be discharged. The counsel has filed an elaborate brief, and made a long oral argument, discussing the Anti-Trust Law of this state and of the United States; the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution and the power of Congress to legislate on that subject; as well as other branches of inquiry that may be involved in the proper discussion of this appeal.
